A mistake is made, however, by organisers of women's work in not taking sufficient steps to lay before the public particulars regarding the vacancies they wish to fill, and also through dilatory methods in dealing with applications by letter and in compiling registers of those who have applied. One finds that the labour exchanges, for instance, nearly always have numbers of posts on their books, many of them extremely good ones but women are chary of applying to this organisation, as their experiences have too often been that their names and addresses are taken and nothing further transpires.

There is a system working in the exchanges by which particulars of posts are circulated to every branch, and the difficulties in hearing of work at the local ex- [illegible] have completed their probationary period, which lasts for one month, and have signed an agreement to serve for twelve months or the duration of the war, whichever is less. Third-class railway fares incurred by the workers on first joining the camp or hospital will be refunded. The age limit is from eighteen to forty-five.

It is possible that the present rate of wage for these posts may be raised in the near future. Almost an unlimited number of women are required. Experience is not necessary, as the duties are simple and are quickly learned under the direction of the superintendents during the month of probation. Good health is, however, a necessity.

Applicants should write to the secretary, Women's Legion, Military Cookery Section, Room 4, Centre Block, Duke of York's Headquarters, S.W., giving full particulars of themselves, their age, previous employment or experience, and stating when they will be free to begin work.

the enemy. Our victories do not immoderately exalt us, nor do temporary "throwbacks" unhinge the balance of our will. The soul of the nation has steadied into an unflinching determination to win the war, no matter what further sacrifices may be needed before that issue is quite clear. And the soul of the nation knows that we shall win the war, because if ever there were holy war this is, despite its ravages and horrors.

Work for Educated Women.

To-day's change of scene will be, perhaps, most indicative of all, since the actual declaration of war, of the people's mind.

To prophesy what answer the Allies will make to the Peace Proposals is beyond the province of this article. But if the answer be as we believe it will, to send more men and more munitions to build up the gigantic wall of the Allies' solid power, which will end by proving impenetrable to the enemy, then, too, more women will be wanted here in England to carry on the work which men have had to leave in answer to the immediate call.

Some of us have shown ourselves now to be a national asset. But there is still a percentage of women, inactive or of negligible use, who possibly through diffidence, hold back; whose energies could be used, whose energies must be used, in an hour when wastage of any sort, in any sphere, is no longer foolish, but culpable.

In some instances women of education are doing work which could be done as well by unskilled women. There are still domestic servants who could be released for more important work in factories. In a higher class, women—the names of some have been given to me confidentially in the past few days—do, perhaps, one day's work for the nation when they are free to give the week's work.

Private initiative, example, moral suasion, can do no more. A central bureau in London, backed by Government, is needed, with representative bureaux in every county, to obtain a comprehensive roll showing which women who are not now working are free to be utilised in the country's cause. There are excellent registers of would-be workers available, to simplify the work; in one Government office at least, under a most practical head, it is kept completely up to date, through careful organisation.

Practical Suggestions.

The "willing" would-be workers of each district thus classified and registered and (it is hoped) allotted, the next task would be to deal with the unaccounted for remainder. These would receive notices to attend the local Tribunal. Just cause should be shown why such a woman could not fulfil the duty which the State required of her. In cases, for instance, of a widowed or spinster householder who had lost some of her income through the war, and possibly the appointment by which she then earned money, exemption might be granted for some months until she had been able to relieve herself of the obligations incurred, and so forth. In some cases, the applicant would be given work forthwith. The Tribunal members should be composed of persons of probity, tact, and discrimination.

Conscription for women as a definite practical scheme would compel Government recognition. No existing society—political or social—could grapple with its problems unaided. But with the weight of the Government behind it, it could be enforced. To submit to it means the acceptance of investigation and inquiry distasteful to many. To say we are ready for it is to put ourselves on an equality with "conscripted men" and be willing to go where and when the State pleases and do what the State wants. But if this further sacrifice be required of us in order that the war may be shortened and precious lives spared to the country, there is not, I believe, one woman of eligible age and health in England who would not welcome, instead of cavilling at the compulsion which would make all women of practical national use.

Weekly Dispatch 23. 9. 17.

WILL THE ARMY AGE BE RAISED?

War Office Comb-Out of Non-Combatants.

WOMEN WHO DO NOTHING.

Will the Army age limit be raised? That is the question everybody is asking who has studied Sir Auckland Geddes's National Service pronouncement.

Men over the present military age need not have any immediate anxieties—nothing has been settled. A Bill would be required, and there is no sign that any steps in that direction have been taken.

In any case, such a measure, opposed as its passage through the House would sure to be by pacifist obstructionists, could not come into force much under three months' time.

In so far as Sir Auckland can rely on the co-operation of the Government, he aims at placing recruiting on a much more scientific basis and with greater regard to the value of his available material.

Attention will be paid to occupation in the case of men in low medical categories. He will not take away from civilian life a C 2 man of military age whose work is of national or semi-national importance. He will not send navvying a B 2 man who is a considerable employer of labour when hundreds of navvies over 41 years of age who could do the work a hundred times better can be secured under a proper system of organisation.

THOUSANDS SIFTED OUT.

Meanwhile the War Office has been conducting a tremendous comb-out among the administrative branches of the Army.

Thousands of men from the Army Service Corps, Army Ordnance Corps, R.A.M.C., Army Pay Corps, and even from the Expeditionary Force Canteens, are gradually being sifted out and drafted into the infantry. The urgent necessity for this move was pointed out in The Weekly Dispatch in May last.

Unfortunately this drastic "combing-out" has not taken place without a certain amount of trouble. Thousands of men who have been receiving the higher rates of pay in the administrative branches are now complaining very strongly of being reduced to the infantryman's shilling a day.

Although it is difficult at present to form a reliable estimate of the numbers of men involved in this "comb-out," it is probable that the total number will be not far short of 250,000. "A" men of all descriptions have been put into training reserves by the thousand. Both in England and France special arrangements have been made for training as infantrymen men whose previous experience in the service necessitates but brief instruction before they are fitted for the trenches.

Much of this instruction is being imparted by the N.C.O.s of our original Expeditionary Force. Dozens of schools have been established behind the line in France, where the infantry recruits are taught squad and company drill, musketry, bombing, Lewis gunnery, camouflage, and the precautions to take in the event of gas attacks.

MORE WOMEN WANTED.

A still greater comb-out could, however, be effected if the enormous number of women still doing no national work would make up their minds to help the war.

At the moment there is an absolute famine in women willing to do clerical work in Government offices. The standard of efficiency has been so watered down that it now only really amounts to willingness, while the wages, even in these days, are by no means bad, averaging with the better-paid posts for women a good 50s. a week.

We have to-day a curious situation. In munition factories and other similar places of prime importance we have hundreds of thousands of fit young men every one of whom might be in the firing line if a substitute could be found; we have semi-fit men doing light but necessary work and we have women doing nothing at all.

Obviously the thing to do is to get the women to do the light work, get the semi-fit (C1, B2, C2, B3, C3), and all men to 55 on "munitions," while the fit young "indispensables" would put on khaki and take their turn at fighting.

This is the problem, and it can only be solved by women. If "Single Girls First" be adopted as a motto we can easily have a million more fighting men in France within the next four or five months.

Cumberland News 22-9-17

THOUSANDS OF WOMEN

STILL WANTED BY THE MINISTRY OF MUNITIONS.

GOVERNMENT'S GROWING DEMAND FOR WORKERS.

Where are the great armies of women workers to be found to meet the requirements of the Government and private employers?

The War Office requires 10,000 women a month, mostly for domestic and unskilled work, and a small proportion for clerical and motor transport work. The Ministry of Munitions will require thousands and thousands more women for munition and engineering works and for airplane construction. The Food Production Department will want thousands more women in the new year. The Government is swallowing more and more clerical workers, and employers generally are at their wits' end to find workers.

"All the capable women are fully employed," said an official of the National Union of Women Workers on Tuesday. "I cannot see where these thousands of workers are to come from."

A woman who has had the task of interviewing hundreds of women for Government employment thinks that the women can best be found by shutting down some employments as non essential and restricting many others. "A large number of girls and women can still be drawn from luxury trade and occupations and many idle young women should be forced to work, if only in their own homes."

Morning Post 15-10-17

679

DEMAND FOR WOMEN WORKERS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE MORNING POST.

SIR,—Sir Auckland Geddes in his splendidly inspiriting speech at Nottingham on Wednesday said:

The Women's Army Auxiliary Corps was in need of recruits. Women of all sorts were wanted, and they were not getting enough. He knew the women of the country had been splendid, but those who had been showing the splendidness belonged on the average either to the working class or to the upper class. There was a great mass of young, quite healthy, middle class femininity which was doing nothing really to help the war along.

From recent personal experience I know the above remarks to be true. During the recess I have visited several large fashionable hotels both in Great Britain and Ireland, and the presence of this class of women shirkers forced itself on public notice. Cannot women bring some social pressure to bear on such defaulters? In some cases, doubtless, these women have left their homes and taken to live in hotels in order to avoid such social pressure, but there are many who are doing nothing simply because they possess no imagination, never read the newspapers, and never hear of the great national need for women workers.—Yours, &c.,

MEATH.

Kildare Street Club, Dublin, Oct. 12.

Daily Mail 11-10-17

THE WOMAN SLACKERS.

The men are not tired of saying that "the women are splendid." But the women are beginning to be tired of hearing it.

They know, for one thing, that what is true of the sex as a whole is not true of every individual who belongs to it, and that many women, taking advantage of the general admiration for those who have done well, are doing nothing at all.

What Sir Auckland Geddes, the Minister of National Service, said in the speech we reported yesterday confirms the observations of everyone who goes about with his eyes open: "There is a great mass of young, quite healthy, middle-class femininity which is doing nothing really to help the war along."

It may be seen any day in the streets, in the theatres and restaurants, and especially in the shops; and its excuses for a slackness that is in danger of becoming indifference usually relate to someone who is at home on leave from the front. But we are getting to a stage of the war when the plea that "the men like us to dress well," and that it is necessary to keep a multitude of women unemployed in order to "give the boys a good time," is wearing very thin.

The Women's Army Auxiliary Corps needs thousands of women at this moment, will need thousands more a few months hence, and is not getting them. It needs them as cooks, as waitresses, as clerks, as general service women for hospitals, as motor drivers, as motor mechanics, and in a hundred other capacities.

Sir Auckland Geddes frankly stated that households with more than three servants will be expected to relieve the surplus for national work. It is only now, indeed, and in a very mild form compared with what our Allies are suffering that the effects of the war are being felt in our hearths and homes. There is a time of stringency and discomfort ahead for all of us and very much will depend

Yorkshire Evening Post 18-10-17

WOMEN AND WAR WORK.

"J. E. E." writes protesting very strongly against Sir Auckland Geddes' remark that the women of the middle-classes had not responded to the nation's call for war work so well as the women of the working classes and upper classes. She points out that, like many others, she responded to the country's appeal for munition workers. After working for nine months on the night shift at a certain factory near Leeds, and keeping good time, she, with many others, were given their discharge one day, just half an hour before the hour for closing, and along with their discharge a week's wages in lieu of notice. "Just as if we were the scum of the earth," she puts it.

Since then she has tried the Labour Exchanges; but they have nothing to offer. In view of facts like these, she regards Sir Auckland Geddes' strictures as unfair.

Daily Mail 9-11-17

TOO MANY SERVANTS.

SIR AUCKLAND GEDDES TO ANNOUNCE "STEPS."

Mr. Duncan Millar yesterday called attention to the advertisements for servants in households of one, two, or three persons, where seven to ten servants are kept.

Mr. Beck replied for the Ministry of National Service: These advertisements have not escaped the notice of Sir Auckland Geddes. He hopes that the awakened consciences of those who have in this respect failed to appreciate their duty will provide an immediate and sufficient remedy. If not, in an early statement on man-power he hopes to state definitely the steps which will be taken.

Daily Mail 1-11-17

Yorkshire Evening Post 18-10-17

THE WOMAN SLACKERS.

The men are not tired of saying that "the women are splendid." But the women are beginning to be tired of hearing it.

They know, for one thing, that what is true of the sex as a whole is not true of every individual who belongs to it, and that many women, taking advantage of the general admiration for those who have done well, are doing nothing at all.

What Sir Auckland Geddes, the Minister of National Service, said in the speech we reported yesterday confirms the observations of everyone who goes about with his eyes open: "There is a great mass of young, quite healthy, middle-class femininity which is doing nothing really to help the war along."

It may be seen any day in the streets, in the theatres and restaurants, and especially in the shops; and its excuses for a slackness that is in danger of becoming indifference usually relate to someone who is at home on leave from the front. But we are getting to a stage of the war when the plea that "the men like us to dress well," and that it is necessary to keep a multitude of women unemployed in order to "give the boys a good time," is wearing very thin.

The Women's Army Auxiliary Corps needs thousands of women at this moment, will need thousands more a few months hence, and is not getting them. It needs them as cooks, as waitresses, as clerks, as general service women for hospitals, as motor drivers, as motor mechanics, and in a hundred other capacities.

Sir Auckland Geddes frankly stated that households with more than three servants will be expected to relieve the surplus for national work. It is only now, indeed, and in a very mild form compared with what our Allies are suffering that the effects of the war are being felt in our hearths and homes. There is a time of stringency and discomfort ahead for all of us and very much will depend on the women of the country as to whether we go through with it in the right spirit. They will have to get along with no servants at all or with fewer than their usual number, and the women who are now idling or playing at canteen work or trifling with bazaars ought at once to find out where and how they can be really useful.

Women's work in the war will end only when the war is over. Until that time comes it is bound to expand in scope and to become more exacting in character.

WOMEN AND WAR WORK.

"J. E. E." writes protesting very strongly against Sir Auckland Geddes' remark that the women of the middle-classes had not responded to the nation's call for war work so well as the women of the working classes and upper classes. She points out that, like many others, she responded to the country's appeal for munition workers. After working for nine months on the night shift at a certain factory near Leeds, and keeping good time, she, with many others, were given their discharge one day, just half an hour before the hour for closing, and along with their discharge a week's wages in lieu of notice. "Just as if we were the scum of the earth," she puts it.

Since then she has tried the Labour Exchanges; but they have nothing to offer. In view of facts like these, she regards Sir Auckland Geddes' strictures as unfair.

Daily Mail 9-11-17

TOO MANY SERVANTS.

SIR AUCKLAND GEDDES TO ANNOUNCE "STEPS."

Mr. Duncan Millar yesterday called attention to the advertisements for servants in households of one, two, or three persons, where seven to ten servants are kept.

Mr. Beck replied for the Ministry of National Service: These advertisements have not escaped the notice of Sir Auckland Geddes. He hopes that the awakened consciences of those who have in this respect failed to appreciate their duty will provide an immediate and sufficient remedy. If not, in an early statement on man-power he hopes to state definitely the steps which will be taken.

National News 28.-10.-17.

WAR WORK FOR ALL.

INTERVIEW WITH THE LORD MAYOR.

Special to "The National News."

Although the new Minister for National Service has set his face definitely against compulsion, there is a feeling in some quarters that a satisfactory result will never be achieved by voluntary measures. Among those who share this opinion is the Lord Mayor of London, Colonel Sir Edward Dunn. In an interview with a representative of The National News he said:—

"Although I anticipate efficient management of this great scheme under Sir Auckland Geddes' control, I feel, however, that what is really wanted can be achieved only by industrial compulsion.

"At the very beginning of war industries I realised that compulsion, both in the field and at home, could only solve the problem. Later on compulsion was adopted for our forces; people disliked the idea of it, though they stooped to necessity. If only industrial compulsion could be likewise enforced we should gain big results.

"Of course, I know that to pass such a measure would be a big undertaking, but this industrial question is far more intricate than the average citizen understands. What delays compulsion is the attitude of the working man, including the soldier. He does not like to see his wife go out to work; if he happens to be in this country he dislikes her absence from the home. In fact, 'keep the home fires burning' means that hundreds are being kept at home to see that they remain burning.

"This objection made by the male worker has merit in it; he argues that he works in order to keep his wife and home. Why should he part with both through the wife's absence in the industrial world? Also, one must recollect that the child-bearing mother ought to stay at home—another reason why men tend to encourage her absence from industry.

"Many months ago I called together my London colleagues; industrial compulsion was vetoed unanimously for reasons that I have outlined. On the other hand, I believe that Mr. Neville Chamberlain hoped for it, and I think that his resignation occurred when he found that 'no compulsion' remained the general opinion.

Big Salaries for Little Work.

"I believe that National Service, on voluntary methods, has accomplished all that it will accomplish. Sir Auckland Geddes will achieve what is actually necessary, while nothing greater will follow on the present lines. If we want more men and women in industry we must use force.

"Many women work to-day because they are paid heavily for their work. That is one reason why I say that National Service has reached its numerical limit. On the other hand, women fill paid posts when without any need of the salaries thus earned; quite wealthy women receive good salaries for the simplest duties. If they refuse to accept money their colleagues bitterly resent their gratuitous work. If compulsion prevailed women would be placed to duties for which they proved suitable as regards rank, brains and experience. At present there is considerable overlapping, besides unnecessary salaries, handicapping industrial progress on the whole.

"As regards Sir Auckland Geddes' appeal for more women workers, I see no reason why these workers should be lacking. What I do say is that he must encourage these women to relinquish the monied jobs in favour of less paid and more essential forms of industry."

The Queen 24.8.1918. 679c/22 1-7n

THE PROGRESS OF EVENTS.

Important Posts in the Naval Service.

FEW OF THE WOMEN'S CORPS have created from the start a more favourable impression than those who have been enrolled as officers in the W.R.N.S. Perhaps the uniform has something to do with it; for the well-cut suit of black cloth with blue facings and the broad-brimmed black hat with braided ornament above the brow convey an air of distinction and good breeding. But it is not a matter of dress alone. The naval women are carefully chosen; and so they play their part well.

The difficulty is that there is never any surplus of competent, well-educated, responsible women; and although there may be crowds of girls looking in at the shop windows or amusing themselves up the river, many of these are too little disciplined in the training school of work to be suitable for high positions.

Among our own readers are many women of a different type from this—women who have been educated at the best high schools and colleges, as well as those who have been born in social conditions which have obliged them to take the lead in their own world. Girls and women of this class are just now peculiarly needed to fill the higher places in the W.R.N.S.; and we have therefore been asked to set forth some of the details concerning the appointments in the service which are waiting for the right candidates.

Administrative and Non-Administrative Officers.

The vacant posts for educated women of ability in the service are of two kinds—administrative and non-administrative. Administrative officers deal with the women when they are off duty. They are responsible for the management of the hostel and for the discipline and welfare of the ratings under their charge. The appointments for which non-administrative officers are required are posts involving secretarial work of a highly confidential and sometimes of a technical character.

All officers in the W.R.N.S. have to pass a selection and medical board, and when they are found suitable for the service, they are sent for a month's training, which consists of drill, lectures, &c. For non-administrative officers this training is somewhat shorter, and is supplemented by a short course in their own special branch of work. The age limits for applicants are preferably between twenty-two and forty-five. The salaries vary according to the posts and duties, the annual amounts ranging between £120, £150, and £175, with a lodging allowance of 2s. 3d. per night, if quarters are not available. A deduction of 15s. 6d. per week is made in the case of officers living in hostels, to cover board and service.

The work is serious, and must not be undertaken by women who are apt to tire of each employment in turn—for unfortunately there are women of that type. All officers in the Naval Service sign on "for the duration," and must be prepared, with few exceptions, to be sent on duty to any part of the British Isles, or even abroad, though home posts form the majority. Appointments of this calibre are not to be had for the asking; they can only be held by women who possess a high standard of efficiency, and also of conduct. But they are certainly posts which patriotic women of the upper and professional classes would be proud to fill. The W.R.N.S. has its headquarters at 15, Great Stanhope-street, W. 1.

Conscription or "Combing-out."

There is certainly a shortage of capable girls. A couple of years ago most of the authorities in Government Departments would not admit that there was a case for the conscription of women. To-day there is rather a different tone noticeable. The drawback to conscription or to any general appeal is that departments and employment exchanges become overcrowded with women who are either ineffective, bad "stayers" at their job, in doubtful health, of doubtful character, a good deal less capable than they say they are, or a good deal older than they declare they are. For one or other of these disqualifications or an amalgamation of them many names of candidates must be written off.

The ground just now is a good deal cumbered by the elderly women. Many of these are not anxious to be employed in regular paid work, even if they were adequately equipped. But they do not quite know what to do or how to occupy their time. The result is that in numerous instances they travel about the country attending conferences, annual meetings, summer meetings, and the like. These gatherings have their uses, and are not unduly festive. In some cases women return from them primed with fresh ideas which may animate their public or charitable labours. But these defensive apologies cannot be offered on behalf of all the aged female "students" who attend such conventions (usually to listen while men do the speaking or lecturing), and even when they can be put forward with truth, they are hardly adequate just now. For not only do these ladies cumber the trains, cabs, and omnibuses, but they upset the nicely measured distribution of our food supplies—which, at present, is the gravest complaint one can make. The grievance against them is that they are not (to use the current phrase) "mobile units" of teachers or workers, but merely travelling audiences. And audiences in war time—especially audiences long past their youth—should really stay at home.

Wanted: The Young Women.

It is the young women who are needed. But in regard to them the war itself has created a difficulty. Marriage in all ranks has been stimulated, especially early marriage, and though the young wives of officers and privates do frequently take paid work, yet it must naturally happen that many by reason of their marriage become occupied with home work and young children. Steady training for skilled professional work ceases; the young wife moves about the country to be near her husband if his duties are in Great Britain; and thus women who in peace time would be unmarried and available are withdrawn from the field of regular non-domestic work. The girls to whom public employers turn with most alacrity are those who are just about to leave the best secondary schools, or are reaching the end of their university course. The last named are so scarce and so quickly bespoken (especially for educational and the higher scientific work) that they must be left out of our present reckoning. There remain the secondary schools or high schools. Here it does seem to us that some definite pressure might be exercised perhaps, indeed, it already is in operation. It ought certainly to be difficult for any girl to leave one of the top forms of her school without going straight into training for some form of national employment commensurate in payment and calibre with her attainments. Unless the girl is a positive invalid, there should be no thought of her returning to live at home, even though it be to do part-time V.A.D. work, to organise girl guides, or to cultivate her father's garden. Each of these duties—notably the last—may be most meritorious. But work done in or from the parental home and more or less at one's own or one's parents' pleasure is never done under really business-like conditions. It is bound to partake of the nature of the "soft job." Therefore we return to our dogma and emphasise it quite firmly: while the war lasts, and while young women are needed, the girls who leave the high schools should be "combed out," offered a good choice of employment, and told that they must enlist among the regular workers.

M. H.

WOMAN LABOUR.

Attitude of Trade Unions.

EMERGENCY ONLY.

The Same Pay as Men for the Same Work.

An indication of the extent to which women have displaced men in industry was given in Manchester on Saturday, at a conference under the auspices of the Manchester and District Women's Interests Committee.

Mr. W. Mellor, formerly of the London Fabian Research Department, submitted a list of occupations closed to women before the war, in which women were now engaged. The list included tramway conductors, street sweepers, railway workers (porters, booking-office clerks, carriage cleaners, and station mistresses), messenger girls, telegraph girls, grocery assistants, clerks in Government and insurance offices, gardeners, commissionaires, lift attendants, motor van drivers, taxi drivers, and women police, irrespective of the large number engaged in armament works and aircraft factories. While agreeing that there was need for better organisation in munitions industries, Mr Mellor criticised the Government's failu to realise that the reorganisation industry must begin from within and a their panic methods. He wanted to protest strongly against the view that the trade unions had not given up anything and were merely sitting tight.

Taking the Chance.

The trades unions were agreeing to a relaxation of rules, thereby allowing unskilled and female labour to enter into their industries, but it was one thing for officials to agree to a relaxation of rules and another to get the rank and file to agree to that relaxation. The women's view seemed to be "we have got a chance; let us take it." That was a thoroughly dangerous attitude, and it was going to lead to more trouble and more putting back of the clock in the labour world than anything else. It would put up the backs of the men's trade unions, who would fight the women tooth and nail.

Co-operation between men and women wou l only be possible if they were prepared to treat the problem as one of emergency labour for the period of the war in order that male labour should not suffer afterwards. His suggestions for dealing with the problem were for the unions which did not now admit women to admit them; for women to be paid at same rate for the same jobs as men; for a record of emergency labour to be kept, and the trade unions concerned notified of every emergency worker taken on by each firm, with particulars as to wages paid and work done; and for women to be admitted into each industry on the distinct understanding that they would have to be the first to go when displacements occurred through men coming back from the war and claiming their old jobs.

Mrs. Annot Robinson protested against the suggestion that women vere less patriotic than men, or were seeking to take advantage of men who had gone to the front by stepping into their jobs. She did not think it would be fair or practicable, however, to ask women to give up their work and give place to men at the end of the war. The result of that, she declared, would be social chaos.

Mr. A. A. Purcell, the furnishing trade union leader, said he stood for the return of men to their former positions and the displacement of the women if necessary. The men had had to fight severely for the small pittance they had to-day, and they did not want the employers to be supported by women's labour.

The committee, whose headquarters are at 66, Barton Arcade, Manchester, is sending out to the various trade unions a list of questions which aim at discovering to what extent and under what conditions women are replacing men in industry, whether the replacement is likely to be permanent, and the attitude of the trade unions towards it.

In cases where women have entered a particular trade since the war, the union is asked to state whether they are (a) married women returned to the trade; (b) women not previously in industrial employment; (c) women from other trades. Information is also sought as to whether women are doing the same work as the men they have replaced, or whether conditions or processes have been adjusted to suit them.

Mr. W. Mellor, formerly of the London Fabian Research Department, submitted a list of occupations closed to women before the war, in which women were now engaged. The list included tramway conductors, street sweepers, railway workers (porters, booking-office clerks, carriage cleaners, and station mistresses), messenger girls, telegraph girls, grocery assistants, clerks in Government and insurance offices, gardeners, commissionaires, lift attendants, motor van drivers, taxi drivers, and women police, irrespective of the large number engaged in armament works and aircraft factories. While agreeing that there was need for better organisation in munitions industries, Mr Mellor criticised the Government's failu to realise that the reorganisation industry must begin from within and a their panic methods. He wanted to protest strongly against the view that the trade unions had not given up anything and were merely sitting tight.

Taking the Chance.

The trades unions were agreeing to a relaxation of rules, thereby allowing unskilled and female labour to enter into their industries, but it was one thing for officials to agree to a relaxation of rules and another to get the rank and file to agree to that relaxation. The women's view seemed to be "we have got a chance; let us take it." That was a thoroughly dangerous attitude, and it was going to lead to more trouble and more putting back of the clock in the labour world than anything else. It would put up the backs of the men's trade unions, who would fight the women tooth and nail.

Co-operation between men and women wou l only be possible if they were prepared to treat the problem as one of emergency labour for the period of the war in order that male labour should not suffer afterwards. His suggestions for dealing with the problem were for the unions which did not now admit women to admit them; for women to be paid at same rate for the same jobs as men; for a record of emergency labour to be kept, and the trade unions concerned notified of every emergency worker taken on by each firm, with particulars as to wages paid and work done; and for women to be admitted into each industry on the distinct understanding that they would have to be the first to go when displacements occurred through men coming back from the war and claiming their old jobs.

Mrs. Annot Robinson protested against the suggestion that women were less patriotic than men, or were seeking to take advantage of men who had gone to the front by stepping into their jobs. She did not think it would be fair or practicable, however, to ask women to give up their work and give place to men at the end of the war. The result of that, she declared, would be social chaos.

Mr. A. A. Purcell, the furnishing trade union leader, said he stood for the return of men to their former positions and the displacement of the women if necessary. The men had had to fight severely for the small pittance they had to-day, and they did not want the employers to be supported by women's labour.

The committee, whose headquarters are at 66, Barton Arcade, Manchester, is sending out to the various trade unions a list of questions which aim at discovering to what extent and under what conditions women are replacing men in industry, whether the replacement is likely to be permanent, and the attitude of the trade unions towards it.

In cases where women have entered a particular trade since the war, the union is asked to state whether they are (a) married women returned to the trade; (b) women not previously in industrial employment; (c) women from other trades. Information is also sought as to whether women are doing the same work as the men they have replaced, or whether conditions or processes have been adjusted to suit them.

Each union is asked, further, to state whether any of its rules have been relaxed or stiffened, and whether it proposes to accept women as members.

Manchester Guardian
9/7/15

WOMEN'S WORK.

THE MINIMUM WAGE.

A conference was held in Manchester on Friday evening between representatives from the Women's War Interests Committee and representatives of the Manchester and District Trades Council, the Women's Trades and Labour Council, and the Women's Trade Union Council.

Councillor Margaret Ashton, who was in the chair, said it was their desire to protect women's interests in the new work they were taking up; to prevent them from lowering the value of work normally done by men; to secure from the start a decent living wage for the women; and to avoid the creation in the Manchester district of new industries paying inadequate wages to women.

The meeting unanimously agreed that no effort should be spared to secure adequate wages for the women engaged on munitions work. It was further agreed that this could only be secured by establishing a guaranteed minimum wage.

Manchester Guardian
6/7/15

WOMEN'S WORK AND WAGES.

THE MUNITIONS RATE.

The Manchester and District Women's War Interests Committee yesterday discussed with the Trade Union Section of the Armaments Output Committee the possibility of obtaining a minimum wage for women workers on munitions.

Mr. Purcell, for the deputation, said that in the view of the women represented a guaranteed minimum of £1 per week should be paid to all adult women workers on munitions (over 18 years of age) for a 48-hour week, and on piecework the rates should be such as not to cause the weekly wage to fall below £1. All women employed on night work should be paid at the rate of time and a quarter.

Councillor Margaret Ashton pointed out that, although in some cases women were actually doing the same work as men, yet in the work on shells and fuses they were doing work which had been done by women before at sweated rates, bt which was new to Manchester. The Women's Interests Committee were anxious that good conditions and fair rates should be recognised before the employment of women in ammunition works became general in Manchester.

Mr. Grierson said that £1 was an average weekly wage of machinists engaged on war work in Manchester, so that they were not fixing the minimum too high.

Mrs. Annot Robinson called attention to the low wages and long hours prevailing in the Midlands for munitions work, and urged that it was necessary in an industry new to Manchester that the district rates should not be lowered.

Mrs. Dickenson, the secretary of the Women's Trades and Labour Council, compared the proposed minimum with the wages of organised women workers in engineering shops in the Manchester district, and considered the recommendation moderate and fair.

The Armaments Output Committee were very much in sympathy with the views expressed. They were keenly alive to the danger of cheap women's labour, but there had been difficulties in regard to the interpretation of a clause in the memorandum drawn up by the Advisory Committee on March 19.

Manchester Courier
19/7/15

WOMEN WORKERS' WAGES

PROPOSALS OF MANCHESTER COMMITTEE.

Representatives of the Women's War Interests Committee met in conference representatives of the Manchester and District Trades Council, the Women's Trade Union Council, and the Women's Trade and Labour Council at Manchester this week-end, the object of the conference being to enable the War Interests Committee to lay its proposals before the other representatives, and also to ascertain accurate information concerning the entry of women into munitions work.

In outlining the general programme of the War Interests Committee, Councillor Margaret Ashton, who was in the chair, said that it was their desire to protect women's interest in the new work they were taking up; to prevent them from lowering the value of work, normally done by men: to secure from the start a decent living wage for the women; and to avoid the creation in the Manchester district of new industries paying inadequate wages to women. They believed that in asking for the payment of a decent wage to women engaged in the manufacture of munitions they would have the support of fair-minded and public-spirited citizens. They considered that existing conditions strongly emphasised the point that women's wages should not be based on the supposition that their period of dependence on their own earnings was a short one.

The meeting was asked to consider and give its support to the following proposals: (1) That a guaranteed minimum wage of £1 a week should be paid to every adult woman (over 18 years) working on munitions. (2) That the piecework rates for the women should bear the same relation to their time rates as the men's piecework rates bears to theirs. (3) That the relation between overtime rates and ordinary rates should be the same for the women as for the men.

It was unanimously decided to support the proposals.

The Royal Technical Institute Departmental Sub-Committee at Salford is to provide, subject to the approval of the Board of Education, short courses of instruction in engineering machine tools for persons who desire to assist in the manufacture of munitions of war.

The Manchester Guardian
11/8/15

THE EMPLOYMENT OF WOMEN.

To the Editor of the Manchester Guardian.

Sir,—In reference to Mrs. Tomlinson's letter in Saturday's issue of the "Manchester Guardian," I think the vagueness of Mr. Lloyd George's promise to Mrs. Pankhurst should be made clear. A minimum wage for women munition workers was to be enforced, he said, in controlled establishments. As yet we have failed to discover an establishment sufficiently controlled to make the munition authorities care to interfere with wages.

Further, we want public opinion to make clear to Mr. Lloyd George what an equitable minimum wage would be. If, as would be quite natural, he followed existing standards, a grave injustice would be done. From the large number of instances of the wages paid to women munition workers throughout the country which have been given to the Manchester and District Women's War Interests Committee it is seen that while bad employers pay 10s. to 12s. for this work the average decent employer pays 15s. a week on time rates, and on piecework wages oscillate between 15s. and £1. With food at its present price it is not possible for women to maintain the physical efficiency necessary for using heavy machinery on 15s. a week, especially when travelling expenses and insurance have to be deducted from this.

It must not be forgotten that a far larger proportion of women are and will be self-supporting as a result of this war. The large number of women wage-earners wholly or partly maintaining dependents, proved by the figures given by the Fabian Women's Group, before the war will be greatly increased now, for Government allowances, except in the case of the very poor, do not come near the wages the men were receiving before they left home.

All these considerations are operating in every trade where women are working at present. It is urgently necessary, therefore, that the standard wage in an industry like the manufacture of munitions, which is to some extent centralised and controlled, should be such as to recognise the fact that a woman should be able to live on her week's wage. This might help to pull up the disgracefully low level of women's wages, which in many cases fall below subsistence point.

It is for this reason that the Manchester and District Women's War Interests Committee is urging on Mr. Lloyd George that a minimum wage of £1 per week of 48 hours, or, to be more accurate, a minimum time rate of 5d. an hour, with time and a quarter for overtime, should be established for all women in factories doing Government war work.—Yours, &c.,

ELLEN C. WILKINSON, Secretary Manchester and District Women's War Interests Committee.

66, Barton Arcade, Manchester August 3.

The Daily Dispatch – 7.2.16

WOMEN ON WAR WORK.

The Question of Discharges When Peace Comes.

At a conference convened on Saturday by he Manchester and District Women's War Interests Committee it was suggested that women now employed in munition factories, and who will be thrown out of employment at the end of the war, should be compensated.

The gathering was attended by trade union representatives and delegates from suffrage societies, and it was ultimately agreed to circulate the proposals that were discussed among the bodies represented at the meeting, and again consider them a month hence, with a view to their submission to the Government.

Miss Margaret Ashton, who presided, said that the national service of the women who had taken their men's places at home ought to be recognised, if they were not to have an enormous number of women unemployed after the war.

Mrs. Annot E. Robinson said that in some industries the women had come to stay, and that not only would it be difficult, but almost impossible, to turn them out. The new machinery provided by employers would stay, and the reorganisation would be permanent.

Because of that a sex war would be set up at the conclusion of peace. The one thing that must be obviated was the retention of women in industry as cheap labour. (Hear, hear.) That was the biggest danger before them.

One of the priposals discussed by the gathering was that women displaced at the end of the war should receive, through trades unions, adequate out-of-work benefit until able to find other work, or for a period agreed upon, and that the Government should subsidise the trades unions to enable them to meet the increased demands on their unemployment funds.

Another suggestion to which the meeting gave assent was that no women should be retained on work done by men before the war at less than a wage of £1 per week of 48 hours, and where doing work equal to that performed by men, the recognised trade union rate of wages should be paid.

The conference also passed a resolution protesting against the action of a Salford firm in allowing a woman worker to be employed 61 hours for 13s. 1d. The resolution, which refers to a case heard before the Manchester Munitions Tribunal on Thursday, was ordered to be sent to the Minister of Munitions.

Bristol Times

26/2/16

The notice which appears under the heading "The Woman Worker in Bristol" in another column of to-day's issue is one to which earnest attention is invited. Not only is every religious denomination represented, but many well-known civic names are to be found amongst those helping the project. Upon the committee various social organisations are represented including the National Union of Women Workers, the Women's Labour League, the Bristol Civic League, and others. Suitable premises have been secured in Portland Square, and it is hoped that this most useful and needed enterprise will secure the help it deserves.

Western Press (Bristol)

26/2/16

THE WOMAN WORKER IN BRISTOL.

The notice which appears under this heading in another column of to-day's issue is one to which earnest attention may be invited. Not only is every religious denomination represented, but many well-known civic names are to be found amongst those helping the project. Upon the Committee, varied social organisations are represented, including the National Union of Women Workers, the Women's Labour League, the Bristol Civic League, and others. We are informed that suitable and commodious premises have been secured in Portland Square, and this most useful and needed enterprise should secure the help it deserves.

The Common Cause
680/7

Women's War Interests.

WORK OF THE MANCHESTER AND DISTRICT COMMITTEE.

We have been asked to publish, in THE COMMON CAUSE, accounts of the work of Women's Interests Committees, for the benefit of Societies which are wishing to promote such committees in their own districts. The following account of the work of the Manchester Committee is taken from their pamphlet, recently issued, on "Women in the Labour Market During the War."*

The Committee was formed in May, 1915, chiefly with a view to investigating and making public the conditions of women employed in munition factories, but as new occupations were opened to women as a direct result of the war, the scope of the Committee was extended. Its work has chiefly fallen into three branches: (1) Investigation; (2) the holding of conferences and consultations; and (3) the making of direct representations to Government departments and local committees.

INVESTIGATION.

A thorough investigation was made into the conditions of women's war work in the Manchester district. Inquiry forms were sent to secretaries of trade unions and other labour organisations, while information was secured from employers by correspondence and personal interviews. In this way reports were obtained from a large number of firms engaged in munition work. A careful collection of Press cuttings was started at the outset, and has been continued ever since.

CONFERENCES.

The first conference was held on June 12th, and the following proposals were put forward by the Women's Interests Committee as a suggested basis for a publicity campaign :—

WAGES.—That a guaranteed minimum of £1 per week of forty-eight hours should be paid to every adult woman worker (over eighteen years) employed on munitions. On piecework the rates should be such as to give a guaranteed minimum of £1 per week.

All women employed on night work or overtime should be paid at the rate of time and a quarter.

HOURS.—That a three-shift system of eight hours is preferable to continuous overtime for women. No woman should be employed on night work for more than two weeks out of six.

CONDITIONS.—That ample canteen provision should be provided, and, where night work is in operation, this should be obligatory.

At the second Conference, held on October 23rd, representatives of various branches of the Amalgamated Society of Engineers and of the Cotton Operatives Association were present, and the question of the transference of women from textile to munition factories was considered.

The third Conference, on December 18th, was summoned to make more widely known the existing conditions of women's labour on munition work, and to arrange joint action in securing "a minimum wage of £1 per week of forty-eight hours for all women engaged in the manufacture of war material, and the extension of the definition of 'munition workers' to cover all persons employed in the production of war material." Representatives were present from twelve trade and labour councils, thirty trade unions, five branches of the I.L.P., nine branches of the Women's Labour League, eleven branches of the Women's Co-operative Guilds, four Suffrage societies, and a number of other women's organisations, the Manchester and District Labour Party, and the Rochdale Labour Party. These unanimously endorsed the policy of the Women's War Interests Committee, and promised full support.

In August, a national conference of the united metal trades was held in York, when the proposals of the Manchester Women's War Interests Committee were adopted as representing the minimum conditions under which the men trade unionists ought to sanction the entrance of women's labour into the production of munitions. This was an event of great importance. It was the first occasion on which a representative group of men trade unionists had shown signs of recognising the serious menace to their own position by allowing women in considerable numbers to undertake work usually done by themselves, and at wages far below their own standard.

DEPUTATIONS.

As a result, a joint deputation from the metal trades, the National Federation of Women Workers, and the Manchester Women's War Interests Committee met Dr. Addison and Mr. Beveridge, as representing the Ministry of Munitions, and placed before them the proposals adopted at the York Conference. Dr. Addison agreed that women should not be under-paid, and that the danger of depressing men's wages should be carefully guarded against.

On December 23rd Dr. Addison met a further deputation, at which he agreed that it was important to have women properly represented on committees which controlled the working conditions, and also that he was prepared to consider the appointment of women to such committees, "more especially to wage tribunals, on the ground of their personal knowledge of women's wages and conditions of labour."

The persistent presentation of the Committee's proposals, concludes the Report, has certainly influenced the Government's recommendations to employers in controlled establishments, and the constant presentation of facts showing that the recommendations as to wages are being ignored, has assisted in inducing the Government to take power in the amended Munitions Bill to regulate wages and conditions of labour for women in controlled establishments, and the clear case which has been made out for more direct representation of the women workers in the Manchester area has led the Ministry of Munitions to consider this demand favourably.

The Newcastle Chronicle
8/31/16

LOCAL GOSSIP

BY ELFIN

WOMEN WORKERS' INTERESTS.

Women in the labour movement have not been inactive since the war began in looking after the interests of their sisters who have engaged in occupations hitherto filled by the male sex. Following upon examples in Manchester and other large industrial centres, Newcastle has now its Women's War Interests Committee, and one of its principal objects is to create public opinion on the various new problems which have arisen out of the great conflict, particularly as they relate to the economic position of the women workers. Probably the trade unions may deem it their function to deal with the organisation of the new mass of female labour which has appeared in all directions, but there is doubtless a good deal to be done that only a Women's Committee can do.

THE FUTURE OF THE RACE.

New openings for women have presented themselves in many trades as the young men have been steadily drawn to the colours, and the way females have adapted themselves to strange occupations has been wonderful, but some of the new work to which they have applied themselves is a severe test of their health and physical endurance, and it is necessary that we should see to it that the women do not overwork themselves in their eagerness to help the national cause. We must spare a serious thought for motherhood and the future of the race.

PATIENCE IN TRAINING.

Men are usually impatient in teaching young women work of which they have hitherto had no experience, but I believe it is very generally recognised that once a girl has mastered her task she becomes a real asset to her employer. When a woman knows her job she invariably works at it with all her power. I heard a business man say yesterday that if patience and consideration were exercised in the training of a female to do the work of a man the return in honest labour was assured. He gave me instances of it in his own business and his testimony was good to listen to after the grumblings I have heard by irritable men when they have had to substitute girls for work previously done by young fellows now in khaki.

NEW PROBLEMS.

At the outset the majority of the men's trade unions were hostile to the intervention of women, but they have since come round to the point of view that it were better to admit women to their societies than to refuse to work with them. The railway workers, for example, have altered the title of their union so that it may include women. Many labour and social problems have arisen by the entrance of so many women workers in the different trades, and adjustments after the war will call for careful consideration. The withdrawal of a large part of male labour from productive industry has opened the door to an influx of women's labour into hitherto barred trades, and when we look all round the new position of women we can easily understand how much there is to occupy the attention of an organisation such as the Women's War Interests Committee.

Electrical Times
23. 3. 16.

Women Workers After the War.

Are the women to continue in the factories when we've wound up the Watch on the Rhine, or are they not? At the Manchester conference of the Women's War Interests' Committee, the secretary of a certain engineers' society said that the engineers had not agreed that women workers should be retained after the war at all. Have the various engineers' societies convinced themselves that they occupy a dominant position, or that this position will improve when some millions of artisans are released from the ranks?

Another male speaker "wanted the engineers to recognise that the women were in the shops for ever." He added that the engineers' delegates were trying to create a sex war. Personally we should accuse them of nothing but supreme selfishness, without regard to sex or anything else. Certain fitters and boilermakers of various denominations have established a record in this war for truculent loutishness. When nearly every other class of tradesman has retained his self-respect and shown himself at heart a Briton, the indecent arrogance of irreconcilables amongst the fitters, who, like the Welsh miners, deemed that they had the country in a cleft stick, has engendered a disgust that will not easily be forgotten. Possibly some of the underpaid workers may appeal with success for public sympathy after the war; the fitters, we feel sure, would meet with nothing but failure and disappointment.

Fortunately, there are very many decent fellows amongst them, and in any case we hope that employers will take the long view, and be ready to pay American wages for output on an American scale. It is regrettable that some of the women are underpaid; they are certainly entitled to the same scale as the men whom they displace. But if manufacturers subscribe to these improvements in the fitter's status, it will certainly not be in exchange for the rule of sullen hostility, "ca' canny," and general guerilla warfare against the productive capacity of our works.

Sheffield Independent 8-5-16.

WOMEN'S WAGES.

A Demand for Trade Union Rates.

SHEFFIELD CONFERENCE.

No woman shall work in any trade at less than the recognised trade union or district rate of wages, when employed on work hitherto done by men. Where a recognised trade union or district rate does not exist, the wages should not be less than £1 for a week of 48 hours.

This resolution was passed with practical unanimity at a conference of workers held at Sheffield on Saturday. The conference, convened by the Sheffield and District Women Workers' Organising and Interests Committee, was attended by representatives of over 70 trade councils, trade unions, women's organisations and similar bodies in Sheffield and district, and Mrs. H. A. L. Fisher, wife of the Vice-Chancellor of the University, presided.

Mrs. Fisher said we were in rapidly changing times, and one of the things that had changed the most had been the position of women. It was, therefore, tremendously important for them to have a short time to stop and think and guard against some of the dangers of rapid change. Women of all classes and occupations had flung themselves into all kinds of work and taken the places of men doing other work. In fact they had behaved rather well, but in their patriotism and eagerness to help it was possible that certain dangers might arise. One of those dangers was that of low wages. Many women were not trained to organise, did not realise the need of it, and all too often were willing to take wages which they had no business to take.

After the War.

Another danger that had to be faced had reference to the future of the women now in industry. Some people said that when the war was over the women would go back to their previous conditions of life, but that was not true. Even before the war a very large number of women had to earn their living, and after the war the number would be much greater. For a long time there had not been enough men to help the women at home, and after the war there would be still fewer. She was not altogether sorry for that, for in the past many girls had not been brought up to do a fair share of the world's work, and that was going to be changed. A large number of women were never going back to half employment.

But after the war there would be a great turmoil, and unless steps were taken beforehand there would be much suffering. The men should do their best to teach the women to organise. It was worth their while to do it, because otherwise the women would become a real danger to them. There was no question of sex antagonism in this matter, for men and women were meant to work together, and we were finding that out in this war. Women did not want to undo the work men had done, but to stand by them and work with them as comrades.

Duty of the Unions.

Mrs. Annot Robinson, of Manchester, in moving the resolution, said that in the past it had always been the idea that women should be paid less than men. At the very commencement of the war those trades dominated by strong unions ought to have opened their ranks and taken in the women along with the men. In that way they would have secured complete control of the conditions under which the women worked, and they could have insisted upon equal pay for equal work. The resolution asked only for 5d. an hour, which was little enough, but the other day she found women working in a shop for 2½d. an hour, and yet the men did not come out on strike to improve their pay. When the women had got 5d. they must go for more.

Mrs. E. Barton (Sheffield) seconded.

Mr. A. E. Chandler said the trade unions should take the women in, and after the war, instead of turning them out, should see that surplus labour was used to reduce the number of hours of work, so that the workers had sufficient leisure.

Mr. Thraves, of the Tramway Workers' Union, said his trade had been nearly swamped by the women, and they had found no difficulty in getting them into the union. They would come in, but the difficulty was to keep them in, because if Sheffield Daily Telegraph 8-5-16.

WOMEN WORKERS CONFER.

A conference organised by the Sheffield and District Women Workers' Organising and Interests Committee was held in the Cambridge Hall, Sheffield, on Saturday afternoon. There were present representatives of seventy-seven different trade unions and other societies in Sheffield and the surrounding district. The object was to do something to make the Government recognise its responsibility to the displaced women war workers.

Mrs. H. A. L. Fisher, who presided, drew attention first to the rapid trend of events, and one of the things which was changing most was the position of women. On the whole, women had behaved rather well; but in their patriotism and eagerness to do the best they could they had fallen into dangers.

First was the very real danger of the question of wages, which was not a question of any class or profession, but was one of the whole world of earning. Many of the women now working were not trained to organise: they did not realise the need of it, and all too often were prepared to take wages or salaries which were much too low. A great many did not realise that they were doing any harm to others, while many were too modest, and did not realise their value.

Even more important was the future of these women. A great many said placidly, "Oh, they will go back." But many would not be able to go back. Before the war there were many who could not earn their livings by keeping house and bringing up children, and after the war there would be still more in that position. They could not live in a fool's paradise; there would not be sufficient homes for them.

She was not sorry, said Mrs. Fisher, for this. A great many were experiencing independence for the first time, and doing an honest day's work; but, she feared, not always for an honest day's pay. There would be a great turmoil after the war, and unless they took pains before the end of the war, she feared there would be a great deal of preventable suffering. If this horrible struggle were going to open up a new world, men and women must learn to work together, and there must be no sex antagonism. They must realise they were not made to work apart, but to work together. Remember, said Mrs. Fisher, that the women who are working now are the mothers of the race to come, and therefore the lives of the women are even more important than the lives of the men.

The first resolution: "No woman shall work in any trade at less than the recognised trade union or district rate of wages, when employed on work hitherto done by men. Where a recognised trade union or district rate does not exist, the wages should not be less than £1 for a week of 48 hours," was proposed by Mrs. Arnot Robinson, of Manchester. She thought that owing to the two measures of conscription this conference had come at the most opportune moment. Women had been admitted to the trades without any preparation as to the standards of labour, and the great mistake had been that women had not been admitted to the trades unions.

This was seconded by Mrs. Barton, and after considerable discussion was carried with only one dissentient.

The second resolution, proposed by Mrs. Pryce Jones (Sheffield), and seconded by Mrs. Oldham (Rotherham) was to the effect that any woman displaced by the cessation of the war, or war orders, should receive adequate out-of-work benefit, either till she gets work or for a period to be agreed upon; that such benefit should be payable through trade unions, and urged the Government to make an adequate subsidy to the trade unions for this purpose.

This was opposed by Councillor Alfred Short on the grounds that it provided an avenue by which the Government could avoid its obligations to the women in the country, the men in the trenches, and all their dependents. Mr. A. E. Chandler thought it was a matter for the trade unions to find a scheme to protect the women who would be thrown out of work at the close of the war. The resolution was supported by Mrs. Barton, because it was better to ask for something directly and then ask for more. She agreed with Councillor Short that the matter ought to be one entirely for the Government. The resolution was lost, and it was stated that the matter would be reconsidered and a new resolution drafted.

of work and taken the [illegible] doing other work. In fact they had behaved rather well, but in their patriotism and eagerness to help it was possible that certain dangers might arise. One of those dangers was that of low wages. Many women were not trained to organise, did not realise the need of it, and all too often were willing to take wages which they had no business to take.

After the War.

Another danger that had to be faced had reference to the future of the women now in industry. Some people said that when the war was over the women would go back to their previous conditions of life, but that was not true. Even before the war a very large number of women had to earn their living, and after the war the number would be much greater. For a long time there had not been enough men to help the women at home, and after the war there would be still fewer. She was not altogether sorry for that, for in the past many girls had not been brought up to do a fair share of the world's work, and that was going to be changed. A large number of women were never going back to half employment.

But after the war there would be a great turmoil, and unless steps were taken beforehand there would be much suffering. The men should do their best to teach the women to organise. It was worth their while to do it, because otherwise the women would become a real danger to them. There was no question of sex antagonism in this matter, for men and women were meant to work together, and we were finding that out in this war. Women did not want to undo the work men had done, but to stand by them and work with them as comrades.

Duty of the Unions.

Mrs. Annot Robinson, of Manchester, in moving the resolution, said that in the past it had always been the idea that women should be paid less than men. At the very commencement of the war those trades dominated by strong unions ought to have opened their ranks and taken in the women along with the men. In that way they would have secured complete control of the conditions under which the women worked, and they could have insisted upon equal pay for equal work. The resolution asked only for 5d. an hour, which was little enough, but the other day she found women working in a shop for 2½d. an hour, and yet the men did not come out on strike to improve their pay. When the women had got 5d. they must go for more.

Mrs. E. Barton (Sheffield) seconded.

Mr. A. E. Chandler said the trade unions should take the women in, and after the war, instead of turning them out, should see that surplus labour was used to reduce the number of hours of work, so that the workers had sufficient leisure.

Mr. Thraves, of the Tramway Workers' Union, said his trade had been nearly swamped by the women, and they had found no difficulty in getting them into the union. They would come in, but the difficulty was to keep them in, because if they did not get what they wanted quickly they were out again soon. (Laughter.)

Position of the A.S.E.

A representative of the A.S.E., replying to several speakers who had adversely criticised the society because of its refusal to admit women, said that the society insisted on the women being paid the same as men. If the present difficulties had occurred in peace time the men would have come out on strike to compel the employers to pay the women proper wages, and it was because some of them did so on the Clyde that they were deported.

The resolution was carried with one dissentient.

Mr. Pryce Jones, of Sheffield, moved:

"That any woman displaced by the cessation of the war, or war orders, should receive adequate out-of-work benefit, either till she gets work, or for a period to be agreed upon.

"That such benefit should be payable through trade unions.

"We therefore urge the Government to make an adequate subsidy to the trade unions for this purpose."

Dealing with the third point the mover said this was a national problem. It was for the sake of the nation that the women had gone into industry, and as the Government could raise enormous sums for the war it could also raise money for repairing the ravages of war.

Mr. Oldham, of Rotherham, seconded.

Councillor A. Short strongly opposed the resolution, which he argued would enable the Government to forego its obligations to the people. We must not deal with the poverty arising out of the war, he said, by granting a miserable out-of-work allowance for a given period. If the nation were going to acknowledge the sacrifices made by the workers, the Government must provide legitimate employment at a proper wage.

The resolution was also opposed by Mr. Chandler and others, and defeated; and Mrs. Fisher announced that the matter would be reconsidered, and a fresh resolution drafted.

apart, but to work together. Remember, said Mrs. Fisher, that the women who are working now are the mothers of the race to come, and therefore the lives of the women are even more important than the lives of the men.

The first resolution: "No woman shall work in any trade at less than the recognised trade union or district rate of wages, when employed on work hitherto done by men. Where a recognised trade union or district rate does not exist, the wages should not be less than £1 for a week of 48 hours," was proposed by Mrs. Annot Robinson, of Manchester. She thought that owing to the two measures of conscription this conference had come at the most opportune moment. Women had been admitted to the trades without any preparation as to the standards of labour, and the great mistake had been that women had not been admitted to the trades unions.

This was seconded by Mrs. Barton, and after considerable discussion was carried with only one dissentient.

The second resolution, proposed by Mrs. Pryce Jones (Sheffield), and seconded by Mrs. Oldham (Rotherham) was to the effect that any woman displaced by the cessation of the war, or war orders, should receive adequate out-of-work benefit, either till she gets work or for a period to be agreed upon; that such benefit should be payable through trade unions, and urged the Government to make an adequate subsidy to the trade unions for this purpose.

This was opposed by Councillor Alfred Short on the grounds that it provided an avenue by which the Government could avoid its obligations to the women in the country, the men in the trenches, and all their dependents. Mr. A. E. Chandler thought it was a matter for the trade unions to find a scheme to protect the women who would be thrown out of work at the close of the war. The resolution was supported by Mrs. Barton, because it was better to ask for something directly and then ask for more. She agreed with Councillor Short that the matter ought to be one entirely for the Government. The resolution was lost, and it was stated that the matter would be reconsidered and a new resolution drafted.

Manchester Guardian
14/6/16

WOMEN WORKERS.

TRADE UNIONS AND THE NEW OCCUPATIONS.

A meeting of the Manchester and District Women's Interest Committee was held on Saturday to discuss the action to be taken by men's trade unions in relation to the women workers who are now doing work which before the war was done by men.

Mr. W. Mellor said the list of new occupations by women included those of tramway conductors, street sweepers, railway porters, carriage cleaners, booking office clerks, messenger girls, telegraph girls, grocery assistants, clerks in Government and insurance offices, gardeners, commissionaires, lift attendants, motor-van drivers, taxi-drivers, and police. A number of women were also engaged in armament works and aircraft factories. He suggested as means for dealing with the problem that the trade unions which did not now admit women should admit them; that the trade unions should be notified by firms of every emergency worker taken on; that women be paid at the same time rate for the same jobs as men; and that women be admitted into each industry on the distinct understanding that they would have to be the first to go when the men came back from the war.

Mrs. Annot Robinson said she did not think it would be fair nor practicable to ask women to give up all their work and give place to men at the end of the war.

Daily Dispatch
Oct 10, 1916

WOMEN AND TRADE UNIONS.

The Need for Organisation.

The question of industrial and social reconstruction after the war was considered at the first annual meeting of the Manchester, Salford, and District Women's War Interests Committee last night.

Mr. Hallsworth, of the National Union of Co-operative Employes, said that one of the industrial difficulties would be to create in women workers a desire for better industrial conditions. In Manchester today there were tens of thousands of women and girls who did not know what organisation meant. It would only be by the force of trade union organisation, with men and women banded together, neither undercutting the other, that they would break down that attitude of mind, already made manifest, which favoured a return to the worst days before the industrial revolution of the last century.

Mr. A. A. Purcell (the chairman) said that so far from there being any improvement in the spirit between masters and men there was likely to be more hostility. He agreed that it was essential that men and women workers should be brought into the same trade union.

Mr. A. E. Zimmern said that in spite of the increase in food prices the standard of living of many sections of the community had been raised, and it was inconceivable that the working classes would acquiesce in the reintroduction of the old bad state of things.

Manchester Guardian.
14.10.16

~~064~~ 680
680/1

WOMEN WORKERS IN MANCHESTER.

To the Editor of the Manchester Guardian.

Sir,—A recent letter from Dr. Barbara Tchaykovsky raises a matter of very great importance to thousands of women workers in Manchester and district. I cannot say that the actual rates paid to machinists in most Manchester factories range so low as those quoted by Miss Tchaykovsky. The real problems here are more complex and more difficult. By selecting a rate paid for common work, or, worse still, for sale goods, a wage will be obtained of 10s. and 11s. for a week of fifty hours; with the cost of living as it is at present this is not merely a low wage, but is gross sweating. On the other hand, by taking the best rates for the best goods a wage is obtained of 25s. or 30s. a week. It is obviously unfair to the women to assume that their real wages are always on the top scale; it is equally unfair to the employers to assume that the women are always on common work and their wages represented by the bottom scale. There are in Manchester at least a dozen different machinist trades, and their hours, rates, and conditions vary one from another; but taking the average a woman with a week of mixed work, common and high grade, earns about a pound. This is not good, but it is certainly not sweating.

Unfortunately, this does not settle the matter. There are still very real difficulties which render the rate of pay a very poor index of the actual wages earned by the women. All the branches of the trade are seasonal, and during the slack periods the women do not earn anything approaching a living wage. Further, by the custom of the trades the women are expected to stand by their machines and wait for the work to come in, which effectively prevents them from seeking work elsewhere. A woman may in this way spend a whole week in the shop and earn only two days' wages. In some branches of the trade, and more especially in the blouse-making, the work cannot even be called seasonal. It is merely irregular, the workers not knowing from week to week whether they will be on full time or "playing." Further, in some branches of the trade the normal hours worked are very much too long. In one firm, to my knowledge, the women are employed from eight till one and from two till seven—that is, two stretches of five hours. No tea interval is allowed, and any attempt to take one is rigidly suppressed. The evidence taken by the Health of Munition Workers Committee has made it clear beyond controversy that such continuous labour is damaging to the health of the workers, and at the same time is not even productive for the particular firm.

Here, then, are two very real defects in the trade which urgently need removing. As the various sections have different seasons, if each employer did not so jealously safeguard his own reserve of labour, it ought to be possible by the co-operation of the Employment Exchanges to secure for each worker a much larger proportion of full time and a correspondingly regular wage. Further, it is a crime not only against the women themselves but against the whole community for any firm to employ workers for two stretches of five hours per day, and there should be no hesitation in stopping it.—Yours, &c.,

GEO. K. GRIERSON, Chairman Manchester Women's War Interests Committee.

Manchester University Settlement and Art Museum, Ancoats Hall, Manchester.

Manchester Despatch
20.2.17

WAR STRICKEN WOMEN.

Needle Workers' Pitiable Plight.

One of the sections of women workers in Manchester who are being hardest hit by the war are those engaged in the sewing trades.

In these trades, according to Mrs. Annot Robinson, one of the joint secretaries of the Women's War Interests Committee, there is a great amount of surplus labour, with the result, more particularly when trade is slack, that numbers of them hang about factories whole days at a time in the hope of getting a little work.

"Two or three days' earnings," remarked Mrs. Robinson, "are very often the only outcome of all this waiting. With few exceptions they have got no war bonus," she added, "so that their plight in these days of high food prices is extremely pitiable."

She pointed out that the sewing women are practically unorganised. A movement has been started with the object of bringing this and other classes of women into various trade unions, and to give it a send-off a public demonstration has been arranged for next week.

680

680/12

Manchester Evening News

IN THE PLACE OF MEN.

Manchester's Army of Women War Workers.

"A Humanising Influence in Banks."

Can women adequately fill the place of men in industry and commerce?

In view of the new demands of the army, this question is again being widely discussed, and interesting answers to it have been given to an "Evening News" interviewer by Manchester employers and others qualified to speak on the subject.

The women war workers of Manchester are playing many parts for which in times of peace many people would have refused to acknowledge their fitness.

They are acquitting themselves well as Munition makers,

Tram conductors,
Railway servants,
Clerks in post offices, banks, and commercial establishments,
Postwomen,
Window cleaners,
Lift attendants, and in various other spheres of labour. They are even seen driving commercial motor-vans.

On every side their work has won admiration. Their industry, adaptability, and patriotism are universally commended, but it is also agreed that until a new race of Amazons appears men will remain indispensable for many kinds of work.

Post Office officials speak highly of the women undertaking what are still comparatively novel tasks; bank managers and business men praise their new lady clerks; the 10,000 feminine munition makers, have surprised their early critics by the skill they have displayed; and the other fair ones who are doing men's work "for the period of the war" are giving little cause for fault-finding.

It has been said that in one large office experience has shown that three women are required to do the work of one man, but the author of this statement—a man—admits that he will probably have to revise it before long, "when the women have had more training."

MUSCLE AND BRAIN.

Speaking of feminine war work generally, Mrs. Annot Robinson, of the Manchester and Salford Women's War Interests Committee, said: "Where substitution and reorganisation have taken place, women are doing the work they have undertaken extremely well.

"Of course, there is some work—in certain branches of agriculture, for instance—which women cannot do as well as men. Even the carriage cleaners employed by the railway companies are not doing all that was done by the men they have replaced. They do not work on the roofs or underneath the trains.

Where it is not so much a question of muscle but of ability, especially in organisation, women are better than men.

"It has also been proved that they are ready to over-exert themselves, and this is a very serious matter because of the breakdown which follows the strain of overwork."

Like the members of the once maligned "weaker sex" who now wear the uniform of railway servants, the tramwaywomen have won the hearts of the public.

NOTHING BUT PRAISE.

When Mr. J. M. M'Elroy, the general manager of the Corporation tramways, was interviewed on the experience of the Tramway Department in the employment of women he said: "We have always employed a large number of women clerks in the department. Since the outbreak of war the number has been increased owing to enlistments among the men, and we have been very well satisfied with the result.

"On the tramcars we now have about 250 women, and we are appointing others to fill the places of the men called up under the group system. We are very well pleased with the way in which these women are doing their work.

"We take a great deal of pains in appointing them, being careful to see that we get the right class, and they carry out their duties exceedingly well. Tramway passengers are evidently well pleased with them, for we get nothing but praise of them from the public, and the public extend every consideration to them."

MANCHESTER LEADS THE WAY.

In the great business houses of the city—as in the mills and workshops—women are now performing many tasks which before the war were exclusively carried out by men.

An army of them has occupied positions vacated by those who have laid down the pen to shoulder the rifle.

So many young women and girls have taken up clerical work in Manchester since the exodus of the men began that a club is being organised for them.

The Manchester Education Committee was feminine munition makers have [illegible] their early critics by the skill they have displayed; and the other fair ones who are doing men's work "for the period of the war" are giving little cause for fault-finding.

It has been said that in one large office experience has shown that three women are required to do the work of one man, but the author of this statement—a man—admits that he will probably have to revise it before long, "when the women have had more training."

MUSCLE AND BRAIN.

Speaking of feminine war work generally, Mrs. Annot Robinson, of the Manchester and Salford Women's War Interests Committee, said: "Where substitution and reorganisation have taken place, women are doing the work they have undertaken extremely well.

"Of course, there is some work—in certain branches of agriculture, for instance—which women cannot do as well as men. Even the carriage cleaners employed by the railway companies are not doing all that was done by the men they have replaced. They do not work on the roofs or underneath the trains.

Where it is not so much a question of muscle but of ability, especially in organisation, women are better than men.

"It has also been proved that they are ready to over-exert themselves, and this is a very serious matter because of the breakdown which follows the strain of overwork."

Like the members of the once maligned "weaker sex" who now wear the uniform of railway servants, the tramwaywomen have won the hearts of the public.

NOTHING BUT PRAISE.

When Mr. J. M. M'Elroy, the general manager of the Corporation tramways, was interviewed on the experience of the Tramway Department in the employment of women he said: "We have always employed a large number of women clerks in the department. Since the outbreak of war the number has been increased owing to enlistments among the men, and we have been very well satisfied with the result.

"On the tramcars we now have about 250 women, and we are appointing others to fill the places of the men called up under the group system. We are very well pleased with the way in which these women are doing their work.

"We take a great deal of pains in appointing them, being careful to see that we get the right class, and they carry out their duties exceedingly well. Tramway passengers are evidently well pleased with them, for we get nothing but praise of them from the public, and the public extend every consideration to them."

MANCHESTER LEADS THE WAY.

In the great business houses of the city—as in the mills and workshops—women are now performing many tasks which before the war were exclusively carried out by men.

An army of them has occupied positions vacated by those who have laid down the pen to shoulder the rifle.

So many young women and girls have taken up clerical work in Manchester since the exodus of the men began that a club is being organised for them.

The Manchester Education Committee was the first authority in the kingdom to establish a scheme for training recruits' wives and other women to take positions in business establishments. Many of those who took advantage of the first course of instruction are now in municipal offices, banks, home trade and shipping houses, and in insurance offices.

A HUMANISING INFLUENCE.

The manager of one well-known bank told our representative to-day that he had no complaint whatever to make regarding the female clerks who have now been employed by him for a considerable time.

"The employment of women here," he said, "has been a most successful experiment. They have adapted themselves very readily to our conditions, and we have found them quite as good as the men whose places they are filling.

In some respects they are better than men. They are more industrious and more careful.

"I have also noticed that they have had a civilising or humanising influence on the crusted old fogies who are to be found among our staff as in any other bank. We like their company and appreciate their work, and I believe they have come to stay.

"Even after the war we shall want to retain their services, not only because many of the men who have gone will refuse to return to the old life, but also because it will pay us to continue to employ members of that sex whose business capacity we once despised."

"USEFUL AS A STOP-GAP."

Another bank manager was less enthusiastic, though he did not withhold a limited measure of commendation for the war-time additions to his staff.

He refused to accept the suggestion that women bank clerks will become a permanent "institution!" While they are very useful in many ways," he remarked, "one cannot say that they have 'adequately' taken the place of men, but for the purpose of a stop-gap we have found them very satisfactory, though, of course, like men, they are 'mixed.'

"When a man begins a career in a bank he knows that his whole life depends upon the work which he does. The women have not the same incentive to industry. Though they learn quickly and carry out very well the more or less mechanical tasks allotted to them they do not take themselves and their occupation so seriously as men are compelled to do. There are exceptions, but the average woman has no intention of spending her life here—and I do not blame her."

Textile Mercury

WOMEN'S WORK IN SPINNING ROOMS

A recent report of the Women's War Interests Committee (Manchester and Salford district) deals with the changes that have taken place in regard to the substitution of female for male labour in the cotton trade. Some of the branches of the Amalgamated Association of Operative Cotton Spinners still refuse to employ female piecers. At Preston and Stockport, the spinners' trade unions decline to accept women in any capacity in the mule spinning room. Oldham, as previously pointed [illegible], gave way on the question of employing females as piecers, but not as minders or joint-minders, and in Ashton and Stalybridge they are allowed to enter any branch of spinning. In all cases where women are employed they are paid the same rates as were disbursed to the males they replace. Cotton spinning is one of the few industries in which this condition of equality has been established, but, of course, the system has practically always obtained in the weaving branch.

The report states truly that the opposition to women is based on the contention of the unsuitability of the work. There is also an objection on moral and sentimental grounds, considering the nature of the work, to men and women working together. Opinions naturally vary on this matter. A Stalybridge official expressed the view that on account of the arduous character of the employment and condition of the atmosphere in the rooms, the life is not suitable for women, but he thinks there is no foundation for the objection from a moral point of view. He also argued that opposition for sanitary and sentimental reasons ought to be waived for the period of the war. This would be the attitude of many others [illegible] gaged in the trade. The report alluded to states that the hot, damp atmosphere of the spinning rooms is probably injurious to very young girls, and in special cases to women, but it is doubtful whether it is more harmful to the ordinary adult woman than to young boys. Suitable dressing-rooms should be insisted [illegible] and a revision of working clothing for men and women would be necessary. Women's clothing would be too hot, and would be extremely dangerous for spinners and piecers among the spinning machinery, but it does not seem impossible that something suitable should be devised. An Oldham man declared that [illegible] of the spinners would allow their own daughters to take up the work.

A unanimous opinion could not be obtained on any of the points emphasised in the statement we have quoted. Men's clothing worn in the spinning rooms could hardly be improved, but it is quite true that the working garments of the women are not by any means satisfactory: they could be, however, improved if a serious attempt were made. In ordinary times, the conduct and language of some (one is glad not to say all) of the men have anything but a refining influence, and in some cases it might be hopeless to induce restraint, but a more sympathetic attitude might generally be cultivated on patriotic if on no other grounds, if the matter were properly taken in hand. With regard to [illegible], the women do not fare badly. The wages for the usual branches of girls' and women's duties in the cotton trade are quoted in the War Committee's report as being 18s. to 27s. [illegible] per [illegible] for weavers, ring spinners 18s. to 23s.; card-room hands 20s. to 26s.; under-reelers, doublers, and gassers 16s. to 22s. We believe that some of the women in the branches named obtain higher figures than those quoted.

Concerning the new women workers, the agreement in Oldham provides for the same pay as males in the case of big and little piecers; creelers and piecers on one pair of mules to be arranged between the minder and the firm, but not to exceed those of a big piecer's wage; learners to be paid (for two weeks) 7s. and 5s. by the firm, and 2s. by the operative spinner. Unfortunately, the women have not taken to the work in the spinning rooms quickly enough to fill the vacancies caused by the withdrawal of the men. It is hoped, however, there will not be the same need for them now that most of the piecers, and all operative spinners are placed in the "reserved occupations" list. Besides the spinning branch, women are now entering the dyeing, bleaching, and finishing processes. Several mills in Lancashire (especially in Manchester and Bolton) were largely staffed with female piecers long before the war commenced; they had been mostly employed on fine counts, and probably on shorter mules than those which have been erected during recent years.

Earlier found

Sheffield Daily Telegraph.
9 5 16

THE ARMY OF WOMEN.

A paragraph in yesterday's paper was devoted to an account of a Conference held on behalf of the interests of women workers, that mighty army of volunteers which has come forward in this hour of their country's need. Though the men of the fighting army are well paid, well clothed, and well fed, we hear ugly rumours of under-payment of women in this army of women workers.

In the present war the British Empire has stood before the world for justice and right dealing, and the war will not really finish until at home as well as abroad justice and right-dealing permeates every sphere of activity, economic, social, and political. Such a meeting as that of Saturday, held by the Sheffield and District Women Workers' Organising and Interests Committee, was a bugle call to action.

We can hardly pose as the champion of justice abroad and let the weaker go to the wall at home, and when it comes to a question of employment it is the woman always who is the weaker. Unless we do let fair play, justice, and mercy govern our dealings with the vast army of women workers, both now and after the war, we shall have given colour to the German accusation that the British claim to fair play is only after all a political trump card.

We know that it is not a political trump card. There is inherent in the British national character, as a priceless heritage from our forbears, a sense of justice and honesty, and a capacity for staunch adherence to a right idea once it is recognised as right. One feels convinced, therefore, that when it is realised that the women workers' cause is a cause needing the support of every upright man in the Empire every bit as much as the cause of the outraged country of Belgium, then there will be found no lack of volunteers to forward a bloodless victory for commercial justice and honour among employers of women labour.

The Sheffield Women Workers' Organising and Interests Committee is a committee the success of which every truly patriotic woman should have at heart. As the organising secretary, Miss Hilston, said to us, "By getting better conditions for working women we are preserving the future of the nation, and to do this we must prevent that underpay which results in bad housing and bad feeding." Mrs. H. A. L. Fisher presided at the Conference, at which about two hundred people were present, including representatives from the Co-operative Women's Guild, Women's Adult Schools, Women's Suffrage Societies, Motherhood League, National Union of Women Workers, and the Labour League, and as our readers will have observed a resolution was passed that "No woman should work in any trade at less than the recognised trade union or district rate of wages, when employed on work hitherto done by men." We should like, however, to hear of Mrs. Fisher or someone who has studied this question, speaking on it to a drawing-room meeting, and that women more fortunately placed have recognised their right to know the conditions under which the working women of our country are employed, and to do everything in their power to better these conditions.

Sheffield Daily Telegraph.
22.7.16.

WOMEN'S WAGES.

Sheffield Women's Interests Association,
30, Campo Lane (Room 8), July 21, 1916.

Sir,—The Sheffield and District Women's Interests Association have had under their consideration:—

The Statutory Rules and Orders No. 447, which have just been issued by the Minister of Munitions. These relate to the remuneration of women and girls on munition work of a class not recognised as men's work, and the rates are as follow:—

The time rates for piece workers and premium bonus workers shall be:

18 years and over	4d.	per hour.
17 years and under 18 ...	3½d.	per hour.
16 years and under 17 ...	3d.	per hour.
Under 16 years	2½d.	per hour.

The rates for such women and girls when customarily on time shall be:

18 years and over	4½d.	per hour.
17 years and under 18 ...	4d.	per hour.
16 years and under 17 ...	3½d.	per hour.
Under 16 years	3d.	per hour.

We wish to point out that the rate of 4d. per hour for women of 18 years of age and over is a sweated wage. When the Trades Board was set up previous to the war rates of 3d. and 2½d. an hour were fixed for trades in which sweating had prevailed. Many protests were made against these rates as being far too low, and when accepted they were regarded as giving a subsistence wage to a class of the community that had hitherto been in an absolutely hopeless condition.

The cost of living since the war has increased so rapidly that to-day 6d. is worth no more than 3½d. was previously, so that in fixing a wage of 4d. an hour for this class of munition workers, the Government is definitely registering munition making as a sweated industry for women. It is surely a very serious matter that any class of engineering work should be so degraded.

Clause 3 of this Order gives ½d. per hour extra to women and girls in the danger zone, or to those working on processes which are injurious to health. In our opinion this sum is too paltry to offer to women running such risks as they do in high explosive work and dope varnishing. Much of the work that is done by these women is of a harder character than that which is done by girls who come under the L 2 agreement. Their minimum time rate is fixed at £1. We are of opinion that no less a sum should have been fixed in this later schedule.—Yours faithfully,

MARY HILSTON (Secy.).

Yorkshire Telegraph Star.
22.7.16.

Women's Wages.

Sir,—The Sheffield and District Women's Interests Association have had under their consideration:—

The Statutory Rules and Orders No. 447, which have just been issued by the Minister of Munitions. These relate to the remuneration of women and girls on munition work of a class not recognised as men's work, and the rates are as follow:—

The time rates for piece workers and premium bonus workers shall be:

18 years and over	4d.	per hour.
17 years and under 18 ...	3½d.	per hour.
16 years and under 17 ...	3d.	per hour.
Under 16 years	2½d.	per hour.

The rates for such women and girls when customarily on time shall be:

18 years and over	4½d.	per hour.
17 years and under 18 ...	4d.	per hour.
16 years and under 17 ...	3½d.	per hour.
Under 16 years	3d.	per hour.

We wish to point out that the rate of 4d. per hour for women of 18 years of age and over is a sweated wage. When the Trades Board was set up previous to the war rates of 3d. and 2½d. an hour were fixed for trades in which sweating had prevailed. Many protests were made against these rates as being far too low, and when accepted they were regarded as giving a subsistence wage to a class of the community that had hitherto been in an absolutely hopeless condition.

The cost of living since the war has increased so rapidly that to-day 6d. is worth no more than 3½d. was previously, so that in fixing a wage of 4d. an hour for this class of munition workers, the Government is definitely registering munition making as a sweated industry for women. It is surely a very serious matter that any class of engineering work should be so degraded.

Clause 3 of this Order gives ½d. per hour extra to women and girls in the danger zone, or to those working on processes which are injurious to health. In our opinion this sum is too paltry to offer to women running such risks as they do in high explosive work and dope varnishing. Much of the work that is done by these women is of a harder character than that which is done by girls who come under the L 2 agreement. Their minimum time rate is fixed at £1. We are of opinion that no less a sum should have been fixed in this later schedule.—Yours faithfully,

MARY HILSTON (Secy.).

Sheffield Women's Interests Association,
30, Campo Lane (Room 8), July 21, 1916.

Sheffield Indep: 680c
17.10.16 680a/3

Woman and Labour.

To the Editor "Sheffield Independent."

Sir,—May I inquire what is the precise function of the "Sheffield and District Women's Interests Associations"? A formidable title truly, well calculated to gain or attract the confidence of the unthinking. As actions should be the test instead of titles I advance the above query. What is the status of the ladies who constitute the committee? Are any of them boiler-firing or slinging pig-iron about? or, are they middle-class ladies intent on steering for the vote through industrial channels with the women workers' unions as the vehicle? The whole of the letter of 9 October on "Women and Labour" is an attempt to justify as right and proper the pastime of handling heavy shells—for bonus, as per letter. It also states that there seems to be a lack of "skilful adjustment" between women on shell, bonus, and labourers employed to shove them about. The men labourers have not a patriotic bonus as a bait, therefore being only human they can hardly be expected to indulge in an apoplectic fit of anxiety over avaricious women baby neglecters' bonus. Another extract, "It is true output is diminished by abolition of Sunday work, especially in regard to women." Inference "keep them on Sundays." Now read the title again. Interests! forsooth; here's a choice extract: "The women are new to the industrial world with all it entails as to hours, discipline, physical strain, due to exercise of hitherto little used muscles and so on!" Get on the tramcars in a morning about 7 o'clock to the outer termini and look at potential mothers lying like dead sheep inside and outside the cars. Protect your wives and daughters is or was one of the slogans of this war. We are in a fair state of progress towards muscular women even if they are deteriorating into anæmic and flat-chested specimens. However, this immense reserve army of labour must be utilised not only now, but after to act as or replace the previous menacing army of unemployed men. Women workers must rely on themselves and their class. Now I wait apprehensively for the coming flaying onslaught.—Yours, etc.,

Evelyn Rayner.

5, Hackthorn road, Woodseats.

Sheffield Daily Telegraph
3.10.16

ADULT SUFFRAGE.

FORMATION OF A NATIONAL COUNCIL.

In view of the discussion which has arisen on the franchise question, a National Council has been formed for the purpose of securing the adhesion of societies and individuals supporting adult suffrage. A meeting for this purpose was recently held at the Central Hall, Westminster, when a resolution urging the necessity of the next Parliament being representative of all the men and women of the nation in order that the problems of reconstruction may be dealt with by representatives of the whole people, was passed, and the following were elected an Excutive Committee to conduct the necessary work:—Mr. H. W. Nevinson (chairman), Miss Margaret Bondfield, Mr. Fred Bramley, Miss K. D. Courtney, Miss Llewellyn Davies, Mr. A. G. Gardiner, Mr. George Lansbury, Mrs. Pethick Lawrence, Miss Mary Longman, Miss Mary R. Macarthur, Miss Catherine Marshall, Mr. H. W. Massingham, Mr. J. S. Middleton, Miss A. M. Roydon, Miss Evelyn Sharp, Mrs. H. M. Swanwick, and Mr. Robert Smillie. Offices have been taken by the new Council, which will be known as the National Council for Adult Suffrage, at 27, Chancery Lane, London, E.C

Liverpool Post.
5.10.16

NATIONAL COUNCIL FOR ADULT SUFFRAGE.

A National Council has been formed for the purpose of securing the adhesion of societies and individuals supporting adult suffrage. A meeting for this purpose was recently held in London, when a resolution urging the necessity of the next Parliament being representative of all the men and women of the nation in order that the problems of reconstruction may be dealt with by representatives of the whole people was passed, and the following were elected an Executive Committee to conduct the necessary work:—Mr. H. W. Nevinson (chairman), Miss Margaret Bondfield, Mr. Fred Bramley, Miss K. D. Courtney, Miss Llewelyn Davies, Mr. A. G. Gardiner, Mr. George Lansbury, Mrs. Pethick Lawrence, Miss Mary Longman, Miss Mary R. MacArthur, Miss Catherine Marshall, Mr. H. W. Massingham, Mr. J. S. Middleton, Miss A. M. Roydon, Miss Evelyn Sharp, Mrs. H. M. Swanwick, and Mr. Robert Smillie. Offices have been taken by the new council, which will be known as the National Council for Adult Suffrage, at 27, Chancery-lane, London.

Morning Post.
2.10.16

It has been decided to form a National Council for Adult Suffrage, and steps are being taken to secure the adhesion of Societies and individuals. At a meeting recently held at the Central Hall, Westminster, the following were elected an Executive Committee: Mr. H. W. Nevinson (Chairman), Miss Margaret Bondfield, Mr. Fred Bramley, Miss K. D. Courtney, Miss Llewelyn Davies, Mr. A. G. Gardiner, Mr. George Lansbury, Mrs. Pethick Lawrence, Miss Mary Longman, Miss Mary R. Macarthur, Miss Catherine Marshall, Mr. H. W. Massingham, Mr. J. S. Middleton, Miss A. M. Royden, Miss Evelyn Sharp, Mrs. H. M. Swanwick, and Mr. Robert Smillie. Offices in Chancery-lane have been taken by the new Council.

68

Labour Leader.
5.10.16

68 | 1

National Council for Adult Suffrage.

We gladly draw our readers' attention to the following notice. The subject is dealt with in the "Review of the Week."

In view of the important position which the franchise question is likely to occupy during the forthcoming months, a representative meeting for the purpose of forming a National Council for Adult Suffrage was recently held at the Central Hall, Westminster, when a resolution urging the necessity of the next Parliament being representative of all the men and women of the nation in order that the problems of reconstruction may be dealt with by representatives of the whole people was passed, and the following were elected an Executive Committee to conduct the necessary work: Mr. H. W. Nevinson (chairman), Miss Margaret Bondfield, Mr. Fred Bramley, Miss K. D. Courtney, Miss Llewelyn Davies, Mr. A. G. Gardiner, Mr. George Lansbury, Mrs. Pethick Lawrence, Miss Mary Longman, Miss Mary R. Macarthur, Miss Catherine Marshall, Mr. H. W. Massingham, Mr. J. S. Middleton, Miss A. M. Roydon, Miss Evelyn Sharp, Mrs. H. M. Swanwick, and Mr. Robert Smillie.

Offices have been taken by the new Council, which will be known as the National Council for Adult Suffrage, at 27, Chancery Lane, London, E.C.

Daily Telegraph
3.10.16

A national council for adult suffrage has been formed to express the demand for a single franchise, and to secure the adhesion of societies and individuals supporting adult suffrage. The executive committee includes Mr. H. W. Nevinson (chairman), Mr. A. G. Gardiner, Mr. George Lansbury, Mrs. Pethick Lawrence, Miss Mary R. Macarthur, Mr. H W. Massingham, and Mr. Robert Smillie. The office are at 27, Chancery-lane, E.C.

Islington Gazette
3.10.16

WOMEN AND MEN'S WORK.

Whatever attitude the advocates of [illegible]'s Suffrage may ultimately assume in the discussion on the new Registration Bill which the Government is now pledged to introduce, there is no denying the gradual encroachment of female labour on ground which has hitherto been regarded as the strict preserves of the "lords of creation." The war has, as we all know, brought women workers into nearly all departments of labour. The are side by side with highly-trained mechanics in our engineering works, as well as in other branches of munition-making. They are on the land, and if the recommendations which Lord Milner will probably submit to the miner's leaders are accepted, wil be found in increasing numbers at the pit heads. This will not be a "new thing," but a reversion to conditions which were quite common in the Victorian era.

We have had lady doctors for years, but that leading hospitals should group male and female students in the same classes for clinical practice is quite an innovation. But the most startling change is the appointment of women policemen on the same terms as men, under the control of the ordinary police committees, unless, indeed, this is put in the shade by the experiment which a well-known bank is making by putting women in charge of some of treir important branches. Some leading lawyers are wondering how long women can be kept out of the legal profession. But that is an innovation that can only be made practicable by new legislation. The law, as pronounced by the Court of Appeal in quite recent years, effectually "bars" women from the sacred preserves of the two branches of the legal profession.

Manchester Guardian
3/2/17

ELECTORAL REFORM.

To the Editor of the Manchester Guardian.

Sir,—We are glad to see by the Report of the Speaker's Conference that some measures of franchise reform are recommended, and in particular that the claim of women to the vote is conceded, and that the principle of a short residential qualification for men is adopted; the restriction of this principle to men only is, however, indefensible.

The present is a curious moment at which to put forward a measure which would have the effect of continuing the disfranchisement of hundreds of thousands of women, for no other reason than that the war has deprived them of the hope of ever having a home of their own. The women who will never marry because their possible husbands have been killed will be among the most selfless workers of the young generation, and to them we shall have to look for much of the thought and service necessary for the reconstruction of our country. The restriction of the women's vote to that of occupiers and wives of occupiers would be a perpetuation of a discredited form of franchise, and the further restriction, endowing the middle-aged only, is a deplorable suggestion. It is a sad and disastrous result of the war that this world will be proportionately older for a generation to come by the loss of so many young men's lives; it would be a wanton aggravation of this disaster to increase the disproportion of old to young by excluding the surviving young women from the political life of the nation.

The problem of a far-seeing Government should be not how many can we keep out of full citizenship in the difficult days to come, but how many can we bring in to work together for a better world. We look to the Prime Minister to embody this principle in a Government bill at the earliest opportunity.—Yours, &c.,

HENRY W. NEVINSON (Chairman).
H. M. SWANWICK.
MARY MACARTHUR.

National Council for Adult Suffrage,
27, Chancery Lane, London, E.C.
February 1.

The Times
7/2/17

A demonstration will be held in the Kingsway Hall, Kingsway, next Saturday, at 3 o'clock in favour of votes for all men and women. The speakers will include Sir John Simon, M.P., Mr. W. C. Anderson, M.P., and Miss Mary MacArthur.

Herald
10/2/17

Woman Suffrage.

THE conversion of the Press to Woman Suffrage is practically complete, and it follows the conversion of such of the public as was hostile. Two facts are now beyond dispute—that some general reform of electoral anomalies has been rendered inevitable by the war, and that no such reform can omit the satisfaction of women's claims. The question is no longer whether, but only when. There is a danger that the whole thing may be put off on the plea of "lack of Parliamentary time"—and that just after Parliament has enjoyed a six weeks' holiday! Every pressure must be brought to bear to effect the reform now. Women have waited till they are heart-sick. Even apart from that, they must—as Mr. Asquith himself has pointed out—be consulted on the problems of reconstruction after the war, and they must have immediate enfranchisement if they are to be in a position to be consulted, if there is to be any machinery by which they can be consulted, when the time comes. We again call our readers' attention to the important meeting to be held today (Saturday) at the Kingsway Hall, at three o'clock, when Sir John Simon, K.C., M.P., Miss Margaret Ashton, Miss Mary Macarthur, Mrs. Barton, and Mr. W. C. Anderson, M.P., will speak.

Challenge
26-1-17

A DEMONSTRATION IN SUPPORT OF THE extension of the franchise to all men and women will be held at the Kingsway Hall, on Saturday, February 10th, at 3 p.m., the chair being taken by the Bishop of Lincoln. Amongst the other speakers will be the Right Hon. Sir John Simon, M.P., Mr. W. C. Anderson, M.P., and Miss Mary Macarthur. For tickets (numbered and reserved, 2s. 6d.; reserved, 1s. and 6d.) our readers should apply to the Secretary, National Council for Adult Suffrage, 27, Chancery Lane, W.C.

Sunday Times
11. 2. 17.

VOTES FOR ALL.

KINGSWAY HALL DEMONSTRATION

Under the auspices of the National Council for Adult Suffrage, a demonstration to demand votes for all men and women, "so that soldiers, sailors and women shall not be excluded from the Parliamentary register," was held in the Kingsway Hall yesterday afternoon.

There was a large gathering, presided over by Councillor Margaret Ashton, of Manchester. The Bishop of Lincoln (Dr. Hicks), who was to have presided, wrote expressing regret at his absence through illness, and added :—

"Of course, we are thankful that the Speaker's Conference so clearly recommends an instalment of women's suffrage, and I cannot doubt that Parliament will enact it. But the proposal at the best is an unsatisfactory compromise. It betrays a fear of a numerical superiority of women on the register. But any man who objects to a lopsided register may be met with the retort that he might as well indict Nature herself, since Providence creates more women than men, and if there are more women citizens than men citizens it is only reasonable that they should have a numerically larger vote. The checks and counter-checks suggested are purely arbitrary, and must be swept away."

The Chairman said the report of the Speaker's Committee encouraged the hope that at last supporters and opponents of women's suffrage had agreed on the principle of the enfranchisement of women as part of the democratic movement. (Cheers.)

Sir John Simon said that adult suffragists must not make the mistake of doing anything to prevent the introduction of a measure dealing with women's suffrage on the widest terms the Government could be induced to accept. (Cheers.)

Miss Mary Macarthur moved a resolution calling for the inclusion of wage-earning women, including the wives of wage-earners, in any system of franchise reform.

Mrs. Barton seconded the resolution, which was supported by Mr. W. C. Anderson, M.P., and carried.

Resolutions urging the Government to introduce a simple and generous measure of franchise reform on the adult suffrage basis for men and women and urging the inclusion of the wives of wage-earners were carried.

Times. 12. 2. 17.

but urging the adult suffrage basis both for men and women; also expressing the conviction that as the problems of reconstruction would vitally affect the lives of all wage-earning women—including the wives of wage-earners—and could not be solved without their help, no franchise reform could be satisfactory which did not provide for their complete inclusion. Councillor Margaret Ashton was in the chair, and among those present were :—

Sir J. Simon, M.P., Mr. Percy Alden, M.P., Mr. W. H. Dickinson, M.P., Mr. R. Holt, M.P., Sir J. Walton, M.P., Sir W. Byles, M.P., and Lady Byles, Mr. G. J. Wardle, M.P., Mr. J. Bliss, M.P., Mr. W. C. Anderson, M.P., Muriel Countess de la Warr, Archdeacon Escreet, Mr. W. Archer, Mr. H. W. Nevinson, Miss Mary Macarthur, Mr. H. W. Appleton, Mrs. Olive Schreiner, and Miss Elizabeth Robins.

The Bishop of Lincoln, who was prevented from taking the chair by ill-health, wrote that he was more than ever convinced that the resolutions to be submitted to the meeting offered the only possible solution of the suffrage problem. Mr. J. L. Garvin sent a message, in which he announced that he was a complete convert to the view that henceforth the State must depend on men and women alike.

SIR J. SIMON, who was the principal speaker, said that as regarded the resolutions carried unanimously at the Speaker's Conference—34 out of 37—there was agreement among members of the Conference that if the Government introduced a Bill containing those recommendations they would not seek to pull one recommendation to pieces at the expense of another, but would support them en bloc. That stipulation, however, did not exist as regarded the proposals for woman suffrage. Therefore he and other members of the Conference were perfectly free when a Bill was introduced to urge other and better proposals. Now was the moment for those who held by a simpler and broader faith to say so. He was at one with them in urging adult suffrage without qualification. But he hoped they would not enable people who were looking for some excuse to avoid introducing a Bill to say that the Suffragists were all at sixes and sevens. He was convinced that once the principle was accepted it would be applied within generous and democratic limits. Let them cooperate with all who wished the change to secure a Bill which should confirm in as generous measure as the Government could be induced to introduce it, the principle of woman suffrage.

J. & G. Observer
11. 2. 17

68113

681

WOMEN'S SUFFRAGE.

MEETING AT THE KINGSWAY HALL.

SIR J. SIMON AND A GOVERNMENT BILL.

A great meeting, held at the Kingsway Hall yesterday, under the auspices of the National Council for Adult Suffrage, whilst welcoming the resolutions of the Speaker's Conference as a step on the way to a national franchise, urged the Government in drafting their Bill to introduce a simple and generous measure of franchise reform on the adult suffrage basis both for men and women.

The Bishop of Lincoln was to have presided, but the doctors would not allow him to go out yesterday. He sent the meeting a letter, in which he expressed the conviction that the resolution to be submitted "offered the only possible solution of the suffrage problem."

A letter in the form of a brief speech of support of the principle of adult suffrage was also read, by Mr. H. W. Nevinson, from Mr. J. L. Garvin. "Before the war," Mr. Garvin wrote, "I opposed the claim of women unwillingly, on the sole ground that when Armageddon came only men could maintain the State. Now I know that men alone never could have maintained it, and that henceforth the modern State must be dependent on men and women alike for the progressive strength and vitality of its whole organisation. If a convert on the point, I am a glad convert, and a complete convert."

"This war," he added, "would have been fought in vain or to a blind purpose unless it resulted in a fuller and nobler realisation of democracy throughout the world. Those who had been good enough to do, in fact, the vital duties of citizenship in war were good enough to enjoy the equal rights of citizenship in peace. What we wanted was a franchise settlement good enough to last a generation. We could not afford, in view of the immense social and industrial problems ahead, to spend years upon new controversies about mending and tinkering the political machine. He had not the faintest misgiving that the utmost extension of our freedom could ever again endanger our defence."

Miss Margaret Ashton, in moving the main resolution, said the need for women to be enfranchised is really more urgent than that of extending the franchise to more men, "because working women now will be left without those homes and families of their own to which, a few years ago, they would have supposed themselves to be entitled, and many more are driven out to be self-supporting and will need the protection of the vote to help them to secure better conditions of industry and payment to enable them to put by sufficient for the years of old age, when single women, left single without any fault of their own, will have no children growing up to take more of the burden of life from them."

The resolution was seconded by Mr. Percy Alden.

SIR JOHN SIMON'S VIEW.

The principal speaker, Sir John Simon, addressed the meeting after the resolution had been carried. He began by explaining one or two important matters contained in the report of the Speaker's Conference, and said it was confidently expected that the Government would introduce a Bill embodying its resolutions. "I am convinced," he said, "that no such Bill can be introdced by the Government unless it contains provision for women's suffrage. That is an immense advance."

With Miss Ashton, he agreed that the present is the moment to urge a more generous view of women's claims. As a compromise, the proposals contained in the report was full of shortcomings. But the real truth was, as Mr. Garvin had said in his letter, that when you enter upon a new course of this kind you must do it with a bold hand and in broad outline.

Personally he was perfectly free, he said, when the Bill was introduced, to urge better proposals. The recommendation which was contained in the majority report might be very good, but it was not his. The question was, what was the wise course for them to take since they, above all things, desired not to lose the opportunity which offers itself to secure the introduction of the principle of women's suffrage? He thought that now was the moment for those who held a simpler, plainer, broader faith to say so, but let them be careful in saying it to make it plain that they desired the barrier against women to be removed by Parliament. "For, believe me," he declared, "once you remove that barrier nothing in the world can prevent water from finding its own level."

Dealing with some objections to adult suffrage, he said it was true that if you had it at a single blow you would have more women voters than men. "I have never been able," he said, "to understand what is the real danger or grievance. Those who think it dangerous appear to me to labour under two fundamental fallacies, that no woman in any circumstances ever agrees with a man, and that in no conceivable circumstances does a woman ever disagree with another woman.

Whilst urging them to point out how very unsatisfactory is the proposed compromise, he asked them to show how their own resolution is a resolution to make the wishes of the community felt in orderly and constitutional ways. But do not let them lose the chance of getting the principle of women's suffrage introduced by the Government into a Government Bill. Once this principle was accepted by our State the limits within which it was to be effected would be, he believed, generous and democratic limits.

WAGE-EARNING WOMEN.

A second resolution expressed the conviction that no franchise reform can be satisfactory which does not provide for the complete inclusion of wage-earning women, including the wives of wage earners. It was moved by Miss May Macarthur, seconded by Mrs. Barton, of the Women's Co-operative Guild, and supported by Mr. W. C. Anderson, M.P.

Miss Macarthur said the argument that women had earned the vote as a reward did not appeal to her. She was rather surprised to find how heartily the meeting agreed with this view. Women, she pointed out, had rendered wonderful service before the war. She had never doubted their capacity for work and service. One of the needs for enfranchising them was to redress such grievances as that of a girl, whose case she quoted, who was being paid in a munition factory only 8s. 6d. a week, and whose wages, even when the Minister called attention to them, were raised to no more than 11s.

Amongst those on the platform with the speakers were :—

Mr. William Archer, Right Hon. W. H. Dickinson, M.P., Miss K. D. Courtney, Sir William and Lady Byles, Mr. W. A. Appleton (Secretary to the General Federation of Trades Unions and Labour Adviser to Mr. Neville Chamberlain), Mr. W. H. Massingham, Muriel Countess De La Warr, Miss M. Llewelyn Davies, Miss Susan Lawrence, L.C.C., Mr. Robert Young (Amalgamated Society of Engineers), Mrs. Pethick Lawrence, Archdeacon Escreet, Mr. P. Wilson Raffan, M.P., Miss Elizabeth Robins, Mrs. Walter Rea, Mr. Holford Knight, Mr. G. P. Gooch, Miss Evelyn Sharp, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Trevelyan, Mr. G. J. Wardle, M.P. (Chairman of the Labour Party), Mr. Robert Williams (National Transport Workers' Federation), Mrs. Olive Schreiner, Mrs. George Trevelyan, Sir Joseph Walton, M.P., Mr. Joseph Bliss, M.P., and Mr. Richard Holt, M.P.

Sunday Times
11-2-17.

VOTES FOR ALL.

KINGSWAY HALL DEMONSTRATION

Under the auspices of the National Council for Adult Suffrage, a demonstration to demand votes for all men and women, "so that soldiers, sailors and women shall not be excluded from the Parliamentary register," was held in the Kingsway Hall yesterday afternoon.

There was a large gathering, presided over by Councillor Margaret Ashton, of Manchester. The Bishop of Lincoln (Dr. Hicks), who was to have presided, wrote expressing regret at his absence through illness, and added :—

"Of course, we are thankful that the Speaker's Conference so clearly recommends an instalment of women's suffrage, and I cannot doubt that Parliament will enact it. But the proposal at the best is an unsatisfactory compromise. It betrays a fear of a numerical superiority of women on the register. But any man who objects to a lopsided register may be met with the retort that he might as well indict Nature herself, since Providence creates more women than men, and if there are more women citizens than men citizens it is only reasonable that they should have a numerically larger vote. The checks and counter-checks suggested are purely arbitrary, and must be swept away."

The Chairman said the report of the Speaker's Committee encouraged the hope that at last supporters and opponents of women's suffrage had agreed on the principle of the enfranchisement of women as part of the democratic movement. (Cheers.)

Sir John Simon said that adult suffragists must not make the mistake of doing anything to prevent the introduction of a measure dealing with women's suffrage on the widest terms the Government could be induced to accept. (Cheers.)

Miss Mary Macarthur moved a resolution calling for the inclusion of wage-earning women, including the wives of wage-earners, in any system of franchise reform.

Mrs. Barton seconded the resolution, which was supported by Mr. W. C. Anderson, M.P., and carried.

Resolutions urging the Government to introduce a simple and generous measure of fran-

VOTES FOR ALL.

SIR J. SIMON'S ADVICE TO WOMAN SUFFRAGISTS.

A demonstration organized by the National Council for Adult Suffrage was held on Saturday in the Kingsway Hall. Resolutions were passed welcoming the recommendations of the Speaker's Conference as a step on the way to a national franchise, but urging the Government to introduce a simple and generous measure of franchise reform on the adult suffrage basis both for men and women: also expressing the conviction that as the problems of reconstruction would vitally affect the lives of all wage-earning women—including the wives of wage-earners—and could not be solved without their help, no franchise reform could be satisfactory which did not provide for their complete inclusion. Councillor Margaret Ashton was in the chair, and among those present were :—

Sir J. Simon, M.P., Mr. Percy Alden, M.P., Mr. W. H. Dickinson, M.P., Mr. R. Holt, M.P., Sir J. Walton, M.P., Sir W. Byles, M.P., and Lady Byles, Mr. G. J. Wardle, M.P., Mr. J. Bliss, M.P., Mr. W. C. Anderson, M.P., Muriel Countess de la Warr, Archdeacon Escreet, Mr. W. Archer, Mr. H. W. Nevinson, Miss Mary Macarthur, Mr. H. W. Appleton, Mrs. Olive Schreiner, and Miss Elizabeth Robins.

The Bishop of Lincoln, who was prevented from taking the chair by ill-health, wrote that he was more than ever convinced that the resolutions to be submitted to the meeting offered the only possible solution of the suffrage problem. Mr. J. L. Garvin sent a message, in which he announced that he was a complete convert to the view that henceforth the State must depend on men and women alike.

SIR J. SIMON, who was the principal speaker, said that as regarded the resolutions carried unanimously at the Speaker's Conference—34 out of 37—there was agreement among members of the Conference that if the Government introduced a Bill containing those recommendations they would not seek to pull one recommendation to pieces at the expense of another, but would support them en bloc. That stipulation, however, did not exist as regarded the proposals for woman suffrage. Therefore he and other members of the Conference were perfectly free when a Bill was introduced to urge other and better proposals. Now was the moment for those who held by a simpler and broader faith to say so. He was at one with them in urging adult suffrage without qualification. But he hoped they would not enable people who were looking for some excuse to avoid introducing a Bill to say that the Suffragists were all at sixes and sevens. He was convinced that once the principle was accepted it would be applied within generous and democratic limits. Let them cooperate with all who wished the change to secure a Bill which should confirm in as generous measure as the Government could be induced to introduce it, the principle of woman suffrage.

J. & C. Observer
11-2-17

68113

681

WOMEN'S SUFFRAGE.

MEETING AT THE KINGSWAY HALL.

SIR J. SIMON AND A GOVERNMENT BILL.

A great meeting, held at the Kingsway Hall yesterday, under the auspices of the National Council for Adult Suffrage, whilst welcoming the resolutions of the Speaker's Conference as a step on the way to a national franchise, urged the Government in drafting their Bill to introduce a simple and generous measure of franchise reform on the adult suffrage basis both for men and women.

The Bishop of Lincoln was to have presided, but the doctors would not allow him to go out yesterday. He sent the meeting a letter, in which he expressed the conviction that the resolution to be submitted "offered the only possible solution of the suffrage problem."

A letter in the form of a brief speech of support of the principle of adult suffrage was also read, by Mr. H. W. Nevinson, from Mr. J. L. Garvin. "Before the war," Mr. Garvin wrote, "I opposed the claim of women unwillingly, on the sole ground that when Armageddon came only men could maintain the State. Now I know that men alone never could have maintained it, and that henceforth the modern State must be dependent on men and women alike for the progressive strength and vitality of its whole organisation. If a convert on the point, I am a glad convert, and a complete convert."

"This war," he added, "would have been fought in vain or to a blind purpose unless it resulted in a fuller and nobler realisation of democracy throughout the world. Those who had been good enough to do, in fact, the vital duties of citizenship in war were good enough to enjoy the equal rights of citizenship in peace. What we wanted was a franchise settlement good enough to last a generation. We could not afford, in view of the immense social and industrial problems ahead, to spend years upon new controversies about mending and tinkering the political machine. He had not the faintest misgiving that the utmost extension of our freedom could ever again endanger our defence."

Miss Margaret Ashton, in moving the main resolution, said the need for women to be enfranchised is really more urgent than that of extending the franchise to more men, "because working women now will be left without those homes and families of their own to which, a few years ago, they would have supposed themselves to be entitled, and many more are driven out to be self-supporting and will need the protection of the vote to help them to secure better conditions of industry and payment to enable them to put by sufficient for the years of old age, when single women, left single without any fault of their own, will have no children growing up to take more of the burden of life from them."

The resolution was seconded by Mr. Percy Alden.

SIR JOHN SIMON'S VIEW.

The principal speaker, Sir John Simon, addressed the meeting after the resolution had been carried. He began by explaining one or two important matters contained in the report of the Speaker's Conference, and said it was confidently expected that the Government would introduce a Bill embodying its resolutions. "I am convinced," he said, "that no such Bill can be introdced by the Government unless it contains provision for women's suffrage. That is an immense advance."

With Miss Ashton, he agreed that the present is the moment to urge a more generous view of women's claims. As a compromise, the proposals contained in the report was full of shortcomings. But the real truth was, as Mr. Garvin had said in his letter, that when you enter upon a new course of this kind you must do with a bold hand and in broad outline.

Personally he was perfectly free, he said, when the Bill was introduced, to urge better proposals. The recommendation which was contained in the majority report might be very good, but it was not his. The question was, what was the wise course for them to take since they, above all things, desired not to lose the opportunity which offers itself to secure the introduction of the principle of women's suffrage? He thought that now was the moment for those who held a simpler, plainer, broader faith to say so, but let them be careful in saying it to make it plain that they desired the barrier against women to be removed by Parliament. "For, believe me," he declared, "once you remove that barrier nothing in the world can prevent water from finding its own level."

Dealing with some objections to adult suffrage, he said it was true that if you had it at a single blow you would have more women voters than men. "I have never been able," he said, "to understand what is the real danger or grievance. Those who think it dangerous appear to me to labour under two fundamental fallacies, that no woman in any circumstances ever agrees with a man, and that in no conceivable circumstances does a woman ever disagree with another woman.

Whilst urging them to point out how very unsatisfactory is the proposed compromise, he asked them to show how their own resolution is a resolution to make the wishes of the community felt in orderly and constitutional ways. But do not let them lose the chance of getting the principle of women's suffrage introduced by the Government into a Government Bill. Once this principle was accepted by our State the limits within which it was to be effected would be, he believed, generous and democratic limits.

WAGE-EARNING WOMEN.

A second resolution expressed the conviction that no franchise reform can be satisfactory which does not provide for the complete inclusion of wage-earning women, including the wives of wage earners. It was moved by Miss May Macarthur, seconded by Mrs. Barton, of the Women's Co-operative Guild, and supported by Mr. W. C. Anderson, M.P.

Miss Macarthur said the argument that women had earned the vote as a reward did not appeal to her. She was rather surprised to find how heartily the meeting agreed with this view. Women, she pointed out, had rendered wonderful service before the war. She had never doubted their capacity for work and service. One of the needs for enfranchising them was to redress such grievances as that of a girl, whose case she quoted, who was being paid in a munition factory only 8s. 6d. a week, and whose wages, even when the Minister called attention to them, were raised to no more than 11s.

Amongst those on the platform with the speakers were :—

Mr. William Archer, Right Hon. W. H. Dickinson, M.P., Miss K. D. Courtney, Sir William and Lady Byles, Mr. W. A. Appleton (Secretary to the General Federation of Trades Unions and Labour Adviser to Mr. Neville Chamberlain), Mr. W. H. Massingham, Muriel Countess De La Warr, Miss M. Llewelyn Davies, Miss Susan Lawrence, L.C.C., Mr. Robert Young (Amalgamated Society of Engineers), Mrs. Pethick Lawrence, Archdeacon Escreet, Mr. P. Wilson Raffan, M.P., Miss Elizabeth Robins, Mrs. Walter Rea, Mr. Holford Knight, Mr. G. P. Gooch, Miss Evelyn Sharp, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Trevelyan, Mr. G. J. Wardle, M.P. (Chairman of the Labour Party), Mr. Robert Williams (National Transport Workers' Federation), Mrs. Olive Schreiner, Mrs. George Trevelyan, Sir Joseph Walton, M.P., Mr. Joseph Bliss, M.P., and Mr. Richard Holt, M.P.

Christian Commonwealth.
14-2-17

Votes for All, or Some?

The National Suffrage Council and the Speaker's Conference.

Compromise, a word of ominous sound, was frequently on the lips of the speakers at the important meeting organised by the National Council for Adult Suffrage, held in the Kingsway Hall last Saturday afternoon. In view of the report of the Speaker's Conference on Electoral Reform the gathering had great significance, which was heightened by the number of influential people that the National Council had brought together in support of the demand for a genuinely national franchise, instead of the truncated and unequal franchise recommended in the report.

But although the meeting abated no jot of the demand for a full and fair measure of franchise reform, the spirit of compromise pervaded the hall. It was a meeting of suffragists in a practical mood, and the policy of intransigeance found no voice. It was quite unlike the enthusiastic suffrage demonstrations of pre-war days. The speeches were in the nature of an appeal to reason—but not so much to the reason of those people who were unwilling, or unable, to see the justice of women's claim to the full rights of citizenship, as to the reason and good sense of the suffragists themselves. Enthusiasm there was, but it was tempered by anxiety to adopt the carefully considered right policy of dealing with the actual situation. It was much more like a conference than a demonstration. There were moments when one felt that the audience was ruefully contemplating a disagreeable necessity, and the sudden silences that fell upon the crowded hall proved that while the policy advocated by the platform was acknowledged to be wise, it was not popular.

Half-a-Loaf or No Bread.

The issue placed before the meeting, which represented practically the whole suffrage movement, including some notable new converts, was the familiar but unwelcome choice between half a loaf and no bread. The limited recommendation of the Speaker's conference upon the woman suffrage question has placed the suffragists in this dilemma; by accepting the limited franchise proposed they establish the principle, while leaving a vast number of women unenfranchised; but by insisting upon their full claim to the vote on the same terms as it is granted to men, they may provoke such opposition on the part of those who have been unwillingly converted so far as to tolerate a limited and partial application of the principle, that the whole question may again be indefinitely postponed. It was recognised that it would be a considerable gain to have even the illogical and timorous recommendation of the Speaker's Conference embodied in a Government Bill, as it would be, inasmuch as it has the support of practically all sections, and is not openly opposed by any. But it was also recognised that if the Government is prepared to go so far, it might not be willing to go farther, and would not even go so far if the flood-gates of controversy were once re-opened. In present, on both sides, the limited scheme proposed may be embodied in a Government Bill, and would probably become law. But if Suffragists prove intransigeant and insist upon the full formula of votes for all men and all women on equal terms, claiming equal as may be to awakened, and the whole question would once more become a matter of controversy that the [illegible] on Saturday, and it was one that obviously weighed heavily with the audience. The main resolution read by Miss Ashton and carried unanimously did not, however, make any reference to a compromise on the larger suffrage issue. It welcomed the resolutions of the Speaker's Conference as "a step on the way to a national franchise," but urged the Government in bringing in its Bill to make it "a simple and generous measure of franchise reform on the adult suffrage basis, both for men and women."

Nature's Lopsidedness.

Notwithstanding the manifest desire of the gathering to face realities, there was necessarily a strong feeling that the compromise proposed by the Speaker's Conference was extremely unsatisfactory. Councillor Margaret Ashton, who presided—the Bishop of Lincoln, who was to have taken the chair, having been forbidden by his doctors to resume public work—made this clear in her address, in which some of the main objections to the compromise were plainly stated. The Bishop of Lincoln, too, in a letter read by Mr. H. Nevinson, described the proposal as an unsatisfactory compromise. "It betrays a fear of the numerical superiority of women on the register," wrote Dr. Lee Hicks; "but any man who objects to a lopsided register may be met with the retort that he might as well indict Nature herself, since Providence creates more women than men; and if there are more women citizens than men citizens, it is only reasonable that they should have a numerically larger vote." In a good-humoured parenthesis, Mr. Nevinson questioned, not the Bishop's theology, but his biology, pointing out that actually there are more boys born than girls, but that girls have a more tenacious hold on life. He also read an eloquent and characteristic letter from Mr. J. L. Garvin, one of the most distinguished of recent converts to the suffrage cause, in which the famous journalist declared himself a willing and whole-hearted supporter of the cause he had previously opposed. The main case against the recommendation of the Speaker's Conference was stated at the very outset by Miss Ashton. The basis of the franchise, as recommended, she said, is not the same for women as for men, because it is proposed that women shall not be entitled to vote until they have reached the age of thirty or thirty-five. To give the vote on the Local Government franchise is also a retrograde proposal, as being a property and not a residential qualification. The recommendation to continue the disqualification of joint occupation of premises by a man and his wife Miss Ashton disposed of by pointing out that any other woman might occupy jointly with a man without disqualification—his grandmother, his mother, his sister, or his daughter—and it is absurd to impose this disability upon his wife.

Wonderful Unanimity.

Mr. Percy Alden, M.P., gave the first hint of the placable mood of the suffrage movement by declaring that they did not want to see a compromise on the full claim, but they did want to see something done. "We are going to fight for the ideal," he said, "but if we cannot get the ideal we will fight for the next best thing." To the argument that if all women are enfranchised the Register long? It is time we redressed the balance!" But the most persuasive speech was certainly that delivered by Sir John Simon. His was the sort of speech that does convince waverers and confirm those who are already convinced. It is right, he said, that serious men and women should examine the recommendations of the Speaker's Conference with care and deep concern; they have a right to be critical. He pointed out, however, that the report was in itself a remarkably satisfactory document. Of the thirty-seven resolutions it contained, covering the whole field of electoral reform, no less than thirty-four were carried unanimously; and the subject-matter of these resolutions has been the cause of acute political controversy for generations. He made the interesting disclosure that there is an agreement among the members of the conference, that if the Government introduces a Bill containing these agreed resolutions, they will all stand together in support of that measure. That means, he declared, that we now have a better opportunity of carrying a measure of electoral reform than we have had for many years. There is, he added, the strongest ground for believing that the Government would introduce such a Bill, and he was confident that no such Bill could be introduced unless it contained a provision giving votes to women. That is an immense advance.

Two Fundamental Fallacies.

The recommendation about the woman's vote is, of course, a compromise; it is the proposal of a majority. Sir John Simon made it perfectly clear that he, as one of the majority, felt himself to be free to get this recommendation widened when the Bill is introduced; and all the others composing the majority are likewise free. They are not pledged to take the half loaf if they can get the whole. The question is, he said, what is the best course to take? We can say to the Government: Now is the time to establish a simpler, plainer, broader franchise, and give reasons for our views. But we must recognise that there are some who feel that, although they must now admit some measure of women's suffrage, they want as little of it as possible. Undoubtedly if all women are enfranchised there will be more women voters than men voters. Sir John said he had never been able to understand the grievance of those who deplore that fact. Those who think it dangerous labour under two fundamental fallacies; the first fallacy is that no woman in any conceivable circumstances ever agrees with the men, and the second fallacy is that in no conceivable circumstances does any woman ever disagree with another woman! If either were true, or is likely to be true, we shall indeed enter upon a new world. He pointed out also that the report gives some men a second vote in virtue of their occupation of business premises, and to that extent the numerical superiority of women voters is reduced. Suffragists can make the most of these arguments: they can point out how very unsatisfactory the proposed compromise is. "But don't let us lose the chance," said Sir John, impressively, "of getting the principle of woman suffrage embodied in a Government Bill, and thereby at least remove the artificial distinction between men and women as voters." He attached great importance to having the principle recognised; and he urged again that suffragists should do nothing to prevent the Government bringing in a Bill containing the principle on the widest possible basis the Government can be induced to adopt.

The Case for the Workers.

Strong arguments for a truly democratic and equal measure of franchise reform were put forward by Miss Mary Macarthur, Mrs. Barton, and Mr. W. C. Anderson, speaking from the point of view of the organised working-class movement. Miss Macarthur moved a resolution expressing the conviction that no franchise reform can be satisfactory which does not include working women, among them the wives of wage-earners. She evoked a startling cheer by saying the argument that women have earned the vote by the work they have done since the war began is one that does not appeal to her: the case for the extension of the franchise was so strong before the war that she would hesitate to base new justifications for it on what they have done since war began. It may be said that the work women are now doing is difficult, dangerous, and dirty; but so was the work they did before the war. Miss Macarthur added that she had always held that the industrial organisation of women was important, but she was bound to admit that the better industrial organisation of men did not wholly explain why their wages were higher than those paid to women; political organisation of men accounted for some part of it. Mr. W. C. Anderson made the important statement, from the Labour point of view, that he agreed heartily with the line taken by Sir John Simon. Suffragists, he said, must take care not to play into the hands of those who wished to wreck everything and keep everything back. He wanted every man to have a vote because he is a man, and every woman to have it because she is a woman, and only on that straightforward and honest basis is it possible to meet the claims put forward for the enfranchisement of this or that section of the community. It was a fitting thing that a meeting of this kind should end on a truly noble note of democratic feeling, and that the last arguments should be those put forward by labour speakers on behalf of the great mass of wage-earning women, who will not be en-

Compromise, a word of ominous sound, was frequently on the lips of the speakers at the important meeting organised by the National Council for Adult Suffrage, held in the Kingsway Hall last Saturday afternoon. In view of the report of the Speaker's Conference on Electoral Reform the gathering had great significance, which was heightened by the number of influential people that the National Council had brought together in support of the demand for a genuinely national franchise, instead of the truncated and unequal franchise recommended in the report.

But although the meeting abated no jot of the demand for a full and fair measure of franchise reform, the spirit of compromise pervaded the hall. It was a meeting of suffragists in a practical mood, and the policy of intransigeance found no voice. It was quite unlike the enthusiastic suffrage demonstrations of pre-war days. The speeches were in the nature of an appeal to reason—but not so much to the reason of those people who were unwilling, or unable, to see the justice of women's claim to the full rights of citizenship, as to the reason and good sense of the suffragists themselves. Enthusiasm there was, but it was tempered by anxiety to adopt the carefully considered right policy of dealing with the actual situation. It was much more like a conference than a demonstration. There were moments when one felt that the audience was ruefully contemplating a disagreeable necessity, and the sudden silences that fell upon the crowded hall proved that while the policy advocated by the platform was acknowledged to be wise, it was not popular.

Half-a-Loaf or No Bread.

The issue placed before the meeting, which represented practically the whole suffrage movement, including some notable new converts, was the familiar but unwelcome choice between half a loaf and no bread. The limited recommendation of the Speaker's conference upon the woman suffrage question has placed the suffragists in this dilemma; by accepting the limited franchise proposed they establish the principle, while leaving a vast number of women unenfranchised; but by insisting upon their full claim to the vote on the same terms as it is granted to men, they may provoke such opposition on the part of those who have been unwillingly converted so far as to tolerate a limited and partial application of the principle, that the whole question may again be indefinitely postponed. It was recognised that it would be a considerable gain to have even the illogical and timorous recommendation of the Speaker's Conference embodied in a Government Bill, as it would be, inasmuch as it has the support of practically all sections, and is not openly opposed by any. But it was also recognised that if the Government is prepared to go so far, it might not be willing to go farther, and would not even go so far if the flood-gates of controversy were once re-opened. By consent, on both sides, the limited scheme proposed may be embodied in a Government Bill, and would probably become law. But if Suffragists prove intransigeant and insist upon the full formula of votes for all men and all women on equal terms, slumbering prejudices may be re-awakened, and the whole question would once more become a matter of controversy that the Government could not be persuaded to handle immediately. This is the drift of the argument that found expression at the meeting on Saturday, and it was one that obviously weighed heavily with the audience. The main resolution read by Miss Ashton and carried unanimously did not, however, make any reference to a compromise on the larger suffrage issue. It welcomed the resolutions of the Speaker's Conference as "a step on the way to a national franchise," but urged the Government in bringing in its Bill to make it "a simple and generous measure of franchise reform on the adult suffrage basis, both for men and women."

Nature's Lopsidedness.

Notwithstanding the manifest desire of the gathering to face realities, there was necessarily a strong feeling that the compromise proposed by the Speaker's Conference was extremely unsatisfactory. Councillor Margaret Ashton, who presided—the Bishop of Lincoln, who was to have taken the chair, having been forbidden by his doctors to resume public work—made this clear in her address, in which some of the main objections to the compromise were plainly stated. The Bishop of Lincoln, too, in a letter read by Mr. H. Nevinson, described the proposal as an unsatisfactory compromise. "It betrays a fear of the numerical superiority of women on the register," wrote Dr. Lee Hicks: "but any man who objects to a lopsided register may be met with the retort that he might as well indict Nature herself, since Providence creates more women than men: and if there are more women citizens than men citizens, it is only reasonable that they should have a numerically larger vote." In a good-humoured parenthesis, Mr. Nevinson questioned, not the Bishop's theology, but his biology, pointing out that actually there are more boys born than girls, but that girls have a more tenacious hold on life. He also read an eloquent and characteristic letter from Mr. J. L. Garvin, one of the most distinguished of recent converts to the suffrage cause, in which the famous journalist declared himself a willing and whole-hearted supporter of the cause he had previously opposed. The main case against the recommendation of the Speaker's Conference was stated at the very outset by Miss Ashton. The basis of the franchise, as recommended, she said, is not the same for women as for men, because it is proposed that women shall not be entitled to vote until they have reached the age of thirty or thirty-five. To give the vote on the Local Government franchise is also a retrograde proposal, as being a property and not a residential qualification. The recommendation to continue the disqualification of joint occupation of premises by a man and his wife Miss Ashton disposed of by pointing out that any other woman might occupy jointly with a man without disqualification—his grandmother, his mother, his sister, or his daughter—and it is absurd to impose this disability upon his wife.

Wonderful Unanimity.

Mr. Percy Alden, M.P., gave the first hint of the placable mood of the suffrage movement by declaring that they did not want to see a compromise on the full claim, but they did want to see something done. "We are going to fight for the ideal," he said, "but if we cannot get the ideal we will fight for the next best thing." To the argument that if all women are enfranchised the Register will be lopsided, Mr. Alden made an immediately effective reply: "Why, good heavens! has not the franchise been lop-sided too a simpler, plainer, broader franchise, and [illegible] reasons for our views. But we must recognise that there are some who feel that although they must now admit some measure of women's suffrage, they want as little of it as possible. Undoubtedly if all women are enfranchised there will be more women voters than men voters. Sir John said he had never been able to understand the grievance of those who deplore that fact. Those who think it dangerous labour under two fundamental fallacies; the first fallacy is that no woman in any conceivable circumstances ever agrees with the men, and the second fallacy is that in no conceivable circumstances does any woman ever disagree with another woman! If either were true, or is likely to be true, we shall indeed enter upon a new world. He pointed out also that the report gives some men a second vote in virtue of their occupation of business premises, and to that extent the numerical superiority of women voters is reduced. Suffragists can make the most of these arguments: they can point out how very unsatisfactory the proposed compromise is. "But don't let us lose the chance," said Sir John, impressively, "of getting the principle of woman suffrage embodied in a Government Bill, and thereby at least remove the artificial distinction between men and women as voters." He attached great importance to having the principle recognised: and he urged again that suffragists should do nothing to prevent the Government bringing in a Bill containing the principle on the widest possible basis the Government can be induced to adopt.

The Case for the Workers.

Strong arguments for a truly democratic and equal measure of franchise reform were put forward by Miss Mary Macarthur, Mrs. Barton, and Mr. W. C. Anderson, speaking from the point of view of the organised working-class movement. Miss Macarthur moved a resolution expressing the conviction that no franchise reform can be satisfactory which does not include working women, among them the wives of wage-earners. She evoked a startling cheer by saying the argument that women have earned the vote by the work they have done since the war began is one that does not appeal to her: the case for the extension of the franchise was so strong before the war that she would hesitate to base new justifications for it on what they have done since war began. It may be said that the work women are now doing is difficult, dangerous, and dirty; but so was the work they did before the war. Miss Macarthur added that she had always held that the industrial organisation of women was important, but she was bound to admit that the better industrial organisation of men did not wholly explain why their wages were higher than those paid to women; political organisation of men accounted for some part of it. Mr. W. C. Anderson made the important statement, from the Labour point of view, that he agreed heartily with the line taken by Sir John Simon. Suffragists, he said, must take care not to play into the hands of those who wished to wreck everything and keep everything back. He wanted every man to have a vote because he is a man, and every woman to have it because she is a woman, and only on that straightforward and honest basis is it possible to meet the claims put forward for the enfranchisement of this or that section of the community. It was a fitting thing that a meeting of this kind should end on a ringing note of democratic feeling, and that the last arguments should be those put forward by Labour speakers on behalf of the great mass of working women, who will not be enfranchised unless the recommendation of the Speaker's Conference is broadened by Parliament.

T.

Challenge
16-2-17

Adult Suffrage.

THE National Council for Adult Suffrage held a demonstration in the Kingsway Hall on Saturday, February 10th, when Sir John Simon made his first public utterance upon the findings of the Speaker's Conference on Electoral Reform, of which he was a prominent member. In the absence of the Bishop of Lincoln (owing to illness) Councillor Margaret Ashton took the chair, and the other speakers were Mr. W. C. Anderson, M.P., Miss Mary Macarthur, Mrs. Barton, etc.

Sir John Simon pointed out that the recommendations in regard to Woman Suffrage were a compromise, based on no intelligible principle, and could not be acceptable to adult suffragists like himself, but the principle of Woman Suffrage had been conceded, and must be welcomed as a real advance. He asked that Suffragists of all kinds should pull together in their demand for the removal of the sex barrier, and that Adult Suffragists should now urge the House of Commons to bring in a measure of Franchise Reform—simple, generous, and inclusive of all adult men and women.

Fear because of the woman's vote preponderating, appeared to him to be based on a double fallacy—viz., "that no woman in any circumstances ever agrees with a man, and that in no conceivable circumstances does one woman ever disagree with another woman," but, to those who had these fears, he pointed out that the "occupier" vote would redress the balance, occupiers, in the large majority of cases, being men.

Mr. J. L. Garvin, who was prevented by an accident from being present, wrote in support of the principle of adult suffrage as follows: "Before the war I opposed the claim of women unwillingly, on the sole ground that when Armageddon came only men could maintain the State. Now I know that men alone could never have maintained it, and that henceforth the modern State must be dependent on men and women alike for the progressive strength and vitality of its whole organisation. If a convert on the point, I am a glad convert, and a complete convert." Miss Mary Macarthur, and Mrs. Barton (Women's Co-operative Guild) urged the right of all wage-earning women to the franchise, and showed how vitally their interests would be affected by the problems of reconstruction which the next Parliament will be called upon to solve.

E. M. MACNAGHTEN.

Leeds Mercury
16. 2. 17

Women, Shells, and votes.

Over 95 per cent. of the members of the Federation of Women Workers are at present engaged in one or another form of labour of National importance, a large percentage of them being employed in controlled establishments. On behalf of the Federation, Miss Mary MacArthur, the hon. general secretary—who is the wife of Mr. W. C. Anderson, M.P. for the Attercliffe Division of Sheffield—has asked the Prime Minister to receive a deputation on the question of electoral reform. Whilst not basing their claims to enfranchisement on the services they are so willingly rendering at this period of crisis, Miss MacArthur says the women do view with apprehension the position that will be created after the war, and they urge their claim to a voice in the reconstruction conditions which must vitally affect the course of their lives and the future of their children.

Daily Telegraph
21. 3. 17.

68

ELECTORAL REFORM.

LABOUR APPROVAL.

Although several attempts were made to drag in adult suffrage and other questions, the report of the Speaker's Conference on Electoral Reform received the approval of a Labour conference, over which Mr. John Hill, M.P. (chairman of the Trades Union Congress), presided, at the Central Hall, Westminster, yesterday. The conference was representative of the Trades Union Congress, National Labour party, Parliamentary Labour party, and women's industrial organisations. There were 426 delegates.

The CHAIRMAN said they had not assembled to formulate their scheme of electoral reform, and they were not met to sacrifice any of their principles on this question. They were there to consider a question of immediate practical politics, and to take a step forward. In comparison with the decision of Russia to adopt universal suffrage, the proposal of the Speaker's Conference might appear weak—(hear, hear)—but Russia required a revolution for these reforms, and when they (Labour) were ready for a revolution they might also have universal suffrage. Meanwhile they favoured another constitutional effort. The present Parliament came to an end next month, and they wanted the machinery for electing a new one. The measure before them was a compromise, and was a step in that direction.

Mr. F. W. GOLDSTONE, M.P., Mr. G. J. WARDLE, M.P., and Mr. STEPHEN WALSH, M.P., members of the Speaker's Conference, made their reports as to the work and report of that body, explaining the proposals at some length.

Mr. WARDLE, in the course of his report, referred to the women's suffrage question as the most difficult problem considered. It was one of the most acutely controversial questions, but the Speaker's Conference had made an immense stride forward so far as the political world was concerned.

RESOLUTION OF SUPPORT.

Mr. J. R. CLYNES, M.P., moved the following resolution:

That this conference, representing the industrial and political organisations of the working-class, both men and women, while adhering to its repeated demands for complete adult suffrage, and such other reforms in registration and constituencies as will make elections more clearly representative of the popular will, welcomes the efforts made by the Speaker's Conference to arrive at an agreement upon these questions; it is of opinion that the Parliamentary Labour party should support, as a minimum, the resolutions of the Speaker's Conference, provided that the enfranchisement of women, including women wage-earners and widows, is agreed to, and calls for immediate legislation on the general lines of the report, so that a decision of a truly national character may be given at the forthcoming General Election. This conference further requests the Parliamentary Labour party to endeavour to secure the inclusion of women on the broadest possible basis, and especially to ensure that the bulk of the wage-earning women are not excluded from any franchise measure.

He asked that it should be considered how far the report would go to relieve the situation of franchise grievances of men and women. The country had its mind on the war, not on the franchise. An exceptional franchise which would increase voting about 20 per cent. was offered. He did not put forward the proposals as satisfactory, but, after comparison, he came to the conclusion that it was far better for Labour to take this further instalment of franchise reform than refuse anything until they got complete franchise reform. (Hear, hear.) Women had proved their right to the vote by their national services during the war. (Cheers.)

Mr. HARRY GOSLING seconded, urging that the proposals of the Speaker's Conference should be accepted. Those proposals would put them in a better position to get to the next reform.

Miss MARY MACARTHUR stated that so far as women were concerned they were satisfied that the report marked a step forward. They did not ask for the vote as a reward for services, because they were always as ready as men to render service, and wanted to do still more.

A long debate followed, several amendments being brought forward. One in the name of the Cardiff Trades and Labour Council, asking for "complete adult suffrage," was defeated by 2,262,000 to 88,000 votes. The next amendment was one by the Miners' Federation to make the resolution read "provided that the enfranchisement of women on the same basis as men is agreed to." This was lost by 1,562,000 to 931,000. Other amendments, dealing primarily with the question of adult suffrage were not discussed, and the resolution was then put and carried without dissent, and the three Labour representatives on the Speaker's Conference were authorised to wait upon the Prime Minister and inform him of their decision.

The Common Cause
16. 2. 17.

681
6S/1/6

The Prospects of a Government Measure.

SIR JOHN SIMON ADVISES ACCEPTANCE OF AN INSTALMENT.

The meeting of the National Council for Adult Suffrage at the Kingsway Hall, on February 10th, was mainly concerned with the recommendations of the Speaker's Conference with regard to Women's Suffrage. Sir John Simon was the chief speaker, and the meeting listened to him with earnest attention, as he urged counsels of moderation. "Suffragists generally," says The Manchester Guardian, "will be grateful to Sir John Simon for advice which even those who do not agree with it must recognise to be based on exceptional knowledge, and dictated by a desire as strong and sincere as that of any of them to promote the cause they have at heart." It is a case of making a beginning, and no one supposes that, once the bar of sex disqualifications is broken, other limitations will endure for ever."

The most vital matter is to get the principle acknowledged. "Those who have felt most strongly the indignity imposed on a whole sex by the refusal to permit any woman, simply because she is a woman, to take any part in the direction of national affairs, though she may be infinitely better qualified than nine-tenths of the men who are voters, have never laid the chief stress in their demand for the franchise on the number of women to be enfranchised, but rather on the question of disability. For them it mattered far more that some women should be enfranchised than that they should be enfranchised on this qualification, rather than on that, and in larger or in smaller numbers."

WE MUST NOT JEOPARDISE THE CHANCE OF A GOVERNMENT BILL.

MISS MARGARET ASHTON, who presided at the meeting, said that the Report of the Speaker's Conference showed that at last the Suffragists and anti-Suffragists in the House of Commons had come to an agreement on the principle that Women's Suffrage was part of the democratic movement. "We do not wish to criticise the Report," she said. "This is not the moment for criticism. We want to see how far our adult suffrage principles can apply to it, and how far we can get improvements on it when Parliament introduces a Bill, as we firmly hope and believe it will." Miss Ashton welcomed the resolutions of the Conference as a step on the way to national franchise. "We have to see to it that no action of ours shall jeopardise the chance of a Government Bill," she said; "but when a Bill is introduced into the House, we must approach our friends, and endeavour to persuade them to put forward our point of view."

AN IMMENSE AND SIGNIFICANT ADVANCE.

SIR JOHN SIMON said that at this time there could be no justification for undertaking great political changes unless the changes were intimately connected with the salvation of our society. He believed that the reconstruction of the basis of the State on the lines of a wider franchise was essential to the future safety of the community. There was a better chance of carrying a great electoral reform measure now than ever before. "We have the strongest ground for expecting the Government to introduce such a Bill, and it has a better prospect of passing into law than any previous Bill. I am confident that no such Bill could be introduced by the Government unless it contained proposals for Women's Suffrage. That is an immense and significant advance."

A WARNING.

He urged Suffragists, while pointing out the unsatisfactory nature of the compromise—one based on no intelligible principle—and demanding a wider basis, not to lose the chance of getting the principle of Women's Suffrage introduced by the Government into a Government Bill in the House, where it would be liable to discussion and change. He warned them against doing anything which would allow people who were anxious to prevent the introduction of any kind of suffrage measure, to say that the Suffragists were hopelessly divided. "Do not let us give the people who would like to keep the door shut the excuse for doing so that no Suffragist can find the key.

"Once the principle is accepted by the State, the limits within which it is to be applied will be generous and democratic limits. This is why I attach more importance than some of you to getting the principle recognised." He implored them to co-operate with all Suffragists to secure the introduction in a Government Bill of Women's Suffrage, on as generous a basis as the Government could be induced to consent to, and begged adult Suffragists not to make the mistake of supposing that their cause would be helped by any action which prevented the Government from bringing in a Bill. When justice triumphed, and the principles of freedom were restored, could we refuse to invite to the work of construction the women who had sacrificed themselves to help the nation through this terrible war?

MR. PERCY ALDEN said that the recommendations with regard to Women's Suffrage had been carried by a very considerable majority of the Conference, and that there ought, therefore, to be a still larger majority in the House of Commons.

MISS MARY MACARTHUR, MRS. BARTON (of the Women's Co-operative Guild), and MR. W. C. ANDERSON, M.P., urged the right of all wage-earning women to the franchise, on the ground that their lives will be vitally affected by the problems of reconstruction. "The War Work that women had done," said Mrs. Barton, "was not a reason, from their point of view, for asking for the vote," but, she added, "from the point of view of the people who are calling on the women to come out and do the nation's work—it is a reason."

Miss Macarthur said that even the better industrial organisation of men was not sufficient to account entirely for the difference in their industrial conditions. Their status as voters helped them very materially.

Mr. Anderson also urged moderation and wisdom on the meeting. The report of the Speaker's Conference marked an immense step forward. "Those of us," he said, "who believe in the principle of adult suffrage for men and women, must do our very best to make that principle a reality; but at the same time we must avoid joining hands with those who are determined to wreck the Woman Suffrage proposals altogether."

THE BISHOP OF LINCOLN sent a letter regretting that ill-health prevented him from presiding at the meeting. While regarding the proposals of the Conference as an unsatisfactory compromise, he expressed thankfulness that an instalment of Women's Suffrage had been so clearly recommended.

MR. J. L. GARVIN also wrote regretting the thwarting of his original intention of being present at the meeting. "I wish," he wrote, "I could have been with you to testify by presence and voice—whatever they may be worth—that this war will have been fought in vain, or to blind purpose, unless it is to result in a fuller and nobler realisation of democracy throughout the world. . . . The basis of the old order has been destroyed by the facts themselves. Never could the Empire have been saved by those to whom the franchise has been hitherto confined. The Empire has been saved by calling up the full fighting and working power of the non-voters; and who now shall say that those who have saved all that is meant by citizenship shall be themselves excluded from it? Those who have been good enough to do, in fact, the vital duties of citizenship in war are good enough to enjoy the equal rights of citizenship in peace."

Referring to "the political and social necessity of redressing once for all the gigantic inequality which now debars women from the vote," Mr. Garvin continued:—"Before the war I opposed their claim unwillingly, on the sole ground that when Armageddon came, only men could maintain the State. Now I know that men alone never could have maintained it, and that henceforth the modern State must be dependent on men and women alike for the progressive strength and vitality of its whole organisation. If a convert on this point, I am a glad convert. After Armageddon nothing can be the same again. The world has entered on a new political epoch. For all the better purposes of that epoch a wide enfranchisement of women holds the key.

"In my personal view it would be well worth while to have something like the recommendations of the Speaker's Conference carried by consent rather than that an immense, and, indeed, an unprecedented reform should be indefinitely postponed or vitally endangered."

The Common Cause
16·2·17.

There are innumerable indications that the time has come for legislation on the question of the Franchise; and it is an urgent necessity that a Bill, and a Government Bill, should be introduced without delay, if we are to avoid the scandalous alternative of a General Election in war-time upon an antideluvian register.

Politically speaking, we are very much in the position of a householder who, from various causes, has put off repairs until they cannot be neglected any longer—even in war-time, when labour is scarce and materials hardly to be got. Things being thus, we know what is bound to happen. Experts are called in. Roof, woodwork, and plumbing are all defective; the builder and the householder agree to do nothing at present but the very minimum of what is necessary. Alterations can only be carried out to save still greater expense, or downright dilapidation; and if another room is to be built on, it is "run up" and roughly finished on the lines of a War Office "annexe." Reconstruction on a large and broad basis must wait until after the war. In the meantime something ought to be done, and there is only a certain amount of energy and money to spare. The paint "must do," but the roof cannot wait, and the plumbing is provisional. Of course, it all ought to have been attended to long ago, but then—it wasn't.

The Electoral Reform Conference Recommendations are a sort of architect's estimate; they refer to the most obvious and indispensable reforms; but even so, there is no certainty that they will be accepted. When a house falls into too great disrepair it may be abandoned altogether; and there are people who are not certain that repairs are worth undertaking at all. Certainly if the tenants begin to dispute as to the colour of the paint and the system of drainage, the landlord is not encouraged to proceed; and in this instance no such excuse must be offered. The Speaker's Conference Recommendations have been a compromise, or rather, a series of delicately balanced compromises. All the recommendations have been weighed one against another, till each one represents the utmost limit to which some section of the Committee was prepared to go, in consideration of a compromise upon some other clause. It is therefore with a whole that Parliament is to be asked to deal, by passing a provisional measure of reform. Naturally, the first anxiety of Suffragists will be that the Suffrage resolution shall be incorporated without fail as an essential part of the whole when the Bill is drafted.

If no Women's Suffrage clause is included, the Bill will not get far. It is a plain fact that no legislation on electoral reform is now possible without the inclusion of women, and it is a fact that is universally recognised. Without some form of Women's Suffrage the Bill will not proceed; but it remains to be decided with what form it can proceed securely. The actual proposals of the Speaker's Conference are far from satisfactory, and logically they are indefensible. Anybody can see the absurdity of giving the vote to lads of twenty-one, while women-workers and women of education are excluded from the franchise for another ten years, and supposed not to reach mental and political maturity before the age of thirty or thirty-five. Everybody, again, can recognise the inconsistency of deferring the franchise to those who have "deserved well of the State," the young munition-workers who were appealed to to save the nation, and responded to the call. It is easy to point out weaknesses and defects, but a compromise is not, like a castle-wall, no stronger than its weakest point. It is the strong points which count. And the strong points of the suggested measure would be very strong indeed. We may take it that the decision arrived at by a Conference representative of opinion in the House, may to some extent foreshadow the decisions likely to be reached by the House itself, and so to have a good chance of being adopted. That is point number one. The acceptance of the principle of Women's Suffrage with the prospect of immediate adoption, marking, as Sir John Simon says, "an immense advance," are gains too great to be hazarded for the chance of getting more.

There are other things in our favour. At this moment there are strong forces at work impelling all men and women to sink differences and to unite for constructive work. The rising tide of a great national effort is sweeping away the cross-currents which used to neutralise and paralyse all attempts at forward movement. Not least among all these forces is the desire of men of all parties to clear the way for reform and to waste no time in haggling over details. There is, we know, a strong feeling in the country in favour of Women's Suffrage. It rests with us to take advantage of the tide.

Daily Telegraph 681
24-2-17.

WOMEN AND THE LAW

LORD BUCKMASTER'S BILL.

The introduction by Lord Buckmaster in the House of Lords this week of a bill providing that women shall no longer be disqualified from acting as solicitors is hailed with joy by professional women generally as the climax to a movement which has for some years past been growing in volume. The text of the bill, which was issued on Thursday, provides that "a woman shall not be disqualified by sex or marriage from being admitted as a solicitor or from acting or practising as a solicitor under the Solicitors Act, 1843, and the Acts amending the same, and the other enactments for the time being in force relating to solicitors." The bill does not extend to Scotland or Ireland. The measure is identical with that introduced in March, 1914, by a member of the Council of the Law Society, which was not, however, in any way submitted to the council.

Much has been done in support of the claims of women to enter the profession since October, 1913, when the conference of the National Union of Women Workers, at Hull, unanimously passed a resolution "urging Parliament to pass a measure to open the legal profession to women." A couple of months later, on Dec. 10, the interesting case of Bebb v. the Law Society came before the Court of Appeal, in which Miss Gwyneth Marjorie Bebb, who had matriculated at London University and taken a first-class in jurisprudence at Oxford, and three other young women claimed that they were entitled to be admitted to the preliminary examination of the Law Society, with a view to entering the profession of solicitor. Lord—then Mr.—Buckmaster had appeared for Miss Bebb at the hearing of the case before the High Court the previous July. The Court of Appeal decided that women were barred from the profession by the common law until the Legislature expressly conferred the right upon them.

For several years past a resolution has been proposed at annual meetings of the Law Society in favour of the admission of women as solicitors, but it has always been rejected by a very large majority. At the annual and special meeting of the society held at the end of last month, the agenda contained such a resolution. A strong appeal was made by the president, and endorsed by the meeting generally, to the effect that the time was very inappropriate to discuss the matter, seeing that such a large number of solicitors—particularly young members of the profession—were at the front. The question was therefore postponed, on the ground that the views of these gentlemen should first be ascertained. It may be pointed out that at the last meeting of the Bar, about a week before the solicitors came to the above decision, a similar resolution, asking the council to consider the desirability of altering their rule which now excludes women, was considered. On the suggestion of the Attorney-General, who was in the chair, the barristers also decided to postpone the question, for the same reason as the solicitors. One of the points that would no doubt be raised if the question were discussed seriously by the higher branch of the profession is that the Bench is recruited exclusively from the Bar, and the admission of women to the Bar would thus make them eligible for the Bench.

That, however, is not a matter for present consideration. The capability of many women for legal work has been proved beyond question. In this country, though they cannot yet practise as solicitors, they have taken the place of solicitors' clerks called to the Army in numerous instances with satisfactory results. In the famous vivisection case, at the High Court, a few years ago, Miss Lind-af-Hageby, who was one of the parties, conducted her case in person, and her ability was frequently commended by the judge. In the Indian courts Miss Cornelia Sorabji has a kind of tacit right to practise in the Indian courts, in the interests of purdah women. Women figure as lawyers in Ontario, South Australia, Tasmania, New Brunswick, and in several States in America, where in some cases husband and wife are partners. Other countries where they are recognised in a legal capacity are France, the Netherlands, Norway, Denmark, and Switzerland.

Textile Mercury
20-1-17

Lace Manufacturers and National Service

The decision of the Federation of Nottingham Lace Manufacturers and Employers' Associations to approach Mr. Neville Chamberlain, the Director-General of National Service, with a request that he should hear a deputation desiring to urge reasons against the lace industry being treated as of a dispensable character, is a sign of the importance which textile manufacturers in the Nottingham district attach to early concerted action to secure consideration for an important industry. It is no part of our duty to advance reasons for the retention of as much labour as possible in the lace-making trade—the Nottingham manufacturers will be able to make out their own case without outside assistance, and may be relied upon to present their points strongly and succinctly—but it may be interesting to touch lightly on the attitude of many people to an industry which is popularly regarded as a "luxury" trade needing no consideration, or only the slightest, in war-time. Some considerable time ago a Lancashire man interested in the textile industry generally was discussing labour prospects in 1917 with a manufacturer of certain articles of clothing needed by the Army and Navy. This manufacturer declared his firm conviction that we were rapidly approaching the time when we should be faced with conscription of labour and with conscription of wealth. He prophesied many months ago that before the war was ended we should see steps taken to direct all labour into the most useful channels, viewed from the standpoint of national interest and national welfare, and he spoke with a touch of annoyance about the employment of women in certain "luxury" industries—that was how he described them—instead of in essential industries. He referred specifically to the lace industry as one from which he thought workers might be diverted into other trades—his own trade, for example, which needed more women workers, and could not get them. The view of this manufacturer has been shared by others, and it would be an excellent thing if Mr. Neville Chamberlain could see his way to receive the statement of the Nottingham Lace Manufacturers' Association, and if that statement—or the gist of it—could be made public. In all probability the result of that would be a much sounder appreciation on the part of the general public of the importance of the Nottingham lace industry, and particularly of the need there is for strengthening and consolidating the industry for the future.

During the present week there has been rather strong pressure from a certain influential quarter of a claim that in our conduct of the war thus far there has been over-emphasis of the importance of industry and commerce. In the opinion of thousands of sober-minded men of business in this country—men, moreover, who survey the matter calmly and without selfishness, and who have contributed generously alike of their sons and of their money to the prosecution of the war—it is impossible to exaggerate the importance of commerce to our cause at this time. There is everywhere a full regard to the importance of fighting men—of the strongest fighting forces we can possibly muster—but the importance and the significance of maintaining our commerce at a high level cannot be ignored. To those who would seek to ignore this aspect of the case, and to those who are suggesting, in effect, that we must concentrate on getting more men and still more men, without regard for the effect a short-sighted, labour-draining policy would have, the question so often put may again be addressed: "How long could we maintain efficiently our fighting forces, how long could we continue our fight, if we neglected our commerce?"

Daily Express 682
27-1-17

Daily Express

LONDON, SATURDAY, JAN. 27, 1917.

WHY NOT WOMEN IN THE MAN-POWER SCHEME?

The man-power scheme, the details of which we print this morning, is another attempt at compromise, despite the fact that compromises have already proved sufficiently costly. It is necessary for all the labour of the nation to be employed in the most effective manner for the common good. To arrive at this end it is proposed to take a voluntary census of men between eighteen and sixty, and to ask them to enrol for service. There is no suggestion that the indifferent will be disturbed. It is the old business of voluntary enlistment over again, with the almost inevitable consequence that the men we should not spare will be taken and the men we could well spare left behind. Before any scheme for industrial mobilisation can be put into operation there must be a definite scheduling of essential industries. There are certain industries that are obviously of supreme national importance. Agriculture, transport, shipbuilding, and the iron and steel factories must be maintained if the nation is to exist. There are other trades of considerable if of less vital social value. There is a third class that might well be abandoned until the end of the war. If confusion is to be avoided and the industrial life of the country is not to be hampered, there should be a statement of the trades from which the Government invites its industrial recruits. This is no time for pious opinion. There are, by common consent, certain industries that could be temporarily suspended without any national loss. Let compulsion be applied to them. The banning of luxury trades would release an army of workers of both sexes who could at once be drafted into genuine national service. The result of this beginning would be a reliable indication of the further measures that are demanded by the country's needs.

The omission of women from the proposed register of workers is a serious blunder. Women have completely demonstrated their value in industry. While there are few men without employment there are still thousands of women without the economic necessity of earning a living who could render effective service. They should be called to the labour colours. To enrol men of sixty and to ignore healthy women of thirty is to show a curious Victorian belief in the physical superiority of men. The situation calls for the Strafford policy of "thorough." The Government should decide how many men and women are required, for what they are required, and from what sources they can best be drawn. Then it should see that it gets them without delay.

Daily Mail 682
17-1-17

NATIONAL SERVICE.

VOLUNTEERS WANTED FOR WAR WORK.

Within the next few days Mr. Neville Chamberlain, the Director-General of National Service, will publish his scheme and make his appeal to the country. It is essential that the response to it should be immediate and satisfactory.

Germany has already gained nearly three months' start on us. She set to work in November, and by December 1 her "mass levy" had actually begun. She has applied compulsion unflinchingly and is taking women as well as men. It is important that this should be known because it shows the need for strenuous effort on our part.

Mr. Chamberlain's first call will be for "men only" between the ages of 18 and 60. They are to volunteer for war work. They will be paid not the wages of the soldier, but the rate usual in their districts for the kind of work in which they are to be employed. Great pains are to be taken to ascertain exactly what they are capable of doing, and each volunteer will as far as possible be employed on his own job and near his own home. Wherever this is impracticable he will receive a subsistence allowance in addition to his pay.

It is hoped that without compulsory powers being taken men who are accustomed to work in the open air will be set free from flower gardening for the growing of food. No labour should be wasted at such a time as this in growing flowers. The Government looks to employers of gardeners and others to show the same patriotism as was displayed at the outbreak of the war, when men who left situations to enlist were paid allowances to bring their soldiers' pay up to their old earnings and had their situations kept open for them.

The Government does not intend at present to appeal for women, though we are bound to say that we do not understand the reason for this decision. Apparently the task of organising woman's labour is too great to be tackled as yet. We hope that when it is undertaken the unpopularity of the Labour Exchanges will be borne in mind. Women cannot be induced to go to these establishments. Largely because of muddling in the past a very insufficient and unsatisfactory use has hitherto been made of women's willingness to aid There are tens and hundreds of thousands of women up and down the country who are only asking to be allowed to "do their bit," and to be told how to do it. No scheme can be satisfactory which does not utilise these admirable volunteers. They have shown in Serbia and France a spirit, energy, and endurance of which men might be proud. Let Mr. Neville Chamberlain keep them in constant view.

Manchester City News
27-1-17

682/2

682

NO PEACE TILL THE ALLIES TRIUMPH.

Labour Party's Emphatic Voice.

STORMY SCENES AT THE CONFERENCE.

The opening day (Tuesday) of the sixteenth annual conference of the Labour party was almost wholly occupied in making clear and emphatic the attitude of the workers on the war. About 700 delegates assembled in the Albert Hall, Peter-street. They were nearly all middle-aged or elderly men, eminently respectable and respect-worthy looking for the most part. The day of the picturesque soft shirt and collar and flaming necktie seems to have gone out of fashion in the Labour movement. Here and there was a youngish delegate, and there were a few young men among the mass of elderly ones in the public gallery, but they were in khaki. Those on the platform included no fewer than five members of the Government, Messrs. Arthur Henderson, John Hodge, George Barnes, W. Brace, and G. H. Roberts, who were all present as trade union delegates.

The vocal battle of the day—furiously waged at times—centred round that part of the Executive Committee's report explaining the circumstances under which Labour members decided to join Mr. Lloyd George's Coalition Government. First, however, there was the address of the chairman, Mr. George J. Wardle, M.P. He defended the attitude of the executive in bargaining for political power in the Government. Independence, he argued, was a means and not an end, and as the trade unionist had to enter into relations with employers to make bargains, so the Labour party had to act in the recent crisis.

Greater Tragedy than War.

While he hated war and desired peace, "I am," he said, "convinced to-day, as I was at the outset, that there could only have been one greater tragedy than the war, and that would have been for Britain to have kept out of it." Amid the cheers which greeted this sentence there was a cry of "Shame." While they were at war they were compelled to set aside some of the things for which in ordinary time they cared most. "Liberty is restricted in order that we may win the greater freedom; we cauterise the wound that it may the more quickly heal." At this there arose cheers and counter-cheers. When Mr. Wardle alluded to President Wilson a small section of the conference cheered excitedly the American President's name. The Allies, observed Mr. Wardle, had disclosed their terms, but so far no response had come from Germany. He believed the Allies' terms would do much to rebuild Europe on a fairer basis and to preserve peace in the future. But Germany had not renounced her war aims, and until she did no peace was possible. Loud cheers punctuated this point.

Turning to the problems which the war had brought in the sphere of domestic affairs, the chairman declared that they nearly all proceeded from the tenderness with which the evil of profiteering had been treated. However, he found satisfaction in the extent to which the principles of national control had made progress during the war, his only criticism being that the Government had been too slow in adopting and so partial in applying the principle of organising national resources on national lines. Looking to the future, Mr. Wardle said: "Our political and industrial influence should be thrown into the scale against oppression of all kinds. We should endeavour to secure justice to every returned soldier and sailor; to provide adequate pensions for every widow and a full education for every child; employment at good wages for every man and woman who requires it; an equal share in the government of the country for all adults; a fair and just basis of taxation for all; a larger share in the control of their own destiny for all who live by labour."

LABOUR AND THE COALITION.

The adoption of the portion of the Executive's report mentioned was moved by Mr. Henderson. He reminded the delegates that the Conference of last year approved by an overwhelming majority the action of the Executive in co-operating with the first Coalition Government and sanctioning the continuance of the Labour Ministers in office. When the second invitation came, from Mr. Lloyd George, they kept in mind the charges that had been made that they had "sold" the Labour movement for nothing, and although he believed that in a national crisis they should think more of what they gave than what they were likely to get, he determined to ascertain from the Prime Minister how far he was prepared to meet them, both with regard to national policy and the allotment of positions in the Government. The majority of those present at the interview with the Prime Minister were favourably impressed by his statement in regard to both matters. Replying to a suggestion that by joining the Government they endorsed the methods by which the old Coalition was terminated, Mr. Henderson said, amid much cheering, "I am not concerned with that. What I am concerned with is the most expeditious way of winning the war." It was a member of the British Socialist Party, Mr. E. C. Fairchild, who moved the rejection of the Executive's report. He argued that the rank and file of the party should have been consulted before they joined the Government, and held that the real function of the Labour movement was to respond to the demand for peace. After other speakers, Mr. Philip Snowden, M.P., arose and was received with prolonged cheering and hooting. During the

One delegate exclaimed: "If Kirkwood does not go back to his family, this conference should say that Henderson, Hodge, and the others should for very shame go out of the Government."

Mr. Henderson's Defence.

"Henderson! Henderson!" called other delegates, and Mr. Henderson accepted the challenge. He gave his version of the case, relating how he induced Mr. Lloyd George, then Minister of Munitions, to face the Clyde workers. The Clyde Workers' Committee was met, and members of that body made a request, not that the trade unions should be recognised—a thing which had never been in doubt—but told Mr. Lloyd George in the most cool and calculating manner "You will only get your munitions when you hand these works over to our control." "I notice," remarked Mr. Henderson in alluding to some cheers which greeted this revelation, "that very few had the audacity to applaud that." Mr. Henderson also told how Mr. Kirkwood had repudiated him and the chairman of the A.S.E. (Mr. Brownlie), and explained that he was not consulted in any way before the decision to deport men was made. Finally, he suggested that the conference should appoint a special committee to investigate and report on the whole question. After more "scenes" the suggestion was adopted. During the debate someone shouted to Mr. Henderson: "Why don't you resign?" He retorted, "I should be resigning every day to please some of you. I am not sure that I could not resign every day if I wanted to please myself. But I am not there to please myself or you, but to see this war through." The discussion, which continued into the afternoon, did not end until strong resolutions had been carried. Feeling that no man should be deported without a trial, which apparently can be done under the Defence of the Realm Act, one resolution declared that the deportations of workmen from the Clyde district without trial on any specific charge was an invasion of civil rights, and "savours of that Prussianism which we seek to destroy." Therefore, the Parliamentary party was instructed to make an emphatic demand for the unconditional return of the Clyde deportees. The conference further decided to send a telegram to the Prime Minister demanding the immediate withdrawal of the deportation orders.

THE PACIFISTS BEATEN.

The "pacifists," as they have become popularly, or, rather, unpopularly, known, made renewed attempts on Thursday to secure a vote in favour of their attitude, but they were badly beaten. Mr. J. Bruce Glasier, for the I.L.P., led the way with a resolution urging that an International Socialist Congress should be held simultaneously with the Peace Congress. The latter evidently referred to some as yet intangible assembly of ambassadors. An amendment, moved by Mr. Will Thorne, was to the effect that instead of an "international" a meeting of the trade unionists and Socialists of the Allied countries be held, and further, that "this conference agrees that the fight should continue until victory is achieved." The I.L.P. resolution was defeated by 1,498,000 to 696,000 votes, and the amendment was carried 1,036,000 to 464,000 votes. Next, on behalf of the British Socialist party, a resolution was proposed demanding that the Government should declare its readiness to enter into immediate negotiations for peace. This was rejected by 1,697,000 votes to 302,000. The debates were marked by some strong speeches on both sides, and attended with excitement. Later the conference listened to speeches from representatives of French and Belgian Socialist and Labour parties.

French and Belgian Views.

The French delegates included Deputy Jean Longuet, the editor of "L'Humanite." He stated that the Socialist representatives of Belfort and a great majority of the representatives of the department of the Marne were in favour of running international Socialist relations. That showed that it was possible, even in the greatest sufferings of the war, not to be carried away by hate. Cheers welcomed this statement, but louder cheers marked a passage in which he said: "We do not want the triumph of German militarism. Nobody hates it more than we do, but we think that German militarism must be destroyed by the German people. We believe that militarism must be destroyed, not only in Germany but in all countries, and it can only be destroyed by one force—the international force of the working classes. Moving appeals were made by the Belgian delegates, one of whom, M. Louis de Bronckere, pointed out in regard to the treatment of Belgians by Germans, that for the first time in modern history the old pagan law had been revived, and the whole nation claimed as the chattels of the victors. The Belgians appealed to Great Britain to see that justice was done. They had no feeling of vengeance against the German working classes. They desired liberty for all peoples, but until the German people had destroyed German militarism it would not be possible for the workers of all nations to meet again in a reconstituted International.

would be a strike if such labour was introduced. The Conference was asked by Mr. Henderson to be careful about putting an irremovable veto upon a man being employed under certain conditions, merely because of the colour of his skin. Cries of "No, no! That is not the bar. He is cheap," came from delegates. Mr. Henderson explained that one of the Government departments had broached the question to him, but on his representations, and after conferences with the building trade unions, the matter was entirely dropped. The resolution, which was carried, further called upon the Government, in the best interests of the nation, to prevent the taking of more skilled men from vital industries and to provide for the retention of sufficient unskilled labour to enable the work of skilled men to be fully utilised. Mr. Snowden moved, and Mr. Ogden (Weavers' Amalgamation) seconded a resolution denouncing an after-war economic struggle, and demanding "policy of Free Trade for every country, with safeguards for the maintenance of international labour conditions fixed by international trade union agreement." The resolution was adopted.

In response to inquiries, Mr. Henderson stated that no reply had been received to the telegram sent to the Prime Minister demanding the unconditional return of the Clyde deportees. The ballot for the special committee which is to investigate the Clyde trouble resulted in the election of Mr. R. Smillie (Miners), Mr. A. Bellamy (Railwaymen), Mr. T. Shaw (Weavers), Mr. J. Hill (Boilermakers), and Mr. A. G. Walkden (Railway Clerks). Mr. F. W. Purdy, Ship Constructors' and Shipwrights' Association, was elected chairman of the Labour Party Executive, and Mr. J. M'Gurk, of Bury (Miners), vice-chairman. Mr. Henderson and Mr. Ramsay Macdonald were re-elected secretary and treasurer respectively without opposition.

WOMEN WORKERS' DEMANDS.

Woman's position in regard to labour and other modern problems was discussed by the National Women's Labour League, which held its annual conference on Monday, at the Caxton Hall, Salford. Mrs. Lewis Donaldson, of Leicester, who presided, in a reference to the war described it as a disgrace to the family of humanity, whatever the causes that led immediately to it. If women had their share in the management of affairs in our own and other countries such a mess could not have come about. Speaking of women's employment and conditions after the war, she asked: "Is the woman going back like Joan of Arc to her plough and rough menial work after delivering her country and laying down her armour? Is she going to leave the arena of commerce, to lay down her uniform, as tram-conductor, postman, and the rest, and go back to her pots and kettles, to unpaid and unconsidered labour, or to the lower alleys of factory work and other industry which she has hitherto traversed?" (Cries of "No, No!") Mrs. Donaldson added that an organisation to combine women in certain trades recently sent out a series of questions, one asking women if, after the war, they wished to return to their former work or to stay in their present occupations. Out of 3,000 who replied 2,500 wished to stay in the work they are doing now.

Miss Mary M'Arthur, offering greetings from the Women's Trade Union League, said that while some improvement in wages had been secured for women munition workers, there were still thousands of women tied to their employers by the leaving certificate clause of Munitions Act who were receiving wages which, if translated into the pre-war value of money, were less than the wages formerly paid to the whites slaves of Cradley Heath. Touching upon the change which the war had brought about in man's conception of women, Miss M'Arthur remarked that before the war women were only the mothers of men. Now they had risen to the dizzy heights of being makers of machine guns. Although votes were denied to mothers of men, it was extremely likely the Government would concede them to the makers of machine guns.

Numerous resolutions were passed by the conference. One expressed an earnest hope for peace, welcomed the Note of President Wilson, and urged the Allies to close no door which would lead in the direction of peace. Another strongly protested against the increasing cost of living, urged complete control by the Government of all food supplies with a view to their equitable distribution, more energetic measures for cultivating food in this country, and protested against the taking of further skilled men from the land. Mrs. Gosling (Paddington) stated that sugar was not the only article that could not be obtained without buying a certain quantity of other goods. In the working-class district she represented people could not buy suet without buying meat, and could not buy potatoes without buying greens. Educational reforms, adult suffrage, a national housing scheme, and the equal pay to women as for men for equal work were asked for in other resolutions.

TAXATION AND PENSIONS.

cheering, "I am not concerned with that. What I am concerned with is the most expeditious way of winning the war." It was a member of the British Socialist Party, Mr. E. C. Fairchild, who moved the rejection of the Executive's report. He argued that the rank and file of the party should have been consulted before they joined the Government, and held that the real function of the Labour movement was to respond to the demand for peace. After other speakers, Mr. Philip Snowden, M.P., arose and was received with mingled cheering and hooting. Seeing the hopelessness of convincing the vast majority of the delegates to his way of thinking, he gibed at the Labour Ministers, waxed sarcastic over "Russia, which through all the ages has been the champion of small nations and the defender of civil liberties," and indulged in sneers and in irritating remarks. He declared that under the Coalition Government we had had legislation inimical to labour and social interests in a degree unparalleled in the history of this country. He spoke for three-quarters of an hour, and was frequently interrupted, often angrily. Once he observed that now "they," meaning Labour men, were in the Government they would, he supposed, be dumb dogs, whereupon Mr. Will Thorne roared, "If we are dumb dogs we are not dirty dogs." Another delegate shouted "Get back to Blackburn," to which a further one called "He daren't!"

The subsequent speakers included Mr. J. R. Clynes, M.P., who remarked that Mr. Snowden seemed to think that there was nothing to be done while the war was on except to attack those who were taking part in it. Office, he said, was the medium through which Labour must wield its power. The "audacity of elected persons" appeared to be the theme of another delegate, Mr. Tom Shaw, who vigorously trounced the attitude of the pacifists. "I am not," he said, "one of those who are for my country right or wrong, but I am not of those who say that my country is always wrong. It is not the Snowdens, the Macdonalds who are the Labour party. It is the workers—the miners, those in the factory and the workshop. We are only secondary persons, whether we add M.P. to our names or not." Towards five o'clock the conference got tired of speeches, and when any delegate essayed to speak he was met with cries of "Vote." Interpreting this spirit, the Chairman put the question—"Those in favour of the party having taken part in the Coalition." For this there were given 1,849,000 votes, and against 307,000.

THE GLASGOW DEPORTATIONS.

When the conference resumed on Wednesday morning a telegram was read from the Prime Minister to Mr. Henderson, stating: "Congratulations to your colleagues on decision of Labour to take its share of the burden of responsibility for directing the affairs of the Empire during this great struggle for freedom and international right." This reference to the previous day's vote was received with some cheers, but also with derisive laughter and cries. The morning had not advanced far when there arose one of the most tumultuous scenes which have marked even Labour conferences. A resolution having been moved (and subsequently carried) calling for the restoration of trade union rights after the war, Mr. David Kirkwood, one of the nine Clyde workers deported from Glasgow early last year during the labour troubles there, got up to speak. His rising was the signal for a volley of cheers. As he told his story of the events which led to the deportations the excitement increased. He said that after keeping him in banishment for nine months—during which time his wife and children had received only £5 from the Government, and would have starved but for the help of fellow trade unionists—the Government now proposed to let him return to Glasgow if he would sign an undertaking to work regularly and loyally, and behave obediently to his trade union, the Amalgamated Society of Engineers. Claiming that he had done these things all his life, he refused to sign the humiliating and degrading pledge, which was only meant to whitewash his persecutors. "When I leave this conference," he added, "I won't return to deportation. I go home to Glasgow or I go to prison." This declaration, defiantly uttered, roused the conference to fever heat, and there was wild cheering, interrupted with passionate shouts. pagan law had been revived, and the whole nation claimed as the chattels of the victor. The Belgians appealed to Great Britain to see that justice was done. They had no feeling of vengeance against the German working classes. They desired liberty for all peoples, but until the German people had destroyed German militarism it would not be possible for the workers of all nations to meet again in a reconstituted International.

TAXATION AND PENSIONS.

Before disposing of the peace proposals the conference discussed a number of other resolutions and adopted them. The first, moved by Mr. J. Ramsay Macdonald, had been drafted by the Executive Committee. It concerned war finance and taxation, and demanded an equitable system of conscription of accumulated wealth, and an income tax of fifteen shillings in the pound on unearned income, and a system of land taxation which would give to the nation the land which was now being defended by the lives and sufferings of the people. Another demand in the resolution was for the nationalisation of the banking system. A further resolution called for adult suffrage, including women; for a short qualifying period and continuous registration; for special arrangements for taking the votes of soldiers and munition workers; and for redistribution. On the subject of pensions the Parliamentary Labour party was urged to press the Government for a more adequate scale of pensions for soldiers and sailors and their dependents. Bitter complaints were made of the way in which pensions had been dealt with in many instances, Mr. J. E. Sutton describing the treatment in some cases as disgusting. He believed, however, that the blame lay not so much with the Cabinet as with the Chelsea Commissioners, who needed a little "ginger" put into them. He thought Mr. Barnes would do this, and the members of the conference should back him up. During the debate a tribute was paid to the work of Mr. J. M. Hogge, in the matter of pensions.

A Domestic Affair.

Yesterday the conference held its last session. A resolution was adopted that at the end of the war the British delegation of plenipotentiaries to the conference to negotiate terms of peace should contain an adequate number of Parliamentary representatives of organised Labour; also that all the British representatives should work for the formation of an International League to enforce the maintenance of peace on the plan advocated by President Wilson. The educational system next claimed notice, and changes advocated included the abolition of all fees; the raising of the school leaving age to sixteen years; compulsory part-time school attendance for all boys and girls under eighteen; increased pay for teachers; and improved hygienic conditions in elementary schools. The constitution and methods of election of the Executive Committee of the party provoked considerable discussion. One significant alteration proposed, and adopted by a small majority, was that no affiliated organisation may nominate more than one candidate unless its membership exceeded 500,000, in which case it may nominate two candidates. The effect of this resolution is that the I.L.P. will be limited to one nomination as compared with the four seats held at present. After this attention to its own domestic affairs, the conference passed a resolution protesting against "the abuse of the wide powers conferred on the authorities under the Defence of the Realm Act," complaining that the Military Service Act had been administered inequitably, and viewing with alarm and hostility proposals in the direction of a system of industrial conscription. The resolution was moved by Mr. R. C. Wallhead (Manchester), on behalf of the I.L.P. The deportation of Belgian subjects was denounced in another resolution, Mr. Ramsay MacDonald vigorously supporting it, and remarking that the German Socialists should show that their protest against the deportations did not mean words merely.

Coloured Labour: Free Trade.

Hostility to the introduction of cheap coloured labour into this country was expressed in one resolution. It afforded Mr. Brownlie an opportunity of absolutely denying that he had supported the introduction of black labour, as had been stated in a newspaper. Mr. A. D. Cameron (Carpenters and Joiners) declared that there

Evening News
27-1-17

682/3

Sunday Times
28-1-17

682

NATIONAL SERVICE.

BACK AGAIN TO "WAIT AND SEE."

After examining Mr. Neville Chamberlain's National Service scheme, as it is interpreted to-day, we must believe that certain vital details have been omitted; and, on this assumption, we think it was a bad mistake to allow premature publication of what can only be a first and incomplete draft. Either this or the scheme is thoroughly bad and unsatisfying.

As a matter of fact, we understand that much more detail is to come—that the Cabinet now has before it the question of employing women and that particulars will be issued later. There has been delay, it appears, because of the difficulties of housing the women, and the counsel of about 200 organisations has been taken to enable the Director of National Service to approach the matter with knowledge.

This being so, it is evident that to-day's statement conveys a false impression to the public.

Here we have one more proof of the extraordinary failure of official departments to understand the psychology of publicity and the first essential in all publicity—that you should make up your own mind what to do and then tell the public all about it in clear and unmistakable language.

How unfortunate the error has been is indicated in the opinion of the Mayor of Holborn, who, without the reservation that would have marked all criticism had it been made plain that this was only a slice and not the whole loaf, regards the Service proposals as "rubbish." The authorities must not blame public men but their own lack of judgment if such uncompromising expressions are used.

If we thought the Director who has to reply to Hindenburg's great mass levy, now in full force, meant us to understand, "These are my complete plans," we should have to tell him very firmly that they leave every serious man and woman in this country astonished, disappointed, and chilled.

Swift action and decisive orders are absolutely imperative if we are to play the winning hand in the critical year of the war, and, as explained so far, the scheme fumbles where it should grip, and is roundabout and loose—very loose—where every stroke for victory should be as straight as a shot.

There is no use answering Hindenburg's all-comprehensive mass levy with a scheme that would inevitably suffer semi-strangulation from its own red tape. As it stands the proposals are frankly a throw-back to "Wait and See" in its most perilous condition of lassitude.

Hindenburg's mass levy has two months' start of us in actual work—not merely in card index—and that start will shortly be translated into fighting instruments against our heroic troops. What strikes us about the scheme as far as it now goes is the futile refrain, "It is hoped," that runs through it. "'Hoping" for volunteers, sending letter-cards on tours among officials, "hoping" to find men jobs in suitable places, "hoping" that employers will assist—all these are defects, or will be defects unless Mr. Chamberlain's final scheme improves upon them.

When men of 45 and 50 are offering their lives in the trenches it is not enough in the industrial service scheme to resort to a mere extension of the column in the National Register which simply asked people if they would do war work. What fit men and women are waiting for is to be told what they must do.

Food we must have. "Hoping" will not grow it. Voluntarism and the agency of inefficient and lordly managers of labour exchanges cannot meet a situation of stern and instant needs, either in food or munitions.

As for the women, who are so unaccountably neglected in the instalment published to-day, their capacity for helping to victory is immeasurable. No proposals that did not include them would be worth twopence to the nation and the Army.

Half a million of them are on munition work; 140,000 have been registered for the land, and in October 80,000 had given whole time and 66,000 part time to agriculture; and 2,000 are cooking for the Army. It is magnificent, and we, "hoping" in our turn, wish to see them recruited in huge numbers for the proud task of smashing the Huns.

But Mr. Chamberlain must be careful not to turn them, with their sensitiveness and their quick enthusiasm, over to the dull minds and slow but not sure methods of minor British officialdom.

WOMEN WORKERS MUDDLE.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN'S OPPORTUNITY.

By RAY STRACHEY.

Mrs. Ray Strachey is hon. assistant secretary of the National Union of Woman's Suffrage Societies, an organisation which has placed some thousands of women volunteer workers.

The rapid calling to the Colours of large numbers of the men hitherto labelled indispensable is making the problem of the organisation of women's labour a very urgent one. Since the beginning of the war this problem has been increasing in complexity, and the difficulties of the situation have been invariably increased by the spasmodic efforts made from time to time by the various Government offices. At one time and another most Departments have had their fingers in the pie, and the situation to-day resembles nothing so much as a kaleidoscope. If it were not so serious a matter it would be a cause for laughter; but it concerns the credit and the very future of the country, as well as the individual livelihood and welfare of thousands upon thousands of women, and it is more than time that it should be seriously considered.

The situation to-day almost passes belief. On the one hand the papers are filled with great appeals to the women of the country to come forward and work. Many thousands are wanted for the land, thousands more for the munition factories, and more thousands still for offices and shops and counting-houses; hundreds here and there for this trade and that, and all the while the home fires to be kept burning—one would think the women of the country had enough to do!

On the one hand there are the women, eager and anxious to work, turning hopefully from employer to employer, answering appeals, hoping and waiting, and utterly unable to get a job. Again and again they are registered, and find their way from waiting rooms to waiting lists; again and again they come forward and try to do their bit, and all they accomplish is to add one more item to the general muddle. National registers and national appeals, local registers and local appeals, all lead to the same chaos, and the women of our country are growing profoundly discouraged.

OUTWORN CONVENTIONS.

The reason for it all is not difficult to find; it lies in the fact that our rulers have grown up with two conventions, the one being that women's concerns are best left alone, and the other that they don't greatly matter. As a consequence of this we find nobody bothering to train women properly, to pay women properly, to engage, to select or to control women properly, and the chaos that ensues is not to be wondered at. How, for example, can you expect contentment from girls who earn 25s. a week in one shed, while similar girls doing munition work in the next shed get 35s.? What sort of control do you expect one young man to exercise over a room full of 60 girls? And how can you hope that an army officer can select 100 cooks? What is the use of asking women with small children to work on the land for 15s. a week, and why is a University degree necessary for the job of under office girl? How can you hope that a laundry hand can know how to plough, or a housemaid to set a machine? Things as stupid and stupider than this happen daily, and yet nothing is done to put it right. Considering all these things women are to be congratulated on the magnificent volume of work they have been able to do.

WOMEN'S DEPARTMENT WANTED

Curiously enough, it is as easy to see how this matter might be remedied as it is to see how it has gone wrong, and now that the Director of National Service has been appointed we can hope that it may be begun. A woman's department, staffed and controlled entirely by women and working under Mr. Neville Chamberlain could do marvels if it were given the opportunity. The diverse conditions of private employment could not, of course, be easily unified, but those of Government servants ought chology of publicity and the first essential in all publicity—that you should make up your own mind what to do and then tell the public all about it in clear and unmistakable language.

How unfortunate the error has been is indicated in the opinion of the Mayor of Holborn, who, without the reservation that would have marked all criticism had it been made plain that this was only a slice and not the whole loaf, regards the Service proposals as "rubbish." The authorities must not blame public men but their own lack of judgment if such uncompromising expressions are used.

If we thought the Director who has to reply to Hindenburg's great mass levy, now in full force, meant us to understand, "These are my complete plans," we should have to tell him very firmly that they leave every serious man and woman in this country astonished, disappointed, and chilled.

Swift action and decisive orders are absolutely imperative if we are to play the winning hand in the critical year of the war, and, as explained so far, the scheme fumbles where it should grip, and is roundabout and loose—very loose—where every stroke for victory should be as straight as a shot.

There is no use answering Hindenburg's all-comprehensive mass levy with a scheme that would inevitably suffer semi-strangulation from its own red tape. As it stands the proposals are frankly a throw-back to "Wait and See" in its most perilous condition of lassitude.

capacity for helping to victory is immeasurable. No proposals that did not include them would be worth twopence to the nation and the Army.

Half a million of them are on munition work; 140,000 have been registered for the land, and in October 80,000 had given whole time and 66,000 part time to agriculture; and 2,000 are cooking for the Army. It is magnificent, and we, "hoping" in our turn, wish to see them recruited in huge numbers for the proud task of smashing the Huns.

But Mr. Chamberlain must be careful not to turn them, with their sensitiveness and their quick enthusiasm, over to the dull minds and slow but not sure methods of minor British officialdom.

thousands still for offices and shops and counting-houses; hundreds here and there for this trade and that, and all the while the home fires to be kept burning—one would think the women of the country had enough to do!

On the one hand there are the women, eager and anxious to work, turning hopefully from employer to employer, answering appeals, hoping and waiting, and utterly unable to get a job. Again and again they are registered, and find their way from waiting rooms to waiting lists; again and again they come forward and try to do their bit, and all they accomplish is to add one more item to the general muddle. National registers and national appeals, local registers and local appeals, all lead to the same chaos, and the women of our country are growing profoundly discouraged.

OUTWORN CONVENTIONS.

The reason for it all is not difficult to find; it lies in the fact that our rulers have grown up with two conventions, the one being that women's concerns are best left alone, and the other that they don't greatly matter. As a consequence of this we find nobody bothering to train women properly, to pay women properly, to engage, to select or to control women properly, and the chaos that ensues is not to be wondered at. How, for example, can you expect contentment from girls who earn 25s. a week in one shed, while similar girls doing munition work in the next shed get 35s.? What sort of control do you expect one young man to exercise over a room full of 60 girls? And how can you hope that an army officer can select 100 cooks? What is the use of asking women with small children to work on the land for 15s. a week, and why is a University degree necessary for the job of under office girl? How can you hope that a laundry hand can know how to plough, or a housemaid to set a machine? Things as stupid and stupider than this happen daily, and yet nothing is done to put it right. Considering all these things women are to be congratulated on the magnificent volume of work they have been able to do.

WOMEN'S DEPARTMENT WANTED

Curiously enough, it is as easy to see how this matter might be remedied as it is to see how it has gone wrong, and now that the Director of National Service has been appointed we can hope that it may be begun. A woman's department, staffed and controlled entirely by women and working under Mr. Neville Chamberlain could do marvels if it were given the opportunity. The diverse conditions of private employment could not, of course, be easily unified, but those of Government servants ought surely to be within control.

If a woman's department were set up, and were entrusted to women of experience, who alone know the difficulties and the needs of women, and if it had power to turn the Government itself into a model employer of women, a great change in the situation would immediately result. This department could then ensure that women were properly recruited and selected by women, who alone can really judge of their suitability for their job. It could ensure that they were officered and controlled, inspected and cared for by women, fed and housed with due attention to their needs. And, above all, it could enforce the fair and honest principle that they should be paid an equal wage for their equal work.

The task of the department would be a heavy one; its problems would not be simple and its enemies would not be few; but the woman power of the nation is worth using, and it is worth using well.

Daily Express
29-1-17

COMING CALL TO WOMEN.

SCHEME TO FOLLOW THAT FOR MEN.

CLAIM THAT WOMEN SHALL MANAGE IT.

The National Service Department authorises the statement that a general scheme for the utilisation of the woman power of the country will be made public in the near future by Mr. Neville Chamberlain, the Director-General.

"This scheme," it is added, "will not be on the same scale as that for men between the ages of sixteen and sixty. Mr. Neville Chamberlain is fully alive to the invaluable help which women have already rendered during the war, and will doubtless afford them more scope for co-operating in the national effort to win the war."

A "Daily Express" representative was told at the office of the National Service Department on Saturday that an organisation for dealing with woman power is already under formation, but that Mr. Chamberlain is in the first place concentrating his efforts on the completion of the scheme for dealing with man power. As soon as the machinery for utilising man power has been set up, the question of woman power will immediately be dealt with. It is also stated that Mr. Chamberlain anticipates that two or three million women will volunteer for work, and that a scheme for placing them in work of national importance has been submitted to the Cabinet.

WOMEN'S DUTY.

Meanwhile leading women workers are urging the desirability of putting the organisation of women's work in the hands not of men organisers, but of women. Representatives of many women's organisations have laid their views before the Director of National Service, but so far he is said not to have committed himself to the expression of any opinion on this point.

Mrs. Oliver Strachey, of the London Society for Women's Suffrage, told a "Daily Express" representative on Saturday that many women's organisations have offered Mr. Chamberlain their services for the purpose of organising women's labour.

"We are strongly of opinion," said Mrs. Strachey, "that the whole work of organising the woman power of the nation should be entrusted to those who best understand its difficulties—that is, to women. The women's side of the National Service Department should be managed by women, under the control of Mr. Chamberlain.

"In the first place, the collection of women should be undertaken by women. We think it is of great importance that there should be women collecting officers to enrol and draft the women who volunteer for service. This work should be placed in the hands of boards of women in the various districts.

"WELFARE."

"Then the inspectors who must be employed to visit the women and see that they are properly housed and looked after should also be women. The whole of the 'welfare' work which must be instituted should be carried out by women, for the simple and sufficient reason that women workers will speak more freely to women about their difficulties and the conditions of their work than they will to men.

"Indeed, the more one considers every phase of the employment of large numbers of women, the more important it seems that the whole question should be handled by women, who understand its complexities more clearly than men can possibly do, and would be able to bring their knowledge and experience to bear on the problems involved.

"On one point we think it is desirable to utter a word of warning. It would be most unwise to issue a general call for women until it is known how many women can be placed in work and where they are to go. How many women will volunteer for work no one can tell beforehand—it is mere guesswork—but there are very many thousands who are eager for the chance of doing something, if work can be found for them. That is the first necessity. To make a general call and enlist large numbers of women volunteers, and then be unable to place them in work, would be a first-class blunder."

Daily Mail
29-1-17

THE MAN AND WOMAN MUDDLE.

While every available German in civil life is now making guns and shells, we in this country are still only making plans—and unsatisfactory plans—for the use of our man and woman power.

In Germany the authorities obtained compulsory powers and then called for volunteers under Hindenburg's scheme. In Great Britain Mr. Neville Chamberlain has not obtained compulsory powers, which would be a certain stimulus to recruiting, but is merely calling for volunteers with vague assurances to the effect that, if they do not come forward, compulsion may be applied.

The country fears that it is to have inflicted upon it another great advertising and speech-making campaign, like that for the recruiting of the Army which broke down so lamentably in 1915. That means the spending of money unnecessarily and great waste of time. It is the old "wait and see" in the same old form. The statement that compulsion will be applied if volunteers do not come forward will lead many to hang back till the State can make up its mind to tell them plainly what to do, and it will involve intolerable delay. The repeated trial of the voluntary system in 1915 wasted six months, and this was one of the causes why the campaign of 1916 did not bring peace. Germany is to-day making an unparalleled effort, and to meet her we must have the labour now, or the campaign of 1917 will prove indecisive.

A very great defect in Mr. Neville Chamberlain's scheme is that it does not provide for the immediate enrolment of women. They have come forward in their thousands time after time, only to be told, when anyone vouchsafed to give them any answer at all, that they would be informed when they were wanted. They are now told to wait till "the machinery for the enrolment of men" is "in full working order"—which means indefinitely. It is a depressing muddle and the successive "explanations" of the scheme only make it worse.

Utter chaos prevails owing to the want of system and energy in the past. While the Government offices are packed with young shirkers—so that in a single Department, the Ministry of Munitions, there are reported to be 800 men of military age—the owners of single-man businesses are being taken for the front in conditions which mean their ruin. While in one part of England clerks and shopwalkers are being dragged off to the farms as substitutes for agricultural labourers, in another part the farms are overstaffed with young, able-bodied men. Why not take the men from the overstaffed farms in such counties as Cornwall, where 995 have too many young men, and avoid the "general post" of labourers, clerks, and shopwalkers elsewhere? Again, there are very many Civil Servants, of from 45 to 65, retired from work in India or at home, who can do good work, have great experience, and are anxious to render aid, but who are at present left unemployed. This contention should be

Financial Times
29-1-17

682/4

NATIONAL SERVICE.

WOMEN TO BE INCLUDED.

Exception is taken by Mr. Neville Chamberlain to the attitude of a section of the Press in their criticism of the scheme for the utilisation of the nation's resources, and particularly to that part having reference to women in National Service. Seen by a Press representative on Saturday, an official of the National Service Department said that Mr. Chamberlain's intention with regard to employing the services of women had been misunderstood. A scheme for utilising women's aid was actually in course of preparation, he continued, and the work, which was making good progress, was being dealt with by the staff. In the scheme submitted to the Cabinet there was a clause providing that the enrolment of women should be part of the scheme, which would be put into operation as soon as they had the machinery for the enrolment of men in full working order. "The Prime Minister," he added, "has given a pledge that a voluntary scheme should be tried, and if that fails then Parliament must be consulted for further powers. To those who are out for industrial compulsion at once, no doubt any voluntary effort, whether perfect or imperfect, is unsatisfactory. The National Service Department is making every endeavour to secure success by a voluntary scheme, and it will be all the better for the nation and everybody if voluntaryism can carry the day, especially as the time in which to secure volunteers is of the utmost importance." It was also pointed out by the official that the dealing with the scheme for men must take precedence, but it was wrong to assert that women had been ignored or were to be excluded from service.

The National Voluntary Service scheme applies for the moment to men of between 18 and 60 years of age, who will be asked to inform the Director-General by means of letter cards, which will be supplied, the kind of work they are engaged upon and the kind of work they are prepared to undertake in the national interest, munitions and agriculture being the principal work for which labour is urgently required. Each man will be paid the trade union rate of wages of the district in which he is employed, and if he should be ordered to a district other than that in which he resides he will receive a subsistence allowance of 17s 6d per week if the removal involve the upkeep of two households. A man of military age may volunteer and so soon as he is called up he will be released to join the Colours. National service will not excuse military service.

already under formation, but that Mr. Chamberlain is in the first place concentrating his efforts on the completion of the scheme for dealing with man power. As soon as the machinery for utilising man power has been set up, the question of woman power will immediately be dealt with. It is also stated that Mr. Chamberlain anticipates that two or three million women will volunteer for work, and that a scheme for placing them in work of national importance has been submitted to the Cabinet.

WOMEN'S DUTY.

Meanwhile leading women workers are urging the desirability of putting the organisation of women's work in the hands not of men organisers, but of women. Representatives of many women's organisations have laid their views before the Director of National Service, but so far he is said not to have committed himself to the expression of any opinion on this point.

Mrs. Oliver Strachey, of the London Society for Women's Suffrage, told a "Daily Express" representative on Saturday that many women's organisations have offered Mr. Chamberlain their services for the purpose of organising women's labour.

"We are strongly of opinion," said Mrs. Strachey, "that the whole work of organising the woman power of the nation should be entrusted to those who best understand its difficulties—that is, to women. The women's side of the National Service Department should be managed by women, under the control of Mr. Chamberlain.

"In the first place, the collection of women should be undertaken by women. We think it is of great importance that there should be women collecting officers to enrol and draft the women who volunteer for service. This work should be placed in the hands of boards of women in the various districts.

"WELFARE."

"Then the inspectors who must be employed to visit the women and see that they are properly housed and looked after should also be women. The whole of the 'welfare' work which must be instituted should be carried out by women, for the simple and sufficient reason that women workers will speak more freely to women about their difficulties and the conditions of their work than they will to men.

"Indeed, the more one considers every phase of the employment of large numbers of women, the more important it seems that the whole question should be handled by women, who understand its complexities more clearly than men can possibly do, and would be able to bring their knowledge and experience to bear on the problems involved.

"On one point we think it is desirable to utter a word of warning. It would be most unwise to issue a general call for women until it is known how many women can be placed in work and where they are to go. How many women will volunteer for work no one can tell beforehand—it is mere guesswork—but there are very many thousands who are eager for the chance of doing something, if work can be found for them. That is the first necessity. To make a general call and enlist large numbers of women volunteers, and then be unable to place them in work, would be a first-class blunder."

sarily and great waste of time. It is the old "wait and see" in the same old form. The statement that compulsion will be applied if volunteers do not come forward will lead many to hang back till the State can make up its mind to tell them plainly what to do, and it will involve intolerable delay. The repeated trial of the voluntary system in 1915 wasted six months; and this was one of the causes why the campaign of 1916 did not bring peace. Germany is to-day making an unparalleled effort, and to meet her we must have the labour now, or the campaign of 1917 will prove indecisive.

A very great defect in Mr. Neville Chamberlain's scheme is that it does not provide for the immediate enrolment of women. They have come forward in their thousands time after time, only to be told, when anyone vouchsafed to give them any answer at all, that they would be informed when they were wanted. They are now told to wait till "the machinery for the enrolment of men" is "in full working order"—which means indefinitely. It is a depressing muddle and the successive "explanations" of the scheme only make it worse.

Utter chaos prevails owing to the want of system and energy in the past. While the Government offices are packed with young shirkers—so that in a single Department, the Ministry of Munitions, there are reported to be 800 men of military age—the owners of single-man businesses are being taken for the front in conditions which mean their ruin. While in one part of England clerks and shopwalkers are being dragged off to the farms as substitutes for agricultural labourers, in another part the farms are overstaffed with young, able-bodied men. Why not take the men from the overstaffed farms in such counties as Cornwall, where 995 have too many young men, and avoid the "general post" of labourers, clerks, and shopwalkers elsewhere? Again, there are very many Civil Servants, of from 45 to 65, retired from work in India or at home, who can do good work, have great experience, and are anxious to render aid, but who are at present left unemployed. This confusion should be cleared up once and for all, but of that there is not the faintest sign in Mr. Neville Chamberlain's half-hearted and dilatory plan.

The National Voluntary Service scheme applies for the moment to men of between 18 and 60 years of age, who will be asked to inform the Director-General by means of letter cards, which will be supplied, the kind of work they are engaged upon and the kind of work they are prepared to undertake in the national interest, munitions and agriculture being the principal work for which labour is urgently required. Each man will be paid the trade union rate of wages of the district in which he is employed, and if he should be ordered to a district other than that in which he resides he will receive a subsistence allowance of 17s 6d per week if the removal involve the upkeep of two households. A man of military age may volunteer and so soon as he is called up he will be released to join the Colours. National service will not excuse military service.

Jle James
9-10-17

682/5

WOMEN'S WAR SERVICE.

DEMAND FOR EQUAL TERMS.

MR. N. CHAMBERLAIN'S DRAFT SCHEME.

The draft of Mr. Neville Chamberlain's scheme of National Civilian Service, with the announcement that there is not to be a simultaneous appeal to men and women, and that only men will be appealed to at present, has aroused feelings of surprise and in some cases consternation among women who were awaiting a definite and clear statement of how they could best serve their country.

The statement that women may be called on later, if required, and that a Department will be set up in a few days to deal with women volunteers is apparently intended to allay such feelings, but it is tempered with the announcement that women will not be enrolled on the same terms as men. An attempt to differentiate between the sexes at a time when much of the work of substitution in the Civil Service and the civilian side of the Army, as well as the industrial and agricultural life of the community, must obviously be undertaken by women if man-power is to be freed to any considerable extent, is felt to be impolitic and uneconomic. It is not improbable that the War Office has a definite scheme of its own for a very striking use of woman-power in unexpected quarters, but this is only a small part of the need for a scheme by which woman-power shall be easily available.

Women of all classes who have been eager and ready to go where they would be most useful are chagrined at this first draft of Mr. Chamberlain's scheme, and further delays are likely to be bitterly resented. Offers of cooperation have been made to Mr. Chamberlain by the various women's societies and, we understand, very courteously acknowledged, but as yet these fine reserves of capable women who have during the past two and a half years served the country so well—often in spite of official hindrances—and have broken down every old theory of the weakness, the incompetence, and the "proper place" of women, have not been called upon.

A COMMITTEE OF WOMEN.

It has been suggested that in making use of women's services, a committee of women who have proved themselves by service during the war, as well as some of the tested women officials already in the Government service, should be appointed, with power of co-option, to enrol and draft women in non-essential employment into companies of workers where they could exercise their training, their education, and their natural abilities to the greatest economic advantage of the country. This work can only be organized by a picked committee of women with a knowledge of labour problems, who would have no axe to grind, and would be appointed solely on their own merits, not because they were related or known to persons in high positions. How easily such a committee could be collected is apparent from the most hurried survey of women's work since the war. If it were not invidious it would be a simple matter to give the names of a few such women.

In none of the channels approached for views on Mr. Chamberlain's proposals was there the slightest attempt at the glorification of women for what they have done since the war. It was taken as a matter of course; but it was apparent that women felt that vested interests and prejudice should not interfere to prevent them from serving their country to the best of their ability in the near future.

Lady Frances Balfour said that any scheme which separated the sexes, as the preliminary draft of Mr. Neville Chamberlain's scheme apparently did, was bound to break down. "You cannot separate civilians into sexes when calling upon them for national service," she said, "and it was quite unnecessary, as no difference was made in the original census. This introduction of sex makes an artificial difference which is bound to render the scheme inefficient. The ideal scheme would include the whole people at once on the same basis. That would answer to me the only way to enrol workers for national service."

"GRAVE DIFFICULTIES."

Miss Christobel Ellis, the commandant of the motor-transport section of the Women's Legion (of which Lady Londonderry is president), which has supplied women as chauffeurs in considerable numbers to the War Office, and has also sent many women as camp cooks and to replace men in khaki doing purely civilian work, criticized the new scheme as follows:—"It does not strike me as a scheme which is likely to help the military authorities to any great extent, or to please an energetic man like Lord Derby. Private women's organizations like ours have done a great deal to help substitution, but these proposals seem likely to put grave difficulties in our way.

"From the first draft of the scheme it looks as if employers would be able to force men over military age to take places which might be filled by young energetic women. The experience of employers since the war has been that old men and boys are less efficient than women, while women (in new employments) are less efficient than the men they replace. How the stimulation of the substitution of men for men is going to help the military authorities is not apparent. It will place a premium on antediluvian methods, and give no inducement to energetic young women to go on doing their best to replace men in the quality and pace of their work.

"A good plan for using women's labour to the best advantage would seem to be to ask all women doing non-essential work to place themselves at the disposal of a committee of women of proved capacity for the purposes of substitution or of urgently needed industrial and agricultural work. Something much more satisfactory than this suggested scheme is needed, and at once."

Miss Mary Macarthur, secretary of the Federation of Women Workers, said it was indeed a strange thing to draft a preliminary substitution scheme omitting all mention of women. "It would be," she said, "a splendid thing for women if, when a scheme is formulated, they too should have at least a minimum living wage, and 17s. 6d. a week extra when away from home, as Mr. Chamberlain promises his civilian men. It would mean a revolution in women's wages."

WORK OF CLASSIFICATION.

Miss Philippa Strachey, at "Women's Service," 58, Victoria-street, the voluntary organization which has placed 22,000 women, many of them in substitution posts, since the beginning of the war, and to which the Government Departments have appealed for their carefully selected women time after time, said that to leave out women in any preliminary announcement seemed a very great omission. "The reason probably is," she said, "that it is much easier to make a preliminary classification of men than of women: they can tell you what they were doing last. Women do not fall into natural classifications in the same way, and consequently have to be carefully dealt with.

"It is absolutely vital, in whatever scheme may be devised, to have women in the high administrative positions, so that they may select and enrol the women who will be needed. There is far too great an effort being made to suggest educated women for drudgery of every kind—for digging and filling shells, for instance—when they could do better work as substitutes for men in the higher branches of the civil service. There are many obvious names of women who have done splendid work since the beginning of the war who could be called upon to serve on such a committee of women."

Miss Susan Lawrence, L.C.C., was doubtful, speaking from the Labour point of view, as to the advisability of any new enrolment of women at all. "As far as I know," she said, "there is no demand that cannot be satisfied by ordinary industrial channels where decent wages are given. The whole question of women workers is the wages question. Given a decent living wage, which takes into consideration the great rise in prices, women will appear in sufficient numbers to satisfy any industrial demand."

PLAIN ENGLISH.

We are glad that Mr. Neville Chamberlain has lost no time in explaining that his National Service scheme has been misunderstood. It was, of course, realised that no attempt to effect an industrial mobilisation could succeed unless women were included. It must, however, be remembered that the machinery at Mr. Neville Chamberlain's disposal is necessarily limited and elementary, and that at present he has no means of dealing with the enormous rush that would certainly follow a call for women volunteers. Time is, none the less, of paramount importance. The nation must put forth its full strength at once, and to ensure the immediate organisation of woman labour expert women organisers should be employed. There are numbers of such women who would be proud to lend their aid, and there are existing societies that might be adapted to form part of the national machinery. In an interview in another column Mrs. Strachey summarises the advantages of women organisers for women, and, incidentally, she repeats the warning against calling for volunteers before it is approximately known how many workers are wanted and where they are wanted. We realise that voluntarism has some advantages, but we are convinced that compulsion will have to come, and we fear the waste of time that is threatened by hesitation to use the only rational method of solving the labour problem. The great point about compulsion is that it is just. Even if the amount of labour required could be obtained without it, it is clear that industries that should, in the nation's interest, be left alone would be hampered, while others of far less importance would continue to flourish. Voluntarism is necessarily haphazard, and the successful war equipment of the nation must follow a calculated plan.

The best way is the only way. Unhappily, there is still a tendency to adhere to old methods and manners even in the newest Government departments. The success of the Government's policy depends on the hearty co-operation of the people, and this co-operation is rendered impossible when official instructions are issued in involved language that no plain man can hope to understand. Lord Devonport's latest milk order, of which we print an example this morning resembles a trust deed in its turgid legal phraseology. Why not state the price of milk clearly, instead of commanding that it shall not exceed "by more than the amount hereinafter named the price of the article at the date hereinafter specified"? In these great human days our rulers should put on humanity. Precedent and tradition should be discarded. Blunt common sense both in speech and action is necessary for victory. We wonder if Lord Devonport ever saw the thing that was sent to the Press for publication to-day.

Birmingham Daily Post 29-1-17

Daily Mail 31-1-17

National Service.

The scheme for which Mr. Neville Chamberlain is responsible will be before the public probably within the next few days. Meanwhile, the outline of the scheme which newspaper readers have already had presented to them has produced a certain amount of criticism that is perhaps no more accurate or well founded than premature criticism usually is. Some of Mr. Neville Chamberlain's critics fastened on the fact that the announcements made on Saturday morning concerned only the male population. They seriously misconceived the statement that there was not to be a simultaneous appeal to men and women to volunteer for national service, and straightway declared that the scheme was defective because women were not included. That this was an extraordinary misconception was made plain later in the day by the National Service Department. It was officially stated that a scheme for making use of the services of women was actually in course of preparation and its details would shortly be made known. Obviously there can be no complete scheme for utilising the national resources that does not take account of the labour power which the large numbers of capable unemployed women can bring to bear. Obviously, too, no national scheme for utilising women's labour can be devised and put into operation as speedily as a scheme for dealing with male labour. The creation of a national army of women workers suggests special problems of accommodation, supervision, and welfare that cannot satisfactorily be dealt with in haste. Meanwhile the main and most pressing need in the scheme of National Service is the provision of adequate male labour in the great industries essential for the vigorous prosecution of the war and the feeding of the people. And it is to the methods by which that labour is proposed to be provided that criticism to be useful should at present be directed. The principle of Mr. Chamberlain's scheme, as outlined, is that enrolment for service is to be voluntary. That may or may not be satisfactory; we hope that it will yield all that is expected from it, and that volunteers will come forward in the numbers necessary to meet all the demands which will be made on the munition works, the coal mines, the shipyards, transport, and agriculture. If the required amount of labour is not thus made available Parliament, in accordance with the Prime Minister's pledge, will be asked to give the Government other powers to secure all the labour necessary. Resort to compulsion may be avoided if a clear explanation is forthcoming in regard to difficulties which must arise immediately the voluntary scheme begins to be operative. Already, from what is known of it, there emerge points about which employers and employed alike may reasonably desire further information. It is not yet clear, for instance, whether men now engaged in work of national importance are to be asked to volunteer. One of the unofficial versions of the Department's proposals states that "men engaged in trades of national importance who volunteer will not at present be transferred to other occupations. If, however, it is shown that there is an excess of skilled labour in a particular factory such a man will be transferred to another factory in the same district." Until the position of persons occupied in trades of national importance is made clear they, as well as those engaged in non-essential industries, must experience some natural uneasiness as to the probable outcome of the new upheaval. Employers whose workers are called up for transfer to some other factory or occupation are to be given a right of appeal to the local Commissioners to be appointed. But if this means that they are again to go through all the procedure experienced under the Military Service Tribunals they will hardly find the outlook encouraging. Nor do we think it likely that a great many employers will be enamoured of the idea that not only should they encourage their workmen to place their services at the disposal of the State, but also should undertake to make up deficiencies in the wages of transferred men. There are other points in the scheme which require elucidation, and it is to be hoped that the publication of the full details will be accompanied by an explanation as complete as possible in regard to matters which at present

THE MAN AND WOMAN MUDDLE.

FROM LADY FRANCES BALFOUR.

To the Editor of The Daily Mail.

Sir,—Mr. Neville Chamberlain's draft scheme for national civilian service does not include civilian women.

We hear of another department "to be set up in a few days to deal with 'women volunteers.'" If anything serious is intended by this draft scheme, and on paper it has the appearance of being neither practical nor intended for use, what possible reason can there be for yet another department, lodged this time in all probability in the largest county asylum which can be commandeered?

If women are to replace men, and elderly men and women of all ages to be called upon to release the fighting men, how can the work of the two sexes be bound up separately in red-tape departments? We want to know how many women are available for the defence of the home life in the same proportion as we want to know what military service can still be rendered by men. Women were trained or have trained themselves for every trade and industry which must be maintained if the State "stuff" is to be replenished.

To consider this "service" apart from men's service is merely to duplicate departments and to overlap and muddle within them. Mr. Neville Chamberlain assures the public he has not overlooked the services women have already rendered. That is very gracious and it is a new departure, for the name of Chamberlain has stood for two generations for all that is against the recognition of women's service or women's rights. Women want not compliments, however oily. They want to see their services accepted and used economically, and not be subjected to the muddle and waste caused by an individual's prejudices.

FRANCES BALFOUR.

NATIONAL SERVICE

WOMEN TO BE INCLUDED.

Exception is taken by Mr. Neville Chamberlain to the attitude of a section of the Press in their criticism of the scheme for the utilisation of the nation's resources, and particularly to that part having reference to women in National Service. Seen by a Press representative on Saturday, an official of the National Service Department said that Mr. Chamberlain's intention with regard to employing the services of women had been misunderstood. A scheme for utilising women's aid was actually in course of preparation, he continued, and the work, which was making good progress, was being dealt with by the staff. In the scheme submitted to the Cabinet there was a clause providing that the enrolment of women should be part of the scheme, which would be put into operation as soon as they had the machinery for the enrolment of men in full working order. "The Prime Minister," he added, "has given a pledge that a voluntary scheme should be tried, and if that fails then Parliament must be consulted for further powers. To those who are out for industrial compulsion at once, no doubt any voluntary effort, whether perfect or imperfect, is unsatisfactory. The National Service Department is making every endeavour to secure success by a voluntary scheme, and it will be all the better for the nation and everybody if voluntaryism can carry the day, especially as the time in which to secure volunteers is of the utmost importance." It was also pointed out by the official that the dealing with the scheme for men must take precedence, but it was wrong to assert that women had been ignored or were to be excluded from service.

The National Voluntary Service scheme applies for the moment to men of between 18 and 60 years of age, who will be asked to inform the Director-General by means of letter cards, which will be supplied, the kind of work they are engaged upon and the kind of work they are prepared to undertake in the national interest, munitions and agriculture being the principal work for which labour is urgently required. Each man will be paid the trade union rate of wages of the district in which he is employed, and if he should be ordered to a district other than that in which he resides he will receive a subsistence allowance of 17s. 6d. per week if the removal involve the upkeep of two households. A man of military age may volunteer and so soon as he is called up he will be released to join the Colours. National Service will not excuse military service.

women was actually in course of preparation and its details would shortly be made known. Obviously there can be no complete scheme for utilising the national resources that does not take account of the labour power which the large numbers of capable unemployed women can bring to bear. Obviously, too, no national scheme for utilising women's labour can be devised and put into operation as speedily as a scheme for dealing with male labour. The creation of a national army of women workers suggests special problems of accommodation, supervision, and welfare that cannot satisfactorily be dealt with in haste. Meanwhile the main and most pressing need in the scheme of National Service is the provision of adequate male labour in the great industries essential for the vigorous prosecution of the war and the feeding of the people. And it is to the methods by which that labour is proposed to be provided that criticism to be useful should at present be directed. The principle of Mr. Chamberlain's scheme, as outlined, is that enrolment for service is to be voluntary. That may or may not be satisfactory; we hope that it will yield all that is expected from it, and that volunteers will come forward in the numbers necessary to meet all the demands which will be made on the munition works, the coal mines, the shipyards, transport, and agriculture. If the required amount of labour is not thus made available Parliament, in accordance with the Prime Minister's pledge, will be asked to give the Government other powers to secure all the labour necessary. Resort to compulsion may be avoided if a clear explanation is forthcoming in regard to difficulties which must arise immediately the voluntary scheme begins to be operative. Already, from what is known of it, there emerge points about which employers and employed alike may reasonably desire further information. It is not yet clear, for instance, whether men now engaged in work of national importance are to be asked to volunteer. One of the unofficial versions of the Department's proposals states that "men engaged in trades of national importance who volunteer will not at present be transferred to other occupations. If, however, it is shown that there is an excess of skilled labour in a particular factory such a man will be transferred to another factory in the same district." Until the position of persons occupied in trades of national importance is made clear they, as well as those engaged in non-essential industries, must experience some natural uneasiness as to the probable outcome of the new upheaval. Employers whose workers are called up for transfer to some other factory or occupation are to be given a right of appeal to the local Commissioners to be appointed. But if this means that they are again to go through all the procedure experienced under the Military Service Tribunals they will hardly find the outlook encouraging. Nor do we think it likely that a great many employers will be enamoured of the idea that not only should they encourage their workmen to place their services at the disposal of the State, but also should undertake to make up deficiencies in the wages of transferred men. There are other points in the scheme which require elucidation, and it is to be hoped that the publication of the full details will be accompanied by an explanation as complete as possible in relation to matters which at present suggest misgivings.

---

what military service can still be rendered by men. Women were trained or have trained themselves for every trade and industry which must be maintained if the State "stuff" is to be replenished.

To consider this "service" apart from men's service is merely to duplicate departments and to overlap and muddle within them. Mr. Neville Chamberlain assures the public he has not overlooked the services women have already rendered. That is very gracious and it is a new departure, for the name of Chamberlain has stood for two generations for all that is against the recognition of women's service or women's rights. Women want not compliments, however oily. They want to see their services accepted and used economically, and not be subjected to the muddle and waste caused by an individual's prejudices.

FRANCES BALFOUR.

NATIONAL SERVICE

WOMEN TO BE INCLUDED.

Exception is taken by Mr. Neville Chamberlain to the attitude of a section of the Press in their criticism of the scheme for the utilisation of the nation's resources, and particularly to that part having reference to women in National Service. Seen by a Press representative on Saturday, an official of the National Service Department said that Mr. Chamberlain's intention with regard to employing the services of women had been misunderstood. A scheme for utilising women's aid was actually in course of preparation, he continued, and the work, which was making good progress, was being dealt with by the staff. In the scheme submitted to the Cabinet there was a clause providing that the enrolment of women should be part of the scheme, which would be put into operation as soon as they had the machinery for the enrolment of men in full working order. "The Prime Minister," he added, "has given a pledge that a voluntary scheme should be tried, and if that fails then Parliament must be consulted for further powers. To those who are out for industrial compulsion at once, no doubt any voluntary effort, whether perfect or imperfect, is unsatisfactory. The National Service Department is making every endeavour to secure success by a voluntary scheme, and it will be all the better for the nation and everybody if voluntaryism can carry the day, especially as the time in which to secure volunteers is of the utmost importance." It was also pointed out by the official that the dealing with the scheme for men must take precedence, but it was wrong to assert that women had been ignored or were to be excluded from service.

The National Voluntary Service scheme applies for the moment to men of between 18 and 60 years of age, who will be asked to inform the Director-General by means of letter cards, which will be supplied, the kind of work they are engaged upon and the kind of work they are prepared to undertake in the national interest, munitions and agriculture being the principal work for which labour is urgently required. Each man will be paid the trade union rate of wages of the district in which he is employed, and if he should be ordered to a district other than that in which he resides he will receive a subsistence allowance of 17s. 6d. per week if the removal involve the upkeep of two households. A man of military age may volunteer and so soon as he is called up he will be released to join the Colours. National Service will not excuse military service.

Daily Mail
30-1-17

Daily Chronicle 30 1 17

682/7

MAN & WOMAN POWER.

MR. N. CHAMBERLAIN'S PLANS.

AUTHORITY TO STOP TRADES.

20,000 WOMEN WANTED.

By OUR POLITICAL CORRESPONDENT.

The facts contained in the following article have been obtained from a responsible authority, and may be regarded as the official reply to some of the criticisms of Mr. Neville Chamberlain's scheme of National Service, an outline of which was published in all the newspapers on Saturday.

The criticisms have been directed mainly against the delay that must elapse before the scheme can be proved a success or otherwise on a voluntary basis, and the non-inclusion of women. In the statement below the possibility of an indirect form of compulsion, through the stoppage of certain trades, is foreshadowed.

When Mr. Neville Chamberlain accepted the position of Director-General of National Service he was bound by the statement made by the Prime Minister in the House of Commons to the effect that a voluntary scheme must be tried before any system of compulsion can be adopted.

There is good reason to believe that Mr. Lloyd George had made a promise to this effect to the Labour leaders before they joined the new Government, and that any attempt to vary it might place the Labour Ministers in a very awkward position. Whoever demands a compulsory scheme now must, according to the responsible authority, remember the official Labour attitude, and consider the possible results. On the other hand, this attitude imposes on Labour leaders and organisers everywhere an additional obligation to work for the success of the voluntary scheme.

APPEAL TO EMPLOYERS.

It is impossible at present to fix any definite total of men required to ensure success for the scheme or to declare any date by which a certain number must be obtained. That all depends on the duration of the war. The Director-General of National Service must have from the military authorities a statement of the number of recruits they require each month. He must then consider from what industries they are to be obtained and provide substitutes for them.

If the war is prolonged beyond a certain length it is obvious that the response to the appeal made under the voluntary system, after all the useless volunteers have been rejected, may be insufficient to supply the demanded total of substitutes, and in that case Mr. Chamberlain will not hesitate to ask the Prime Minister for compulsory powers. But he hopes that with general good will the response may be sufficient for the present.

The most important point is to secure the good will of employers so that they will make it easy for their men to volunteer. Every volunteer will receive seven days' notice before being called on for work, and in that time his employer may, if he chooses, appeal to the Local Director of National Service for permission to retain the man on the ground that he is

NATIONAL SCHEME ON WRONG LINES.

VOLUNTARY BASIS ONLY FOR THE MAN-POWER REGISTER.

WHY NOT COMPULSORY?

POWER OF WOMEN ABSOLUTELY IGNORED.

Mr. Neville Chamberlain, the Director-General of National Service, has now completed his plans for the mobilisation of a new industrial army.

The "Daily Express" understands that Mr. Chamberlain intends to call on all men from eighteen to sixty to offer their services voluntarily to the nation. The scheme will embrace the whole of England, Wales, and Scotland, but not Ireland. It contains two grave flaws:—

It is left to every man to decide for himself whether he is to report the nature of his present work.

The enormous woman-power of the nation is absolutely ignored.

Women's services in the war have proved invaluable. Despite this, women, it is believed, will be excluded from the operation of the scheme. All that will be done is to set up a special department to arrange for their enrolment if the necessity should arise!

Official details of the scheme will be published almost immediately.

ENROLMENT BY LETTER CARD.

PLEDGE THAT WILL BE REQUIRED.

We understand that for the purpose of compiling the register of workers it has been decided to divide Great Britain into seven areas, of which Wales and Scotland will each be one, while five will be established in England. A commissioner will be appointed to direct the work in each area. Rather than set up an entirely new organisation it has been decided to make use of the existing machinery of the labour exchanges, and also to seek the co-operation of the local and municipal authorities.

Mr. Chamberlain, it is believed, has decided that the enrolment of volunteers shall not take place at local centres, such as town halls or other public buildings. This method might lead to a repetition of the unfortunate scenes which attended the voluntary attestation of recruits for the Army, when long queues were kept waiting in the streets often in pouring rain. Instead, a special form of letter-card has been printed, which will be obtainable at any post office, and will also be sent to all public bodies for broadcast distribution.

In this letter-card volunteers will be asked to state their name, employer, trade, and other details regarding the special form of employment for which they consider they are suited. It will also contain a form of undertaking, which they will be asked to sign, placing their services unreservedly at the disposal of the nation.

VOLUNTEERS.

All letter-cards will be returnable to the Director-General's office in London, where they will be classified and redistributed to the areas to which they relate. Each of the seven district commissioners will be assisted by deputies, whose work it will be to organise local committees.

Volunteers will then be invited to appear before the committee to state exactly what they think they are capable of doing. Every effort will be made to provide work in the district in which the applicant resides, but no dustries in which the rate of pay is not so high as the men are now receiving they will undertake to grant them some monetary assistance, and also to keep their places open for them in order that they may return when the war is over.

Men of military age who hold exemption certificates on the ground of indispensability will be asked to enrol in the same way as men over military age. If, after inquiry by the district commissioner, substitutes can be found for them, they will be released for service in the Army. It is hoped that many desirable recruits may be obtained in this way.

"SHELTERING" FIT MEN.

THE SCANDAL OF YOUNG CIVIL SERVANTS.

The Hammersmith Tribunal has followed the example of the Westminster City Council in demanding that all fit men of military age in Government departments should be compelled to appear before tribunals. At yesterday's meeting of the tribunal Mr. H. Harris proposed the following resolution, which was carried unanimously:—

"The Hammersmith Military Tribunal unanimously records its endorsement of the action of the Westminster City Council in calling on the Government to consider the question of at once terminating the scandal of Government employees being accorded preferential treatment over the general public in respect of appearance before their local tribunals under the Military Service Act and other regulations, as this unjust method of sheltering employees in Government offices is not only unfair to private employers of labour and workers, but also a menace to the national interest."

It was decided to send copies of the resolution to the Premier, the Secretary of State for War, and the President of the Board of Trade.

"COMBING OUT" THE MINERS.

The new "comb-out" of miners began in the South Wales coalfield yesterday. A travelling medical board visited Pontypridd, and examined nearly a hundred men who had entered the Maritime Colliery since August 1913. It was stated that a large percentage of the men were passed for general service. Later in the day the medical board visited Kingstown and examined about 150 eligibles.

Mr. William Straker, secretary of the Northumberland Miners, stated in an interview yesterday that the calling up of miners for military service would have a tremendous effect on the output of coal.

The most important point is to secure the good will of employers so that they will make it easy for their men to volunteer. Every volunteer will receive seven days' notice before being called on for work, and in that time his employer may, if he choose, appeal to the Local Director of National Service for permission to retain the man on the ground that he is engaged on work of national importance.

SORTING OUT INDUSTRIES.

A classification of industries into varying degrees of national importance is being rapidly completed. It is a difficult task, because even different branches of one industry are of varying importance.

It is probable that in connection with this there will be a very considerable extension of the priority system in force at the Ministry of Munitions. Under this system the Ministry classifies each job of work at a controlled establishment according to its relative importance to the nation. Thus a Class A job must be done before a Class B, a Class B before a Class C, and so on. This scheme the Director of National Service proposes to apply to other industries, deciding what work shall have priority, and even ordering that certain classes of work shall not be done at all.

One or two examples will best illustrate what is contemplated. A firm of printers, for instance, engaged on work for the Government and work for private individuals may be ordered to give priority to the Government work and not to do any private work till it is completed. A firm partly engaged on Government contracts and employing a number of badged and a number of unbadged men over military age may be ordered to devote their men entirely to Government work. In this way the elder men will provide substitutes for the badged men, who will be released for the Army.

As an example of an even more drastic method, the Director might forbid any employer to employ men in domestic service or similarly unnecessary occupations after a certain period.

Powers sufficient for all these schemes are already in existence under the Defence of the Realm Act, under which the Director can declare that the continuance of a particular trade is not in the public interest. It must not be understood that tributed to the areas to which they relate. Each of the seven district commissioners will be assisted by deputies, whose work it will be to organise local committees

Volunteers will then be invited to appear before the committee to state exactly what they think they are capable of doing. Every effort will be made to provide work in the district in which the applicant resides, but no guarantee will be given in this respect.

As regards pay, it will be found that Mr. Chamberlain has decided that volunteers shall be paid the standard rate of wage in the industry in which they are employed. A minimum wage is, however, to be established, and in the event of a man having to be sent to some other district than that in which he resides he will be granted a subsistence allowance of 17s. 6d. a week.

Only volunteers who can give their whole time are asked for. Part-time employment cannot be entertained at the present owing to the vast amount of extra organisation which this would entail. Seven days' notice will be given to every volunteer before he is called on to undertake new work During this period his employer will be entitled to appeal to the local commissioner, who will finally decide whether the volunteer's work is of national importance.

RECRUITING.

As soon as the scheme is officially announced a great recruiting campaign will be undertaken throughout the country. Public meetings will be held in every city, town, and country district to urge every one who is not at present engaged in essential industries—such as shipbuilding, coal mining, agriculture, munition-making, and transport—to place his name on the register.

Mr. Chamberlain's task, as he stated in his speech at Birmingham last week, is to find a man for every job.

"My volunteers," he then said, "will not better their position. On the contrary, I am going to ask them to put up with hardship and sacrifice. Who is there who thinks of the hardships and the sacrifices that are being endured by our brave comrades in the trenches who will not be anxious to make the very much smaller sacrifice for which I am going to ask?"

Employers will be called on to make sacrifices no less than their men. It is hoped that when they are asked to surrender employees for more essential in-in the South Wales coalfield yesterday. A travelling medical board visited Pontypridd, and examined nearly a hundred men who had entered the Maritime Colliery since August 1915. It was stated that a large percentage of the men were passed for general service. Later in the day the medical board visited Kingstown and examined about 150 eligibles.

Mr. William Straker, secretary of the Northumberland Miners, stated in an interview yesterday that the calling up of miners for military service would have a tremenmous effect on the output of coal.

YOUTHS OF 18.

The posters calling up youths of eighteen will be circulated in London and throughout the country on Tuesday.

"FAIRY TALES."

The Wareham (Dorset) Borough Tribunal has adjourned for three months all cases of married and business men "as a protest against a recent decision of the county appeal tribunal."

The opinion was expressed that it was a great hardship that married men who spoke the truth before the tribunal should be sent into the Army, while single men who "had fairy tales told for them" at the county tribunal obtained exemptions.

"It is a case of the bigger the liar the better the luck," said a member.

The Times
30-1-17

CIVILIANS FOR WAR WORK.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN'S PLANS.

WOMAN'S PLACE.

(FROM OUR PARLIAMENTARY CORRESPONDENT.)

It is understood that Mr. Neville Chamberlain hopes to launch his scheme of national civilian service at a great meeting in London in a few days' time.

The classification of industries as essential and non-essential is nearing completion. It is probable that Mr. Chamberlain will adopt the "priority" system used by the Ministry of Munitions. Under this system the Director of National Service will give priority to certain work and order that some categories of work should not be proceeded with. Firms might be ordered to give priority to Government work over private work, or even to do nothing but Government work.

The Defence of the Realm Act gives Mr. Chamberlain the necessary powers for this drastic action. Under the terms of the Act he could declare that the continuance of particular trades during the war was not in the public interest. These powers will no doubt be exercised if the appeal for volunteers should not provide the required number of substitutes. The moment, too, such a contingency arises, it is understood that Mr. Chamberlain would ask the Prime Minister to give him compulsory powers for the enforcement of national civilian service on individuals. The success of the voluntary effort is held to depend chiefly upon the duration of the war.

Mr. Chamberlain expects to be in a position to give details of his scheme for women volunteers in the course of this week. The women's problem is complicated by the recruiting activities of other Departments. Yesterday the Ministry of Munitions made an urgent appeal for 8,000 women for shell-filling factories. It was explained that no special training or skill was required; that the age limits were between 18 and 40; that the hours were from 54 to 65 a week; and that the average wages were from 27s. to 30s. a week. Another appeal will be made to-day on the same terms for 20,000 women, and applications can be made through any employment exchange.

The Board of Agriculture, on the other hand, decided yesterday to ask Mr. Chamberlain in future to supply them with women workers for the land. The Board have hitherto recruited and trained their own labour.

Half a million letter-cards for the enrolment of male volunteers are to be sent immediately to post-offices throughout Great Britain for distribution.

SERVICE FOR WOMEN.

STATEMENT BY MR. CHAMBERLAIN.

Mr. Chamberlain discussed with a representative of The Times yesterday the reasons for the omission of women from the first draft of his scheme—an omission which caused widespread disappointment and sharp criticism.

Mr. Chamberlain said:—

The schemes for using women for national service are not yet so forward that they can be published, but it is quite a mistake to imagine that for a moment there was ever any idea of excluding them. From the first I have always contemplated that their services should be used, and I have only decided to deal with men first because the unsatisfied demand for men is greater than that for women, and the problem of using their services is much simpler.

Any one who knows what has already been done is aware of the large number of agreements made between employers and workpeople dealing with the substitution of women for men in many industries. It is not possible to introduce women into industries where they are not already employed without making very careful preparation beforehand. At the beginning of last year the Board of Trade issued a general appeal to women to volunteer for war service. This appeal was eagerly responded to, but it was found possible to place only a small proportion of those who came forward, and much disappointment and irritation ensued. I am anxious that there should be no repetition of this occurrence, and I intend to deal with the utilization of women's service strictly in relation to specific demands for it.

There is, however, one special direction in which probably the service of women can be used without delay in connexion with the Army both at home and abroad. In this it is necessary for me to work in close cooperation with the War Office, and I hope before many days I may be able to make known my proposals for this purpose.

TOO LATE A BEGINNING.

In reply to questions, Mr. CHAMBERLAIN said he intended to set up a committee of representative women, and the selection of the women to be utilized in national service would be made by women. In his opinion nothing could be done on any other lines. He added:—

"I think several committees of women will have to be set up to deal with many sides of the labour problem. On these committees every woman's society which has authority to speak for women will be represented. I have not as yet talked with any representatives of women's societies as such, though I have seen some representative women who belong to women's societies. I intend to consult the women's labour organizations—there is no one more firmly convinced of the importance of their point of view. I have a big job in dealing with the complex and differing problems of women's service, and I don't want to make mistakes through too great haste."

Asked whether the same rates of pay given to men would be offered to women, Mr. CHAMBERLAIN said his women's committees would report to him their views on this matter. Everything would be done by women and through women, and it was very likely that decentralized committees of women would be set up in different districts, who would have the power of dealing with the problems of their districts. He added:—"A great deal depends on our getting the right women for the administrative side of the scheme. It is not unlikely that we may have to have a lower age-limit for women than for men. At present our plans are rough and ready; we have not had any time to begin. We have begun too late with everything."

"Is your idea to invite women to come from non-essential trades and offer themselves for service in essential ones?"

"At present," answered Mr. Chamberlain, "I am engaged in going through the various trades and in separating the less essential from the more essential. We may be able to put pressure on the less essential, but we must keep in view the fact that the products of certain apparently non-essential manufactures play their part in export in keeping up the exchanges."

Daily Mail
2-2-17

ALL WOMEN MUST SERVE.

To the Editor of The Daily Mail.

Sir,—The news that women are to be mobilised will, I feel certain, be warmly welcomed by thousands of women who are struggling not merely to do war work but to earn a decent living.

While wages in the lower grades of work have, since the war, risen enormously to meet the increased demand for such work, it is my experience that posts paid at a minimum, say, of 50s. a week are far fewer now than in pre-war days. This view was confirmed some little time ago in conversation with one of the chief officials of the Unemployment Department of the Board of Trade. "Semi-skilled or quite unskilled woman's labour is in enormous demand, but the highly educated, trained, and experienced women are almost a drug in the market as far as the chance of a living wage is concerned," I was told.

It is these trained and experienced women who will welcome the news that they are to be mobilised in the near future. Mobilisation, one imagines, will mean that the Government finds board, lodging, uniform, and a small wage in return for labour; and I maintain that sufficient food (I emphasise the word "sufficient"), decent lodgings, suitable clothing, and fares cannot to-day be had for £2 a week—the normal wage offered to an educated woman by both the Government and private employers on the calm assumption that some one else is providing their employees with food and lodging.

R. LE CLERC PHILLIPS.

21, Porchester-gardens, W.

FROM SIR RICHARD BURBIDGE.

To the Editor of The Daily Mail.

Sir,—Lest, arising out of what is doubtless an excusable delay, any sort of question should arise as to the potential value of womenfolk in the prosecution of the war, may I venture to call wider attention to the remarkable series of photographs being exhibited at Harrods now and until Saturday under the auspices of the Ministry of Munitions? These photographs show, with unforgettable impressiveness, what womenfolk are already doing, and, unless I am much mistaken, they make an almost irresistible appeal to every patriotic woman who sees them to hasten "and do likewise."

RICH. BURBIDGE,
Managing Director, Harrods, Ltd.

The Times
1 · 2 · 17

New Witness
1 - 2 - 17

682

WAR SERVICE FOR WOMEN.

MRS. TENNANT'S NEW POST.

As is officially announced on another page, Mr. Neville Chamberlain has appointed Mrs. H. J. Tennant Director of the Women's Department of National Service and Miss Violet Markham Assistant-Director. Both have been actively engaged on Government schemes concerned with the activities of women since the beginning of the war, and were energetic members of the Queen's Work for Women Fund.

To-day Mrs. Tennant and Miss Markham will be accommodated with offices and secretaries at St. Ermin's Hotel, the headquarters of the National Service Department, and will begin their task of getting together effective machinery for securing women of the right kind for substitution work and of using woman-power of every kind in the most profitable way. They are keenly alive to the importance of their task, and yesterday expressed to a representative of The Times their hope that a certain amount of forbearance would be extended to them until they get their plans under way. They consider it quite possible that the winning of the war may depend on the response of the women and the way their services are used, and they deprecate any demand for an immediate statement of a ready-made scheme, urging that a few days must be given them to call together the women who can give them the best administrative help. The committees foreshadowed by Mr. Chamberlain in a recent statement published in these columns have not yet been formed, but their constitution will be announced at the earliest possible moment.

Mrs. Tennant is anxious that because women who know their help will be of use are not appealed to within 24 hours they should not imagine that they are left out of the plans of the Department. She said :— "We have to take our part in securing the release of a large number of men needed immediately for the Army. The further substitution of women throughout the country in many industries means in most cases a change of process, and there are great difficulties to be overcome which makes an early statement of what we may do extremely unwise. We do not know ourselves, as yet."

The Young Woman's Day.

In reply to a question as to the kind of women most needed, Mrs. Tennant gave as an instance the strong young woman who had not as yet done any real work, but had contented herself with spending a short time at voluntary work each week. "We want new workers, rather than a further vast displacement. We shall offer a great chance to the young women to prove themselves, but we shall only call them up as they are wanted. We shall need the help of every phase of the women's movement, and we regard the cooperation of the great women's labour organizations as of the utmost importance. We cannot do our best unless we have the unselfish help of a vast number of women, and we are asking for this cooperation on the most generous and patriotic scale, leaving aside all the differences of policy which existed before the war.

As proof of the great reserve of women still available, Miss Markham pointed to the recent Board of Trade figures, which show that less than a million women have come newly into industry since the beginning of the war. "What has been going on," she said, "has been mainly a displacement from the typical women's trades of the less well-paid kinds, into the newer and better-paid work of munition-making and substitution jobs in men's trades. There must be a vast number of young women who have not yet treated the war seriously. We shall want the young part-time woman to become a whole-time worker, and we shall want young, vigorous women, doing easy voluntary work, to leave that to others and come out and do what elderly women cannot do. But we want to avoid calling for any numbers until we know more as to where they are wanted and for what kind of work. Substitution and dilution are not done by calling up vast numbers of new women at a time. We have no intention of disappointing women by calling for them before we have the work to offer them."

It is not unlikely that the voluntary aid detachments, which have done excellent work during the last two years and a half, may be drawn into the women's side of National Service. Already they are losing many of their members at the call of paid war work. There are 50,000 beds in auxiliary and V.A.D. hospitals staffed by unpaid women, many of them trained nurses who have returned to their profession since the war began. In Wiltshire recently the members of voluntary aid detachments were leaving them for farm work and in the batch of women carpenters who have just gone to France were three London V.A.D. members. There are 80,000 women on the register at Devonshire House, and it is felt that if they were brought under the National Service scheme, many of the part-time women would find it possible to become "whole-timers." A proportion of voluntary workers, not suitable for very hard work, may be drafted into State service as members of care-committees or helpers in infant welfare schemes.

Mr. Neville Chamberlain has stated that at the present moment he sees no reason for the conscription of women for industrial purposes, and does not propose to call them up till the necessity arrives. The Daily Mail, however, is very angry at what seems to us to be an entirely reasonable decision and is screaming in headlines for the immediate mobilization of all women not employed in the making of munitions or trades of national importance. At the present moment, according to parliamentary statements, the Board of Trade and Chamber of Commerce Returns, some 1,500,000 women have been recruited for industrial and commercial work since the opening of the campaign. Of this number it is estimated some 400,000 are engaged in the making of munitions, the remaining million being employed in clerical work, in restaurants, agriculture and as teachers and nurses. The majority of these, it is suggested by Harmsworth, should be taken from their situations and pitchforked into the making of armaments or the raising of food. This means that the commerce of England, already heavily handicapped by the inevitable drain of men, would be brought almost to a standstill. Furthermore, it would of necessity follow that the number of married women with young children who, at present, work out of their homes, would be largely increased with the very gravest results to the well-being of their families. A further result of such conscription would be that women who are at present earning decent wages would be taken from their employment outside munition factories, and set to work which would bring them in a much lower rate of pay. It is announced in the Press that some 80,000 women are required immediately, 20,000 being wanted for munition work. The latter must be between the ages of sixteen and forty and their wages will average from 27s. to 30s. for a week of fifty-four to sixty-five working hours. Now it is obvious that conscription would not apply to people in possession of incomes, and that the majority of the 80,000 women now demanded would be taken from those already employed andpresumably earning wages in excess of those offered by the Government. It seems to us unlikely that on this occasion the Ministry will be stampeded by the Harmsworth Press. If, however, Mr. George carries out Lord Northcliffe's order, the present difficult industrial condition will become more complicated and the gravest injustice perpetrated on th eworking woman.

Common Cause
2·2·17

682

682/10

National Service for Men (and Women).

The announcement of the proposals of the Director of National Service for organising the man-power of the nation were greeted with very severe criticism by the Press. The criticisms were largely based upon the fact that while calling upon men between the ages of eighteen and sixty to volunteer for national service, he announced that women were not wanted yet, but might be dealt with later. The tone of his announcement is much to be deplored, but, nevertheless, in spite of much justice in the attacks levelled against him, we cannot but think that Mr. Chamberlain was wise not to issue a general appeal to women to come forward for national service before he had prepared the machinery with which to deal with the mob of volunteers that would ensue, or the plans upon which they are to be enrolled and placed at work. Too often in the past women have been disheartened by appeals that were mere empty words.

It is, nevertheless, most extraordinary that a man proposing to tackle the infinitely complex problem of the organisation of the working power of the nation should think it possible that he can do so in sections, and that he should not carry on the organisation of women simultaneously with that of men. In answer to his critics, he has said that the task of the department is stupendous, and that schemes for the women's side of the work are now being prepared; but that answer is not very convincing. Why have not these schemes been prepared simultaneously with those for men? Mr. Chamberlain may say, and with justice, that one man cannot do everything. But one man ought not to do everything, and it is difficult to see why, during the last few weeks, women should not have been working for him. A women's department, to deal with a woman's problem, with advice and help from women of experience and proved ability, might have saved the Director of National Service much needless trouble and annoyance: it might still save his scheme from ruin and his office from confusion, and we earnestly hope that he is calling it into existence.

Meanwhile, of course, the lesson is obvious. If even in such a task as this a Government Department finds it impossible to remember that women exist, and are important; and if, even in the face of the most violent pressure and the most urgent public clamour they hesitate to entrust anything of magnitude to women, surely the time has come for something drastic to be done. If women cannot be remembered in a State constituted as is Great Britain, clearly it must quickly be constituted differently. Let us try whether votes for women will not help Ministers and Directors to remember that women are part of the people.

The Queen - 3-2-17.

THE WEEK-END AND AFTER.

THE PLACE OF WOMEN in the coming scheme of National Service has been one of the principal topics of the week. There was some chagrin aroused by the non-inclusion of women in the first drafting of Mr Neville Chamberlain's scheme, and still more, perhaps, by the statement that women might be called on later, "if required." It was felt, not unnaturally, that after all the work women have done, and done capably during the war, there was a lack of tactfulness in this half-suggestion that a national scheme could be proposed which did not require them. Women could fairly say and, in fact, did say that in the many months which have passed since the war broke out the substitution of women for men in the Civil Service, in professions and industries, and even in the more civilian departments of military administration has advanced so far and worked so smoothly that this perpetuation of differentiation between the two sexes was, to say the least, impolitic. On a higher ground it was condemned as uneconomic, a waste both of time and of organising energy, since two systems would be put in operation, with two spheres of work, two staffs at headquarters, and so on, when one would suffice if the position women have earned for themselves had been recognised at once. Everything calls now for a singleness of effort and a contraction rather than an increase of the channels of organisation. It looked rather like a deliberate throwing-away of one advantage gained by the experiences of war-time to miss the chance of making a single whole of the National Service scheme, and including men and women at one stroke.

On the whole the criticisms in this sense were made without bitterness, and without any tendency to magnify the work of women or overestimate its effect upon the public mind. To some extent, no doubt, the criticism was the more ready to be offered because of the irritation left in the minds of women in general by the way in which the registration of women some time ago, after all the large prospects it offered, collapsed into a very diminutive actual use of the women who came forward to work. There was even at that time more than a little belief that the official world had still not learned to take women seriously. The registration was suspected of being a kind of sop to keep women quiet who felt that more use might be made of their sex. The suspicion was not, in our view, justified. Whatever may have gone wrong in the result, the intention, we are sure, was quite straightforward; and the comparatively small outcome of the registration, in the way of making use of women's services, was partly due to the difficulties of substitution of labour, partly to the fact that women workers are as a class less mobile than men, and partly to a certain haste in ordering the registration while the industrial situation was not very clear. But it cannot be denied that the failure of that system caused much disappointment and vexation among women, which must have had an echo in the criticisms of the present moment.

To do Mr Chamberlain justice, it is to some extent in order to avoid any such failures now that he has, according to his own statement, decided to deal separately with men and women. Much as has already been done, in the way of agreements in the labour world, to facilitate the substitution of women for men, no one could maintain that the conditions are such that no difference need be made in the national scheme between the sexes. They would have to be separately dealt with in many directions. Moreover (though this Mr Chamberlain did not say), it is not possible to move women here and there as easily as men can be moved. The question of their lodging and the factory provisions made for them is wholly different, and much more difficult. Again, there is the matter of wages. It would be a mistake to base the National Service proposals on certain wage arrangements which would afterwards have to be reconstructed. All those considerations arise in addition to the statement very clearly made that the unsatisfied demand of industry is at the moment more for men than for women. If more time had been available it is certain that Mr Chamberlain would have kept back the whole scheme until that part of his system which is to deal with women had been quite ready, and have launched the whole together. As it is, women may, we think, fairly remind themselves that the machinery of industry for tackling the practical questions of wages, hours of work, conditions, and so on is of longer establishment in the case of men, so that far less precaution has to be taken in setting men to work. In more leisurely circumstances time would have been taken to set the women's side, by means of committees of women, on a level with the men's side before starting the scheme. As it is, however, the need for haste has put one before the other in point of time. But that is the only differentiation.

And even that is hardly real. For instance, at the very time when these criticisms of the scheme were being made, appeals were going out for something like 30,000 women for munition factories, and it was intimated that the War Office had a new avenue opening for women's service of a striking kind. So that in a sense women's work was actually ahead of the schemes for men, which, publicly at any rate, have reached no such point. The truth is that the volunteering of women has been so admirable that they may easily yet be ahead of the men in the actual operation of the National Service scheme, instead of being behind them.

This week sees the close in one sense of a chapter of women's war service which has been extraordinarily successful. We refer to the munition makers' canteens, organised by Lady Lawrence, a portrait of whom forms our frontispiece to-day. Early in 1915, when the first great call to women for munition work in any numbers was made, when thousands of men and women were employed where only hundreds in the face of the [illegible] public clamour they hesitate to entrust anything of magnitude to women, surely the time has come for something drastic to be done. If women cannot be remembered in a State constituted as is Great Britain, clearly it must quickly be constituted differently. Let us try whether votes for women will not help Ministers and Directors to remember that women are part of the people.

The Queen - 3-2-17.

THE WEEK-END AND AFTER.

THE PLACE OF WOMEN in the coming scheme of National Service has been one of the principal topics of the week. There was some chagrin aroused by the non-inclusion of women in the first drafting of Mr Neville Chamberlain's scheme, and still more, perhaps, by the statement that women might be called on later, "if required." It was felt, not unnaturally, that after all the work women have done, and done capably during the war, there was a lack of tactfulness in this half-suggestion that a national scheme could be proposed which did not require them. Women could fairly say and, in fact, did say that in the many months which have passed since the war broke out the substitution of women for men in the Civil Service, in professions and industries, and even in the more civilian departments of military administration has advanced so far and worked so smoothly that this perpetuation of differentiation between the two sexes was, to say the least, impolitic. On a higher ground it was condemned as uneconomic, a waste both of time and of organising energy, since two systems would be put in operation, with two spheres of work, two staffs at headquarters, and so on, when one would suffice if the position women have earned for themselves had been recognised at once. Everything calls now for a singleness of effort and a contraction rather than an increase of the channels of organisation. It looked rather like a deliberate throwing-away of one advantage gained by the experiences of war-time to miss the chance of making a single whole of the National Service scheme, and including men and women at one stroke.

[illegible] are such that no difference need be made in a national scheme between the sexes. They would have to be separately dealt with in many directions. Moreover (though this Mr Chamberlain did not say), it is not possible to move women here and there as easily as men can be moved. The question of their lodging and the factory provisions made for them is wholly different, and much more difficult. Again, there is the matter of wages. It would be a mistake to base the National Service proposals on certain wage arrangements which would afterwards have to be reconstructed. All those considerations arise in addition to the statement very clearly made that the unsatisfied demand of industry is at the moment more for men than for women. If more time had been available it is certain that Mr Chamberlain would have kept back the whole scheme until that part of his system which is to deal with women had been quite ready, and have launched the whole together. As it is, women may, we think, fairly remind themselves that the machinery of industry for tackling the practical questions of wages, hours of work, conditions, and so on is of longer establishment in the case of men, so that far less precaution has to be taken in setting men to work. In more leisurely circumstances time would have been taken to set the women's side, by means of committees of women, on a level with the men's side before starting the scheme. As it is, however, the need for haste has put one before the other in point of time. But that is the only differentiation.

And even that is hardly real. For instance, at the very time when these criticisms of the scheme were being made, appeals were going out for something like 30,000 women for munition factories, and it was intimated that the War Office had a new avenue opening for women's service of a striking kind. So that in a sense women's work was actually ahead of the schemes for men, which, publicly at any rate, have reached no such point. The truth is that the volunteering of women has been so admirable that they may easily yet be ahead of the men in the actual operation of the National Service scheme, instead of being behind them.

This week sees the close in one sense of a chapter of women's war service which has been extraordinarily successful. We refer to the munition makers' canteens, organised by Lady Lawrence, a portrait of whom forms our frontispiece to-day. Early in 1915, when the first great call to women for munition work in any numbers was made, when thousands of men and women were employed where only hundreds, or even tens had been before, and factories sprang up like mushrooms all over the land, Lady Lawrence undertook the organisation of these canteens. These last Monday she relinquished to the Control Board, which has now assumed responsibility; and rightly, for munition work can no longer be considered as an emergency affair, nor one calling for voluntary effort, as it was in those early days. At that time, before the canteens were opened, there were many places in which no food at all could be procured during a twelve hours shift, and the great and sustained effort made by munition workers was, in many cases, only rendered possible by the timely help given. All over the country, in the great works which have sprung up, these canteens have provided well-cooked, nourishing meals by day and by night, as well as the lighter refreshments, such as tea and cocoa, which are also indispensable. And it speaks volumes for the perfection of their work that in every case the authorities are continuing them on precisely the same lines laid down to the smallest detail of organisation. In Woolwich Arsenal itself, and in each other of her centres, Lady Lawrence has been approached to ask whether those who had been working as voluntary "heads" would continue their position as salaried workers, and in almost every case this has been done, the voluntary staff also continuing in many cases. Lady Lawrence attributes the very marked success of the work to the whole-hearted loyalty, devotion, and enthusiasm of her helpers; and no doubt she is right. But others may well think also of the devotion of Lady Lawrence herself in organising and maintaining all this loyal service.

Norfolk News
3-2-17

682/11

MAN AND WOMAN POWER

THE NATIONAL SERVICE CALL.

100,000 WOMEN LAND WORKERS WANTED.

We are officially informed that the Prime Minister has consented to attend and address a public meeting to be held in the Central Hall, Westminster, on Tuesday afternoon next, at 2.30. The Director-General of National Service, Mr. Neville Chamberlain, will make a statement as to his proposals, and in addition to the Prime Minister, Mr. John Hodge, M.P., Minister of Labour, will address the meeting. The chair will be taken by Mr. Arthur Henderson, M.P. Tickets may be obtained by application on and after Saturday next to Mr. Arthur Peters, 1, Victoria Street, London, S.W.; Mr. F. C. Rivers, 41, Parliament Street, London; Mr. W. K. Waterson, 2, Bridge Street, London, S.W.

Many offers of individual service from women have been received by the National Service Department. The policy of the department will be to organise the National Service of Women strictly in relation to the ascertained demand, and it would greatly facilitate the work if offers of service could be held over till the plans of the Director-General are more fully developed. Arrangements to this end will be set on foot with all possible expedition, but in the meantime volunteers cannot be enrolled or drafted, and Mrs. Tennant particularly hopes no woman already occupied will leave her existing work.

A strong Government appeal is about to be made to women to help as land workers to secure the necessary food production. The terms, including free training, which will be offered to each woman, are now under the joint consideration of the President of the Board of Agriculture, the Director-General of National Service, and the Ministry of Labour. At least 100,000 land workers will be wanted. Arrangements are being made, with the assistance of County Agricultural Committees, for the proper housing of volunteers.

Mr. Prothero, President of the Board of Agriculture, addressing Kent farmers at Maidstone said the next three months would afford the one opportunity which farmers would have of adding to the food supply of the country. He appealed to them to do their best, with depleted labour and other drawbacks, to get the greatest possible food out of the land. To reinforce the Army and produce the greatest amount of food was the plain and necessary duty of farmers, and they would, by accepting the substituted labour and machinery and appliances the Government were offering, do their share in terminating the war at the earliest possible date.

We are informed by the Minister of Labour that his attention has been drawn to a statement appearing in the Press to the general effect that as the result of a conference between the Director-General of National Service and the chief officers of the Employment Exchanges Department, and of a divergence of views between them, that the position is a deadlock. The Minister of Labour desires to state explicitly that so far as the arrangements between the Director-General of National Service and his own department are concerned, complete agreement has been arrived at, and so far from there being a deadlock, instructions for carrying out the scheme agreed between the two departments are in process of issue.

Daily Sketch
5-2-17

DON'T GIVE UP YOUR JOB YET.

Hundreds of women have volunteered their services in the national cause since it became known that the sex was to be included in the great National Service scheme.

Women's work will be organised, however, strictly in relation to an ascertained demand. No woman already doing either paid or voluntary work should give it up at present, as volunteers cannot yet be enrolled or drafted.

Individual offers of service, except in connection with the clerical staff of the Women's Department, should be held over until a definite announcement of the department's intentions is made.

Liverpool Daily Post
5-2-17

LONDON, Saturday.

There can be no dissatisfaction among the reasonable of the sex over the appointment of Mrs. Harold John Tennant as Director of the Women's Department of National Service, and of Miss Violet Markham as Assistant-Director. Two more capable women would be hard to find in the length and breadth of the country, and because of their very real experience we have confidence in them. Neither is fanatic nor faddist; even Miss Markham, I believe, has modified her views against woman's suffrage since the beginning of the war, which is sensible of her, since she herself, at least, is capable of registering a vote with intelligence. The ladies and their staff are lodged at the St. Ermin's Hotel, not, as Lady Frances Balfour suggested the department doubtless would be, at the largest lunatic asylum that could be commandeered. That, however, was written before Lady Frances knew who were to be appointed, and because she felt annoyed that it had been thought necessary to establish a separate department for women. She knows what Mrs. Tennant is capable of, inasmuch as Mrs. Asquith's sister-in-law was the woman who, with her, represented women on the Divorce Law Commission of some few years ago.

An Interesting Personality.

Mrs. Tennant has been a public worker since girlhood. As Miss May Abraham, a brilliant and attractive young Irishwoman, Mr. Asquith, in his Home Secretary days, made her superintending inspector of factories, a quite new post. Three years later his youngest brother-in-law, a widower, of thirty-one, married her, and for a time she continued her work. But domestic claims soon proved stronger, although Mrs. Tennant always has contrived to get in her duties as wife, mother, mistress of several large households, and hostess, with a good deal of earnest endeavour on behalf of the poor and the oppressed. She has never forgotten the lessons learned when she was private secretary to Lady Dilke, and the formation of the Women's Trade Union League is due largely to her. Her family consists of four sons and a daughter, and it may be remembered that the eldest boy, Henry, who is twenty this year, was badly damaged in a flying accident last May, his condition for some time causing the keenest anxiety.

The Wife of Major Carruthers.

Miss Violet Markham, like Miss Mary M'Arthur, prefers to work for social progress and in war causes under her maiden name. In private life she is Mrs. James Carruthers, and her marriage with Major Carruthers, D.S.O., took place since the outbreak of war. A sister of the late Sir Arthur Markham, she has that courage of her opinions that was so characteristic of him, and few women (or men either, for the matter of that) equal her as a speaker; while she has travelled widely and written pleasing books about things seen and heard. Both Mrs. Tennant and Mrs. Carruthers hold strongly to the belief that women will never achieve great results by working against men, whereas the two in combination can perform wonders. I think we can trust the ladies of St. Ermin's to do nothing foolish.

Daily Express
7-2-17

682

ALL TOGETHER.

There will be no quarrel with the statement in Mr. Neville Chamberlain's speech on National Service that "the most important thing at this juncture is to act quickly." Mr. Chamberlain's scheme is the only detailed suggestion before the country. It may, of course, be criticised, but there is no time for criticism, and there is an obvious duty to give Mr. Chamberlain full and loyal support so that the maximum result may be obtained from his plan of campaign. The nation must save itself from the misery of another war winter. More men are still wanted, and urgently wanted, in the Army. The strain of modern war can only be successfully endured by the young and vigorous. If these men are to be released from industry, others must fill their places. The Government is faced with the problem of vastly increasing output in the essential industries while there is no unemployment and the supplies of labour are depleted. Mr. Neville Chamberlain calls for volunteers. He wants to know who is ready to work for his country with the same disregard for personal advantage as was shown by the hundreds of thousands of volunteers who enlisted in the Army at the beginning of the war. This call is the great test of patriotism for the middle-aged. Their sons have thrown up good positions for a shilling a day and the chance of mutilation and death. Will they make the infinitely smaller sacrifice for which they are asked? At present the Man-Power Ministry wants to have a register of willing workers. It will be shameful not to be included on that rota. We are glad to have the repeated assurance that the organisation of woman labour is to be hurried on. The enemy's new submarine war accents the necessity for Great Britain to flood her workshops, her shipyards, her fields, and her mines with enthusiastic labour.

Mr. Arthur Henderson declares that the needs of the time will only be met when "every man and woman not in the Army and Navy is employed on some work of national importance." This desirable end would, in our opinion, be most effectively attained by compulsion. There are, however, as the Prime Minister points out, difficulties in extending conscription to civil life which it would take time to overcome, and we cannot afford to waste time. Unfortunately, it seems clear from Mr. Chamberlain's statement that his plan necessitates the creation of another army of officials. He certainly proposes to use existing machinery, but the heavy work of enrolment and sifting, and the many decisions that must be made by his commissioners and sub-commissioners, mean more bureaucracy and large additions to the present staffs. The making of "cushy" jobs in these days of labour famine is an evident evil, and we trust that Mr. Chamberlain will contrive to reduce these jobs to a minimum, and to reserve them exclusively for men who have been invalided out of the Army.

The Morning Post
7-2-17

682/12

68

PRIME MINISTER ON NATIONAL SERVICE.

MR. NEVILLE CHAMBERLAIN EXPLAINS HIS SCHEME.

VOLUNTARY AT FIRST.

Mr. Neville Chamberlain, Director-General of National Service, unfolded yesterday, at a large and representative meeting held in the Central Hall, Westminster, his scheme of National Service, which received the cordial approval and commendation of the Prime Minister. Mr. Arthur Henderson, M.P., presided, and among others present on the platform were the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Lord Mayor of London, the Duke of Portland, the Earl of Denbigh, Lord Elphinstone, Mr. John Hodge (Labour Minister), Mr. W. Astor, M.P., Mr. Neil Primrose, M.P., Mr. Cecil Beck, M.P., Mr. Bridgeman, M.P., Mr. Bowerman, M.P., Mr. Boyton, M.P., Mr. Burdett-Coutts, M.P., Major Sir Edward Coates, M.P., Mr. Clynes, M.P., Mr. Dickinson, M.P., Sir Arthur Du Cros, M.P., Major Raymond Greene, M.P., Mr. Gulland, M.P., Major Hamilton, M.P., Sir Charles Henry, M.P., Mr. Hewins, M.P., Lieutenant-Colonel Jessel, M.P., Mr. Herbert Lewis, M.P., Mr. Lough, M.P., Sir Philip Magnus, M.P., Mr. O'Grady, M.P., Mr. Pratt, M.P., Mr. Richardson, M.P., Mr. G. H. Roberts, M.P., Mr. James Rowlands, M.P., Sir Harry Samuel, M.P., Sir Albert Spicer, M.P., Mr. E. A. Strauss, M.P., Mr. J. H. Thomas, M.P., Mr. W. Thorne, M.P., Mr. Wardle, M.P., Mr. Wilkie, M.P., Sir George Younger, M.P., Sir John Boraston, the Mayors of the Metropolitan Boroughs, Brighton, and Hove, Sir Cecil Brett, the Rev. Canon Carnegie, Sir Howard Frank; Mr. D. C. McGrath and Mr. A. Ozanne (members of the Australian Federal Parliament), Lieutenant-Colonel D. J. Reid (Agent-General for Ontario), Sir R. A. Robinson, Mr. Robert Smillie (President of the Miners' Union), Mr. C. J. Stewart (Public Trustee), Judge Tobin, Sir Joseph Ward, Sir J. Prescott Hewett, and Mr. W. A. Appleton.

CHAIRMAN'S ADDRESS.

Mr. Henderson, in opening the proceedings, said this was no ordinary public meeting. It was a great gathering of citizens seriously interested in the successful prosecution of the war, including leading representatives of associations of employers and workpeople. They had come together to take part in the inauguration of what he hoped would prove to be a successful scheme for securing universal National Service. The case for National Service had been strong throughout the whole period of the war. That case had been strengthened and its urgency had been intensified by the latest display of Hun frightfulness and brutal military despotism. (Cheers.) We needed to make a swift answer to Germany's latest outrage. (Cheers.) It was therefore of essential importance that the country should at once realise that an increased number of men must be made immediately available for the Navy and Army, and women as well as men for other work of national importance. We required to organise our whole working population irrespective of class or sex—(cheers)—so as to secure that the requisite and proper supplies were made available for those services. The extent to which final success in this great war depended on the speedy and efficient mobilisation of all our resources could not be overestimated. The problem of organising our labour supplies was difficult and complicated, and could only be solved and solved in time by the whole nation giving to Mr. Neville Chamberlain, the Director-General of National Service, its wholehearted co-operation and support. (Cheers.) There were those who considered that the problem of the labour supply could be dealt with by releasing men from the Colours. So far as this applied to men of the highest skill and training this might be the case. The Government agreed that the skill of the workmen must be used either in the Navy or Army or in the workshops in the best interests of the nation as a whole. With this reservation he could not urge too strongly that the chief importance of the problem was that our armies in the field should be maintained and increased, and that for this purpose the necessary drafts, properly trained and equipped, should be supplied with unfailing regularity. We must also increase the output of munitions. Furthermore, we must expedite the construction of ships required by the Navy for dealing with the submarine menace, and also of ships for the Mercantile Marine to replace those sunk by the enemy. Lastly, and not least important, agriculture must be so organised that the production of home-grown food should be considerably increased. (Cheers.) The organisation of our sources of labour supply would be satisfactory only when every man not in the Navy or Army and every women physically fit and available was employed in work of national importance. This was the work which the Government had entrusted to Mr. Neville Chamberlain, who, with splendid chivalry and patriotism, had entered on the execution of his difficult and thankless task. (Cheers.)

DIRECTOR OF NATIONAL SERVICE.

Mr. Neville Chamberlain, who was received with cheers, said: The recent action of Germany has been [illegible] and I think rightly interpreted as a

As for the doctors, I have been in touch with the General Medical Council, and although my plans are not yet completed, I hope it will be possible to arrange something with them on analogous lines. We have to see that the doctors are so mobilised that the needs of both the civilian and the military population may be met, and that specialists can do the work for which they have taken pains to qualify themselves. With these exceptions, I am going to appeal to the general male population between eighteen and sixty-one. I am glad to say that in this great national work Ireland will have the opportunity of taking her full share with the rest of the country. (Cheers.) If I have been obliged to postpone for a little while my invitation to Irishmen it is only because the circumstances of Ireland make some modifications necessary, and I have not yet had time to complete the drafts. There will be many men among our volunteers already engaged in work of national importance, and I want to make it clear that our only reason for wanting them to enrol is because we may want them to do the same or similar work in different parts of the country. It would be disastrous if men engaged in agriculture, mines, or munitions were to leave their work without instructions, and if anybody were to do so in the hope of bettering his conditions I take this opportunity of warning him he is doing his country an injury, and he may very likely find he has exchanged the bone for the shadow. We are going to ask our national volunteers to make sacrifices, not to better themselves; and although the conditions will be found fair, and even liberal, they are not intended, and they are not needed, to act as a bribe to men to do their duty.

War Munition and National Service Volunteers.

I should like to say a word on the position of the war munition volunteers. We do not intend to touch them. They will not be disturbed. If there are any not so enrolled who are entitled to do so, they will be given the opportunity of enrolling as war munition volunteers instead of as national volunteers if they so desire. Before I come to the conditions of service I want to give you a short description of the organisation we propose to employ for the enrolment and for controlling the distribution of labour when it is enrolled. It would be entirely contrary to the spirit of National Service to go and duplicate labour or to set up new machinery to do what there was already machinery in existence to do, and accordingly we propose to utilise to the utmost, first, the local authorities, secondly, the Employment Exchanges under the Minister of Labour, and we are going to supplement these where necessary by our own offices. The first thing to do is to start a great publicity and recruiting campaign, and for this we hope to have the assistance of the Press, which is always ready to help in any great patriotic movement, and which has done so much to help the wonderful success of the new War Loan. Then we are going to bring in the local authorities. It would be absolutely impossible to organise so vast an operation as this from one centre. I do not think it is always realised in London how great is the power and influence that the local authorities can wield. We are going, through the good offices of Lord Rhondda and the Local Government Boards of Scotland and Ireland, to appeal to the local authorities, who helped so much in the earlier stages of recruiting for the Army, to come to our assistance and set up local recruiting committees, which, by meetings and canvassing, will leave no stone unturned to make this thing a success. For the purposes of enrolment we are going to make use of the staff of the Employment Exchanges, which have a unique experience in the classifying of labour according to trades. They will form the nucleus of our organisation for sorting our volunteers. They also will supply the machinery for ascertaining the demands for labour and allotting it where it is most required. All this will have to be regulated from headquarters. National volunteers will only be allotted to firms or industries designated by my Department in consultation with other Departments, and the local officers of the exchanges will have precise instructions as to what classes of labour they can place without reference to headquarters, and what must be referred to the national clearing house.

General Principles.

There are, however, two general principles which we shall bear in mind. One is that volunteers should be allotted to that particular occupation for which their past history best fits them, and the other is that men shall not be brought into a district to do work for which there are already men in the district equally capable. In addition to the local authorities and the employment exchanges there will be our own National Service Commissioners and sub-Commissioners. There will be two sets of these—for agriculture and industry. Their districts, which will not necessarily coincide, will be so arranged that they are all in divisions or sub-divisions into which the country has been mapped for employment exchanges. The sub-Commissioners will be appointed by the Commissioners in every important centre in their district. Their duties will be to keep the National Service Department fully informed about everything which it ought to know concerning the demand, supply, and distribution of labour in the district, and they will also act as referees or arbitrators on questions which may arise as to terms of service, being assisted in any dispute by assessors representative of employers and employed. The first thing a volunteer has to do is to obtain a form from any post-office or from any recruiting committee. He will fill in the necessary particulars, and will be asked to specify the occupation for which he considers himself to be specially qualified. On one side there will be a list of occupations for which men are particularly wanted at the time, and on the back there will be the terms and conditions of service. If the volunteer is satisfied with these he will sign the form and post it. He need not put a stamp on it, and it will be delivered to me in London. In London the forms will be classified according to the districts, and will be sent down to the exchanges in the districts, to be sorted there again according to occupations. If the volunteer is already engaged in work of national importance nothing further will be done with him unless it is desired to move him. But if he is engaged in any other occupation he will be summoned to appear in order that a trained staff may check his own statement as to what he is able to do.

All Sorts and Conditions of Men.

But this examination will not necessarily take place at the exchange building. We shall have to deal with all sorts and conditions of men. Some of them are not accustomed to go to Labour Exchanges. They might even lose their way in trying to find them. (Laughter.) Therefore we are going to give them the [illegible] public buildings. After therefore, provided that if our volunteer, after having been called up to serve, is thrown out of work temporarily, he may apply to our Special Commissioner, who, if he is satisfied of the justice of his claim, shall pay him 3s. 6d. a day, including Sundays, for a period not exceeding four weeks. That ought to be sufficient to tide him over the period of unemployment, but we shall make every effort to find him work as soon as possible. We shall make it a condition with employers that they shall give us at least one week's notice before they dismiss a man in order that we may look round and find him another job.

Rationing Industries.

I think I have finished outlining the principal points of my scheme, but the question arises. Where are these volunteers to come from? Practically, to-day there are no men unemployed, and therefore the problem of organising the nation for war resolves itself into the transference of labour from non-essential to essential trades. That process will, of course, be automatically brought about as we call up these volunteers, but I think it may be possible to hasten it by certain methods of persuasion. It has been suggested that the trades of the country should be scheduled, separating the essential from the non-essential. A good deal of my correspondence consists of letters from people who write to assure me that their particular trade is one upon which the existence of the country depends. (Laughter.) It might seem simple to pick out certain trades and say that they shall be shut down, but it is not so simple as it seems. Any sudden destruction of capital is bound to disturb credit, and the probability is that it would injure a very much wider circle of trade than we should desire to touch. Even those trades which seem most non-essential are frequently concerned with exports. They serve to pile up those foreign credits which enable us to pay for the munitions, the food, and other things we import, and, moreover, we must not lose sight of the fact that after the war we shall want to build up our industries as soon as possible in order to recover from its effects, and that would not be possible if there were no nucleus of the old trades left. We have no intention of suppressing any trade if we can help it. But when there are not enough materials or not enough labour to go all round, then I think it is necessary to ration labour and materials and see that as much as possible is given to essential trades. I have had for some time a section of my Department working at this problem, and they are about to make recommendations to me as to the best methods of working out that process of rationing. I do not intend to-day to give you any indication of the lines on which we intend to proceed, but I do think it desirable to warn those people engaged in the less essential occupations that they must in the very near future expect some restriction upon their industry, because I think that they themselves can do a great deal to make things easier for themselves if they will try to organise their trades as a whole. There are many trades in which a pooling of resources, machinery, plant, and labour will not only set free for us a number of substitutes for to-day, but will put these trades in a better position to maintain their prosperity after the war than they were before. I am relying on the Prime Minister's eloquence to drive home to you the necessity of making this scheme an overwhelming success. Let nobody suppose that because Count Bernstorff has been given his passports there is nothing for us to do. Germany means to starve us out before she is starved herself. There is only one answer this country can make to a threat of that kind, and that is a blow straight between the eyes—(cheers)—which will beat her down and bring her to her senses. National Service can deliver that blow. It is for the country to see that it is dealt. (Loud cheers.)

MR. LLOYD GEORGE'S SPEECH.

The Prime Minister, who rose amid hearty cheers, said: The statement which we have just listened to, given with such admirable lucidity—may I say with hereditary lucidity—(cheers)—renders my task very easy. The scheme of national service is before you. All I have to do is to enforce the appeal just made on its behalf. I am very glad that Mr. Neville Chamberlain's appeal has been placed before not merely such a large but such a representative gathering. The mere fact that the men and women before me have come from their avocations, and many of them from great distances, in order to attend this inaugural meeting is an admirable omen for the success of the appeal. (Hear, hear.) There can be no doubt about the need for it. We have millions of men serving in the Army abroad, all taken from work of some kind, and while the supply of labour in this country is less the need for it is greater. (Hear, hear.) The nation wants more food raised at home because of the difficulty of getting it from abroad. It wants more raw material, because of the great demand for the purposes of armaments and munitions, and it requires more skilled labour in order to convert materials into the equipments of war. What better argument can there be of the overwhelming need of something in the nature of national organisation in order to make the best of the labour which is available?

Britain's Share in the Fight.

It might be said, Why did you send so many men to the Army? It was essential. (Hear, hear.) But we have sent fewer men to the Navy and Army in proportion to population than any of the Great Powers of the West. France has drafted something like a sixth of her population to the Army. (Cheers.) The last child in the family has been summoned. The blood of her bluets is crimsoning the field of sacrifice. When we talk about our sacrifices let us look across the flood and see what France is doing. In proportion to population our contribution is not comparable to that of the Great Powers of the West, either friend or foe. It is not that we are shirking our contribution; it is that we are making a larger contribution in other respects. (Hear, hear.) Our Navy is keeping the seas—(cheers)—not merely for ourselves—not merely for our Allies—it is keeping the seas free for the commerce of all flags. (Cheers.) That is an enormous strain on our man-power. It is not merely the number of sailors and fighting men in the field. It is that you also require a considerable number of men to keep your Navy going—to build, to repair, [illegible] to make greater and France, and now the latest development, the sinking of harmless merchant ships with their sailors plying a peaceful trade. What makes the German action dangerous is this: it is organised savagery. It is taught in their schools and inculcated by their philosophers. It is studied savagery. (Hear, hear.) The most dangerous form of barbarism that we have ever been up against. (Hear, hear.) Education, the instrument of civilisation, has been perverted to become the agent of savagery, and unless the Allies put an end in this war to the possibility of the triumph of such a system we shall be back in the barbarism of twenty centuries ago. (Hear, hear.) Is it not a case in which every man and every woman in a civilised country like ours should put forth the whole of their strength and array themselves in the army of civilisation? (Cheers.) That is the appeal which Mr. Neville Chamberlain is making to you to-day. I am not going to dwell any more on that phase of the question, and I have only done it to show you the importance of the nation's giving an answer now to the threat of Germany. (Cheers.) She threatens the sinking of every merchantman and passenger ship at sight and the drowning of our sailors—the gallant messengers of plenty in this land. What is our duty? It is to build ships, to protect them. (Cheers.) It is to develop the resources of this country in food, raw material, and men so as to demonstrate to Germany the futility of murder on the high seas. It is the only thing she understands, and we can do it. (Cheers.) You must organise civilisation to meet an organised barbarism. (Cheers.)

Many Ways of Helping.

There are many ways of helping the country. Some men are fighting; some are helping us on the seas; some are helping in the great munition factories; some are building ships; some are producing food on the land. Look at the list of what is required! See what you can do! I will give you an illustration of what is wanted. We are short of iron ore. I need not tell you how important it is not only in the conduct of the war but in providing ships to carry raw material and food that we have mines in this country. If only we could get more labour we should turn out an extra 140,000 or 150,000 tons of iron ore. Then a great deal of building work has to be done. We want labour for that, and we want labour for the land. We are short of labour also to load and unload ships, and in some cases wagons. Let each man do what he can. If each does what he can in his sphere we can help the country greatly. It is useless to say, "I am prepared to do this, and I will do nothing else." That does not help the country. Place your services frankly at the disposal of the State.

No Right to be Mere Onlookers.

I think the country is entitled to that. No man or woman has a right to look on while others are struggling for what is equally important to them. (Cheers.) Every man and woman should do what lies in their power to help. The mere exhibition of readiness will help. If we have in this country a great demonstration of eagerness by every man and woman to place their services at the disposal of the State you can have no idea of what the moral effect will be throughout the world. (Hear, hear.) It tells even in war. Don't let our patriotism be less than that of the Germans. (Cheers.) In Germany they made an appeal for workers, and plenty of volunteers placed their services at the disposal of the State. Are Britons less patriotic than Germans? (Cries of "No.") Do they love their country less or is it a country less worthy of love? ("No.") It is a great country. It is a country with a good many national advantages. That it is an island is not a matter to be despised. If you read what happens in Belgium and the German-occupied territories of France and Russia you will realise that we have a good deal to be thankful for in the fact that there is a fine old moat round this castle. (Laughter and cheers.) Don't take advantage of that to do nothing. (Hear, hear.) Work all the harder out of gratitude that you have got it. Work all the harder to preserve it. The Germans are trying to bridge it. They are trying to make it impossible for you to use it. Defend your island and the moat which surrounds it. (Cheers.) It is a rich island—rich in its soil, rich in the deposits under the soil, rich in its people, rich in its past, rich in its present, and God knows what riches it may have in the future. That depends on its people to-day. (Hear, hear.) It is a great land. It has a great past. The struggles of its peoples for freedom have nurtured in it traditions of liberty, ennobled its institutions, and dignified its people. It is an inheritance worthy to fight for. (Cheers.) No man or woman who shares that inheritance has a right to pass its defence on to his neighbour or his neighbour's son. (Hear, hear.) He should stand for it himself just as much as they. It is his just as much as theirs. When this struggle is over we can each feel that not merely have we held Britain immune from the greatest terror that ever menaced liberty, but that this land stood foremost among the nations of the earth to organise the defence of the flag of civilisation. (Loud cheers.)

THE LABOUR MINISTER.

Mr. Hodge, M.P., said it was a big task for a little popgun, such as he, to follow a —. (Cheers and laughter.) As they appreciated his point he would not finish the sentence. (Laughter.) With regard to what Mr. Chamberlain had said about the difficulty of getting employment through the Labour Exchanges if he survived the vicissitudes of Parliamentary life long enough that would be remedied, and he had already indicated to the Prime Minister that he would want his aid to fight the Treasury. (Laughter and cheers.) The failure was not altogether the fault of the Exchanges and their staffs—a good number of his Trade Union friends who had been biassed and prejudiced against the Exchanges were to blame, and many of the employers of labour, some of whom were present in the hall, were likewise sinful. (Laughter.) During the whole history of the Exchanges neither the Presidents nor the Parliamentary Secretaries of the Board of Trade had ever entered the offices. How, then, could it be a matter of wonder that there was lack of enthusiasm on the part of the staffs? It was like putting them in a refrigerating chamber. (Laughter.) He had been there himself—(laughter)—finding out the conditions. They must all be filled with boundless enthusiasm and sympathy getting ready for the lads when they came back. (Cheers.) Everything that could be done to make Mr. Chamberlain's scheme a success would be done, because it was in the national interest and for the reason that they were looking ahead, not content with the present, but desirous that when this great catastrophe came to an end we might begin the building up process. In the meantime everyone had his duty to perform. A [illegible] would be a great organised that the production of home-grown food should be considerably increased. (Cheers.) The organisation of our sources of labour supply would be satisfactory only when every man not in the Navy or Army and every women physically fit and available was employed in work of national importance. This was the work which the Government had entrusted to Mr. Neville Chamberlain, who, with splendid chivalry and patriotism, had entered on the execution of his difficult and thankless task. (Cheers.)

DIRECTOR OF NATIONAL SERVICE.

Mr. Neville Chamberlain, who was received with cheers, said: The recent action of Germany has been very generally, and I think rightly, interpreted as a sign that she finds herself in a desperate situation. But do not let us make any mistake. We can weaken our enemy by our blockade, we can batter his trenches to pieces with our guns, we cannot drive him back into his own territory except by the strong arms of our soldiers; and if we are to secure victory and to save ourselves the misery of another war winter it is necessary that we should supply our Army with those drafts of young and physically-fit men who alone can stand the terrific strain of modern trench warfare. These young men are only to be found in considerable numbers in industries and occupations which are essential to the life of the nation; and whether they are taken from munitions, from mines, from shipbuilding, or from Whitehall—(laughter and hear, hear)—I only wish there were more in Whitehall, because they are the easiest to get—wherever they come from, we must not allow those industries to languish. We have got to find substitutes for those who go to the war, and we have got to find them quickly. Substitutes exist, both men and women, but they are either unoccupied, or occupied in industries less essential, less vital to the nation than those I have mentioned. It is for these substitutes that I am going to appeal. It would be impossible to construct a scheme of enrolment which could not be criticised, but to any who feel disposed to criticise I want to say two words. The most important thing at this juncture is to act quickly. We cannot afford to wait; we must have the volunteers at once. The task of preparing this scheme has been entrusted by the Prime Minister, not to the public, not even to the Press—(laughter)—but to me. (Cheers.) I have undertaken the task not joyfully, but as I would have answered any call to National Service, in the spirit which exists universally throughout this country, the very spirit to which I want to appeal. There will be many who will think they could have made a better scheme, though I am bound to say I have not yet found anybody who wants to change places with me. (Laughter.) This I want to say to my critics. This is the scheme; there is no other. Let us not waste time in criticism; let us resolve to make it work, and it will work. (Cheers.)

Drink and Women.

I have noticed that there are two subjects over which almost every public man in the course of his career gets into trouble, whether he touches them or whether he tries to leave them alone. One is drink—(laughter)—and the other is women. (Loud laughter.) When I was Lord Mayor of Birmingham I got into trouble about drink, and I had hardly been above a few weeks in my present position than I found myself up against the eternal feminine, being hotly criticised because it was supposed that I wanted to exclude women. I have made it clear now that was a misunderstanding. The Prime Minister will bear me out when I say there never was any intention of excluding women. I need not tell employers of labour or Trade Unionists that the substitution of women for men is a very difficult and delicate operation. Workshop arrangements have to be altered, housing arrangements have to be made, agreements have to be come to between masters and men about rates of wages. All these things take time. It is clear that if we had attempted to enrol women on the same terms as men we should have caused great irritation and great annoyance, because we should not have been able to place many of them who came forward. We have to investigate the demand in some cases, we may have to create it in others. When we make our appeal we shall do so with the certainty that the women will be employed when the demand comes. I have appointed two extremely capable and experienced women to take charge of this department—Mrs. Tennant and Miss Markham. (Cheers.) They do not intend to disregard any organisations which have done valuable service in the past. On the contrary, they will seek the aid of those who can give it, and if we are not able to find employment at once for the millions of women burning to offer their patriotic services, I hope they will exercise a little patience and realise that their work will be all the more valuable because it is organised in advance.

Clergymen and Doctors.

If I may return to the interior sex, there are two classes who seem to stand apart in this matter of National Service because their services are required in another direction—doctors and ministers of religion. So far as ministers of the Church of England are concerned I have been in communication with the Archbishops on this subject, and we have formulated plans which I hope will enable many of the clergy to give effect to what we know to be their desire, and give National Service other than that in their parishes. Others, again, will be put to do work, perhaps of a special character, in different parts of the country. [illegible] work of national importance nothing further will be done with him unless it is desired to move him. But if he is engaged in any other occupation he will be summoned to appear in order that a trained staff may check his own statement as to what he is able to do.

All Sorts and Conditions of Men.

But this examination will not necessarily take place at the exchange building. We shall have to deal with all sorts and conditions of men. Some of them are not accustomed to go to Labour Exchanges. They might even lose their way in trying to find them. (Laughter.) Therefore we are going to give them the alternative of some well-known public building. After he is examined the volunteer may go back to his employment, and until he is called up he can continue to work at that employment with an easy mind, feeling that he is doing National Service, but as soon as a suitable vacancy occurs he will receive a notice calling upon him within seven days to present himself at his new place of employment. That will be accompanied by a railway warrant and by a form on which he can make a claim for subsistence allowance. I do not want it to be supposed that this allowance is to go to him automatically. A man who is exchanging from lodgings in one town to lodgings in another clearly has no claim. If, on the other hand, he is called on at our request to leave his wife and family to go somewhere else, and does not get extra wages to cover the extra cost, he is entitled to claim subsistence allowance which may go up to 2s. 6d. a day. But that allowance is not intended—I want this to be clearly understood—to enable a man to make a profit. (Laughter.) There is one danger we particularly wish to avoid—the danger of taking a man away from work of national importance upon which he may be already engaged. The workman very often does not know himself whether he is doing work of national importance or not. That information is frequently only in the hands of the employer, so, at the same time that we call up a man, we are going to send notice to the employer, and it will be open to him to make an appeal that the man should not be taken from him on one ground only—that the man is already doing work of national importance. This appeal will be sent to the Special Commissioner, and his decision will be final. We hope in that way that these appeals will be very quickly dealt with, and that the right of appeal will not interfere with or clog our machinery.

Wages.

Now I come to the rate of wages. In the case of a war munitions volunteer he gets either his old rate or the rate of the job to which he goes, whichever is the higher. But he is in a different position to the national volunteer. The war munitions volunteer does not change his trade, and any difference in rate is merely the difference between two districts for the same trade. Our national volunteer is going to change his trade. You might easily have, working side by side, a shopkeeper, a labourer, a gardener, and a barrister. It would be quite impossible that they should all have their old rates of pay. (Laughter.) There is in fact only one rate they can accept, and that is the rate of the job they go to. It may be higher, or it may be lower, than the one to which they are accustomed. They must just take their luck, as the soldier takes his luck and as he takes his pay and the dangers of whatever army he may be present with. But there is one reservation I have to make. There are certain rates of pay which are so low that they would not enable a stranger to live upon them, and we feel that there are limits to the amount of sacrifice that we can ask our volunteers to make. We have therefore decided that we must fix a minimum wage. (Cheers.) After very careful consideration we have put that minimum at 25s. a week, being the standard week of the district and the trade. Now I imagine that 25s. a week is lower than the rate which would be current in practically every industry except agriculture, and as for agriculture the wages of the agricultural labourer have already risen considerably during the war, and if in the future land is to be cultivated more freely than in the past it is obvious that the rate of remuneration must be sufficient to retain the labourer on the land. (Hear, hear.) While I am on the subject of agriculture I should just like to say one word to the farmers. The farmers have had rather a rough time of late. To some of them it has seemed that they were being harried almost beyond endurance. I hope I am not going to harry them any more. There is very little doubt that I shall be able to give them very considerable help as soon as I can get my volunteers. In the meantime I will give them two assurances—and I hope they will have better luck with them than with some other assurances. (Laughter.)

Assurances to Farmers.

First, we will not knowingly take away people engaged on the land and send them to other industries. Secondly, we will not even move them from one place to another without the assent of the President of the Board of Agriculture or his local agricultural representative. Now I come to a subject which has given me a good deal of trouble. What is to be the position of a volunteer we have taken away from his old employment and sent to another one, who has finished his job there, and is temporarily thrown out of work, because for the moment there is no work available for him? I do not anticipate that there will be many such cases, but we must face the possibility that they will arise, and it is just as well to fix beforehand what is the course you are going to pursue. This will not be a case of ordinary unemployment. I cannot shut my eyes to the fact that if he is unable to go back to his old employment and is thrown out of his new work we have some responsibility towards that man. We cannot let him starve. We must tide him over the period of unemployment, although we shall try to make that period as short as possible. We have, [illegible] to population our contribution is not comparable to that of the Great Powers of the West, either friend or foe. It is not that we are shirking our contribution; it is that we are making a larger contribution in other respects. (Hear, hear.) Our Navy is keeping the seas—(cheers)—not merely for ourselves—not merely for our Allies—it is keeping the seas free for the commerce of all flags. (Cheers.) That is an enormous strain on our man-power. It is not merely the number of sailors and fighting men in the field. It is that you also require a considerable number of men to keep your Navy going—to build, to repair, and to supply. We have also got to make greater financial contributions than any other country. (Cheers.) We have to supply our Allies very largely with coal and with steel, and therefore, when I say that the number of men that we contribute to the fighting forces is not comparable to that of France or Italy, it merely means that our man-power is distributed in a different way, but a way that is equally essential to the success of the Allies. (Cheers.) Still, millions of our best men are arrayed in the fighting forces on land and sea, and the result is that we have somehow or another to fill up the gap in labour.

Why the Appeal is Voluntary.

We are starting by making a voluntary appeal. Why is it voluntary? (Hear, hear.) I am glad to hear that there is at least one gentleman who does not think my speech irrelevant. (Laughter.) Why is our appeal voluntary? The first reason is that if you can succeed by voluntary means, it is preferable every way. (Hear, hear.) You get the men who are ready to go. Presumably you are more likely to get the men who can be most easily spared, and a voluntary arrangement avoids the setting up of much complicated machinery which takes time and absorbs labour, energy, and brains. (Hear, hear.) If you can get the people to do your work voluntarily, the system works with less friction and more spirit, and for that reason we decided that it was better to begin with a voluntary system. I am glad that we began recruiting for our Army in that way. It was one of the most magnificent displays in the history of the world. (Cheers.) Millions came forward. No other country under the sun ever produced such a volunteer Army, and we never left the voluntary system until it ran dry. I will give you another reason. At the commencement of its career the present Government gave a pledge to the Labour Party that we would make an effort to secure the necessary labour recruits by voluntary means, and I say that the goodwill and co-operation of the great Labour organisations of this country is in itself a military asset. (Hear, hear.) If we can get the recruits we want—and I am very sanguine in that respect—the advantages of a voluntary start will undoubtedly outweigh the disadvantages. (Hear, hear.)

Compulsion in the Background.

Should we fail in our voluntary appeal, then the nation must save itself. We must resort to compulsion. (Hear, hear.) The community is entitled to the utmost help and the best help of every member who partakes of its life. The body is entitled to the protection of the right arm. (Cheers.) It is essential to the welfare of the whole that each member should make his contribution for the defence of the rest. The community is entitled to the best that each member can give—not as a favour, not as a privilege, but as a duty and a right. (Hear, hear.) Therefore, if we failed to secure the necessary supply of labour by voluntary means the Government would be guilty of the grossest dereliction of duty if they did not resort to what after all is the act of all in a democratic country—legislation for the purpose of securing the best that each man can contribute in order to save the country and civilisation from complete disaster. (Cheers.) The task would not be long. The organisation which Mr. Chamberlain is building up would be the essential part of any scheme for the purpose of national organisation even under compulsory conditions. I think that the Government are entitled at the present juncture to ask every class—men and women—to contribute of their resources for the help of the State. The nation is fighting for its life and for the life of civilisation. (Cheers.) That has been said so often that I am afraid we are beginning to regard it as a controversial platitude. It is not—it is a tragic reality. The Chairman referred to the developments of the last few days. You have only to dwell on them in order to realise the character of the struggle in which we are engaged. It is nothing new. It is a development—it is a set policy on the part of Germany, deliberated on, planned out, taught years before the war, planted in the heart of every man and woman in the community. That is the real meaning of the submarine campaign and its latest development. It may be said that war itself is barbaric. So it is, and that is why I hope that at the end of this struggle you will have the conviction driven into the hearts of every man that some means must be established by which war shall be a thing of the dark past. (Cheers.)

Germany's Removal of Humanising Barriers.

War is barbaric, but if you will read the history of past conflicts you will find that Christian civilisation was leaving deeper and deeper traces upon war and the methods of waging it, the treatment of the wounded, the treatment of prisoners, and the treatment of civilian populations. But what has Germany done? Germany is removing, one after another, all the barriers set up by civilisation for humanising war. (Hear, hear.) There is the German treatment of our prisoners and of the civilian populations of Belgium [illegible] the Board of Trade had ever entered the [illegible] then, could it be a matter of wonder that there was lack of enthusiasm on the part of the staffs? It was like putting them in a refrigerating chamber. (Laughter.) He had been there himself—(laughter)—finding out the conditions. They must all be filled with boundless enthusiasm and sympathy getting ready for the lads when they came back. (Cheers.) Everything that could be done to make Mr. Chamberlain's scheme a success would be done, because it was in the national interest and for the reason that they were looking ahead, not content with the present, but desirous that when this great catastrophe came to an end we might begin the building up process. In the meantime everyone had his duty to perform. A premature or inconclusive peace would be a greater disaster than the war itself. We had to fight this out to a finish. (Cheers.) The Prime Minister had omitted to mention one of the super-cruelties threatened by the Germans—the threat that they were going to sink hospital ships. Could there be anything more damnable than that? (Cheers.) This of itself ought to enthuse them with the determination to make Mr. Chamberlain's scheme a mighty weapon for success. (Cheers.)

On the proposition of the Archbishop of Canterbury, supported by the Lord Mayor, a cordial vote of thanks to the Chairman was carried by acclamation, and the meeting concluded with the singing of the National Anthem and cheers for the Prime Minister.

Railway Review
9-2-17

THE ORGANISATION OF WOMEN'S WORK.

February 3rd, 1917.

SIR,—The organisation of women is one of the most pressing problems of the day, more especially in connection with the cultivation of the soil. It is well known that the employment of women has been eminently successful, but they have drifted into their occupations largely haphazard, certainly not by any organised system. They were, after a determined stand, included in the National Register of 1915, but, much to their disappointment, their part of the register was never utilised. The sole object of this register was to organise the resources of the country for war, indeed to organise our fighting forces and our industries simultaneously, the latter being, as is abundantly proved, quite as important in securing victory as the former, and absolutely necessary for supplying the money to carry on the war.

The great need of to-day is to organise to the full the services that can be rendered by the women of the country, who have already proved themselves to be so thoroughly capable in many directions.

Mr. Neville Chamberlain has undertaken a colossal task. It is only those who have had experience of organisation on an extensive scale who can understand what it means. I would like to suggest that Mr. Neville Chamberlain, the President of the Board of Agriculture, and the President of the Local Government Board, work in close co-operation.

The great success of the national Register, which was the result of carefully thought out details and definite instructions being given to the 2,000 municipalities, enabled 27 million forms to be dealt with in a remarkably short space of time, the work being done by the staffs of the municipal authorities, assisted by a large army of voluntary workers. Unfortunately, the information supplied by the National Register was not used as it ought to have been, and the women's part of the register was not used at all, although they were expecting to be called upon and were ready to do their part.

This is simply a statement of fact which I refrain from criticising under present circumstances. As an experienced organiser, I consider the proposal that cards should be sent to the Department in London offering help will only lose time and not succeed, but if instructions were given by the Local Government Board to the 2,000 municipalities to utilise the details of the National Register, especially as regards ascertaining the number of women available for work on the land or any other pressing work, I am of opinion that the necessary information would be got in a very short time. As I have already said, the urgency for immediate work on the land is great, and I consider this the only way to deal promptly with the situation. The housing difficulty might be met by billeting on satisfactory terms or any other method that has been resorted to in connection with his Majesty's forces. I feel confident that when the women of the country fully realise the necessity and are told what to do patriotism and esprit de corps will do the rest.—Yours, etc.,

CHARLES W. MACARA.

33, York Street, Manchester.

Reading Observer
10. 2. 17.

682 | 13

WOMEN'S WORK.

Mr. Cecil Harmsworth, M.P., Chairman of the Interdepartmental Committee on Women's War Work, speaking at Leeds on January 25th, said that women from the beginning had been more anxious to give their services than employers, or the State, had been to accept them. In a very great many districts the number of women offering their serveces at the present time was greatly in excess of any ascertained demand, and u much larger numbers were required he believed they would be forthcoming without undue pressure from the Government or public opinion. It is precisely because of this fact that the national service of women should be properly organised. The Director of National Service expects to be in a position to give details of his scheme for women volunteers in the course of this week, but the women's problem is complicated by the recruiting activities of other departments. On January 29th the Ministry of Munitions made an urgent appeal for 8,000 women for shell-filling factories, and on the following day it appealed for a further 20,000. The Board of Agriculture, on the other hand, decided to ask Mr. Chamberlain in future to supply them with women workers for the land, although in the past the Board has recruited and trained their own labour. Meanwhile there have been sundry rumours in the Press, now confirmed by Mr. Neville Chamberlain himself, that the War Office has a definite scheme of its own for the use of woman-power in the civilian posts with the Army abroad. The principle of such a proposal would be welcomed by women as enabling them to take an even fuller share in the sustained effort of the country, but its success would depend upon how the scheme was initiated and carried out, and in whose hands its organisation lay. The German Auxiliary Service Law is being administered by the War Bureau of the Prussian Ministry of War, aided by expert civilian advisers, both men and women, the latter being chosen from among the chief feminist leaders in the country. Unless similar measures are taken in this country any scheme for the organisation of women's national service is foredoomed to failure. More especially with regard to the rumoured War Office scheme, it is probable that the desire of women to work with and for the Army will be so great that the utmost care must be taken in recruiting, if the other needful occupations of women are not seriously to be dislocated. There is a widespread feeling that the whole work of recruiting, controlling, and organising women for national service, whether with the Army or at home, should be in the hands of women, and to this end a committee of picked women should be formed without delay to work under Mr. Neville Chamberlain. This Committee should consist of women who have proved themselves by service during the war, as well as some of the tested women officials already in Government service, and it should have the power to recommend for appointment all women officers needed at the outset for the scheme, including the staff of women inspectors who will be absolutely essential if the employment of women is to be on any large scale. The suggested women's committee might well advise as to the details of employment of the women needed for non-combatant work with the Army, as well as at home, such as terms of contract, health insurance, pay, grading, housing, uniform, etc. The more one considers every phase of the employment of large numbers of women, the more important is seems that the whole question should be handled by women, who understand its complexities more clearly than men can possibly do, and who would be able to bring their knowledge and experience to bear on the problems involved. What is absolutely essential is that a committee of women should be formed and a scheme of employment initiated by them, before any more public appeals are made to enlist women. The failure made by men in the past has been to enlist large numbers of eager women for "war-work" and then to discover that they were unable to place them. Much disappointement and irritation naturally ensued. We do not believe that this blunder would have been made had the organisation of women been placed in the hands of qualified members of their own sex, and the Director of National Service is to be congratulated on his stated intention to set up committees of representative women to deal with the many sides of the labour problem. On these committees, Mr. Chamberlain has stated, every women's society which has authority to speak for women will be represented.

The recommendations of the Speaker's Conference on Electoral Reform are now said to be in the hands of the Prime Minister. They include a number of drastic proposals for revising the register, abolishing plural voting and reducing the qualifying period for a vote to six months. It seems that the Committee approved of the prin-

Daily Mail 682
12. 2. 16.

WOMEN LEADERS OF WOMEN.

SOME NOTABLE ORGANISERS.

The plans of Mrs. H. J. Tennant, director of the Woman's Department of National Service, include co-operation with half a dozen able women already holding responsible Government positions. These women are discoveries of the war. They include:

MISS TALBOT, head of the Woman's Department at the Board of Agriculture. Now working 12 hours a day to help women to get on the land through the women's agricultural committees and to satisfy the up-to-date farmers who know how to make use of women's labour. She has travelled all over the country inspecting model schemes.

MISS DURHAM, Central Bureau of the Board of Trade. Has the organisation and classification of all women who apply for war work, and has a great reputation among employers for sending the right women for the particular work.

MISS A. GARDNER, Divisional Offices, Board of Trade. A very experienced organiser. Holds the strings of the women's departments in Employment Exchanges in London and all over the country.

MRS. CRAWFORD. After very successful organisation at the Ministry of Munitions has already been secured to help in the organisation of Women's National Service.

MISS BARKER, Woolwich Arsenal. She knows the whims and fancies, requirements and ability, of every type of woman who ever offered herself for work in a munition factory.

VOLUNTARY WORKERS.

Mrs. Tennant can also turn to a great band of women who have been organising voluntary associations since the beginning of the war, including:

LADY LONDONDERRY, head of Women's Legions, 72, Upper Berkeley-street, W. Has supplied women for the Army as cooks and motor-transport drivers, also for the land, and has organised canteens. Her aid in selecting women for responsible positions is keenly appreciated by the War Office.

LADY HENRY GROSVENOR, prominent among the organisers of hostels and canteens for women workers. Without these it would have been impossible to employ women on munitions.

MISS PICTON TURBERVILLE, organiser of welfare and hostel schemes for the Young Women's Christian Association all over the country.

MISS B. PICTON TURBERVILLE, a serious rival to her twin sister. Organiser of welfare schemes and hostels for young women at centres where the Young Men's Christian Association, under whom she works, is already established.

forms to be dealt with in the [illegible] space of time, the work being done by the staffs of the municipal authorities, assisted by a large army of voluntary workers. Unfortunately, the information supplied by the National Register was not used as it ought to have been, and the women's part of the register was not used at all, although they were expecting to be called upon and were ready to do their part.

This is simply a statement of fact which I refrain from criticising under present circumstances. As an experienced organiser, I consider the proposal that cards should be sent to the Department in London offering help will only lose time and not succeed, but if instructions were given by the Local Government Board to the 2,000 municipalities to utilise the details of the National Register, especially as regards ascertaining the number of women available for work on the land or any other pressing work, I am of opinion that the necessary information would be got in a very short time. As I have already said, the urgency for immediate work on the land is great, and I consider this the only way to deal promptly with the situation. The housing difficulty might be met by billeting on satisfactory terms or any other method that has been resorted to in connection with his Majesty's forces. I feel confident that when the women of the country fully realise the necessity and are told what to do patriotism and esprit de corps will do the rest.—Yours, etc.,

CHARLES W. MACARA.

23, York Street, Manchester.

[illegible] would be welcomed by women as enabling them to take an even fuller share in the sustained effort of the country, but its success would depend upon how the scheme was initiated and carried out, and in whose hands its organisation lay. The German Auxiliary Service Law is being administered by the War Bureau of the Prussian Ministry of War, aided by expert civilian advisers, both men and women, the latter being chosen from among the chief feminist leaders in the country. Unless similar measures are taken in this country any scheme for the organisation of women's national service is foredoomed to failure. More especially with regard to the rumoured War Office scheme, it is probable that the desire of women to work with and for the Army will be so great that the utmost care must be taken in recruiting, if the other needful occupations of women are not seriously to be dislocated. There is a widespread feeling that the whole work of recruiting, controlling, and organising women for national service, whether with the Army or at home, should be in the hands of women, and to this end a committee of picked women should be formed without delay to work under Mr. Neville Chamberlain. This Committee should consist of women who have proved themselves by service during the war, as well as some of the tested women officials already in Government service, and it should have the power to recommend for appointment all women officers needed at the outset for the scheme, including the staff of women inspectors who will be absolutely essential if the employment of women is to be on any large scale. The suggested women's committee might well advise as to the details of employment of the women needed for non-combatant work with the Army, as well as at home, such as terms of contract, health insurance, pay, grading, housing, uniform, etc. The more one considers every phase of the employment of large numbers of women, the more important is seems that the whole question should be handled by women, who understand its complexities more clearly than men can possibly do, and who would be able to bring their knowledge and experience to bear on the problems involved. What is absolutely essential is that a committee of women should be formed and a scheme of employment initiated by them, before any more public appeals are made to enlist women. The failure made by men in the past has been to enlist large numbers of eager women for "war-work" and then to discover that they were unable to place them. Much disappointement and irritation naturally ensued. We do not believe that this blunder would have been made had the organisation of women been placed in the hands of qualified members of their own sex, and the Director of National Service is to be congratulated on his stated intention to set up committees of representative women to deal with the many sides of the labour problem. On these committees, Mr. Chamberlain has stated, every women's society which has authority to speak for women will be represented.

The recommendations of the Speaker's Conference on Electoral Reform are now said to be in the hands of the Prime Minister. They include a number of drastic proposals for revising the register, abolishing plural voting and reducing the qualifying period for a vote to six months. It seems that the Committee approved of the principle of Women's Suffrage, but could not reach a unanimous decision as to the method of applying the principle; some members desired to limit the franchise to women with a property qualification, others were for wider democratic franchise for women, giving the vote to all over 25. According to the "Observer" of Sunday, January 28th, "it is rumoured in a significant way that even if no formal agreement on the question can yet be announced, matters have reached a stage praeeically ensuring a very large enfranchisement of women." By accepting the principle the Committee carried the question a long way towards fruition.

From reports received from Dr. Elsie Inglis we learn that since the retreat, Dr. Chesney's Field Hospital has continued to work for the 1st Serbian Division while it was resting, and Dr. Inglis and the staff and the Transport agreed to an urgent request from the Russian Red Cross to work for it. Dr. Inglis, staff and 25 Russian Orderlies and equipment for six weeks received orders to set up a hospital at a certain place and the Transport went to work independently for the Russians; but the line of fighting must have suddenly changed, as on arrival Dr. Inglis found the place being evacuated and the same happened subsequently on receiving further orders. Eventually after a most wearisome, hungry and cold journey, lasting a fortnight from the start Dr. Inglis arrived back at Braila. The Russians then gave the Unit a new building at Galatz, which was ideal in every respect. By cable it is reported that the hospital has had to be removed to Reni.

VOLUNTARY WORKERS.

Mrs. Tennant can also turn to a great band of women who have been organising voluntary associations since the beginning of the war, including:

LADY LONDONDERRY, head of Women's Legions, 72, Upper Berkeley-street, W. Has supplied women for the Army as cooks and motor-transport drivers, also for the land, and has organised canteens. Her aid in selecting women for responsible positions is keenly appreciated by the War Office.

LADY HENRY GROSVENOR, prominent among the organisers of hostels and canteens for women workers. Without these it would have been impossible to employ women on munitions.

MISS PICTON TURBERVILLE, organiser of welfare and hostel schemes for the Young Women's Christian Association all over the country.

MISS B. PICTON TURBERVILLE, a serious rival to her twin sister. Organiser of welfare schemes and hostels for young women at centres where the Young Men's Christian Association, under whom she works, is already established.

The Queen 682/14
10·2·17

WOMEN FORWARD!

THE FORMATION of a Women's Department of National Service, with Mrs H. J. Tennant as its director and Miss Violet Markham as assistant director, is a considerable event. Mrs Tennant was the first Chief Lady Superintendent of Factories before her marriage, and she has a ways kept most closely in touch with the industrial conditions and needs of working women. Miss Markham, too, brings ability and knowledge to her task. The call is now for our women generally to come forward.

Many women are, of course, responding to the demands that the State increasingly makes upon their powers. The women's departments of the employment exchanges all over the country are filled with women applicants for munition and other important work. On the men's side of these exchanges there is often comparatively little doing, as the men are already in their places. But the development of the scheme for voluntary national service and for substitution must inevitably lead to a further marshalling of the women's forces. Not only must the huge business of munition making by women be further extended, but very many more women must be brought into the field of agricultural production and distribution.

We are only, too, at the beginning of things in regard to the military auxiliary services. We are beginning to hear of trained women carpenters and joiners being sent to the front to build huts. The number of such women must be increased. Soon we shall probably find that women are being more extensively employed near (if not at) the front as motor transport drivers, army cooks, army bakers, canteen workers, and army clerks. Women have made such excellent quartermasters in some of the home hospitals that they might well try to rival the skill of the sergeants in catering and distributing food. It is possible that they might be quite as successful in keeping the ingredients of tea and soup, sausages and porridge, delicately separate.

The organisation of women's national service can hardly go far before questions will arise concerning occupations that are or are not indispensable in the national interest during war time. Large numbers of young and trained women are occupied to-day in home industries. The habit of wage-earning work which they have acquired makes them more available than women who are older or less disciplined. It will be extremely difficult to spare them, more particularly as some of them are even now doing work for which men had formerly been employed. But the time may come when some of them will be called up for service more directly concerned with the winning of the war. And their places must be taken by the less trained women. Wealthy householders, too, may have to be asked to manage with fewer domestic servants. Mothers may have to act as nurses to their own children, and the lady's maid may well be abolished for the period of the war.

There is also most assuredly a residue of women who are still not fully employed. There are youngish women looking after elderly mothers or aunts who at such a time as this might strive to look after themselves. There are also thousands of women who are not doing more than a half-day's work. The last women who can be pressed to change their duties are the mothers of quite young children. Yet even they could have more time to spare were it possible to organise residential children's nurseries for the benefit of wage-earning mothers engaged in national service. Still, the work of mothers is national service of the best kind when it is well done; therefore, let us first try to mobilise the women who are less tied by duties to the next generation.

The day may not be far distant when it will be necessary to appoint women's tribunals to determine which women should be recruited for national service and which others ought to be left to do the work they have already undertaken.

Daily Express
17·2·17

WOMEN.

After a eulogy of the part played by women in the war, Mr. Chamberlain said:—"Many women are waiting impatiently for the call; the call will come soon. Women may have confidence that their devotion will not be abused."

On the subject of professional men Mr. Chamberlain said:—

"The last thing I desire is that a man working with his brain should work with his hands, unless he desires to. There will be clerical and administrative positions in Government offices and important establishments in industry, and we expect to fill these places with professional men."

Daily Express

SUPREME CALL TO WOMEN.

TWO GREAT ARMIES REQUIRED.

ONE FOR FRANCE. ONE FOR FOOD.

FREE TRAINING, OUTFIT AND GOOD WAGES.

WHEN TO APPLY FOR SERVICE.

The exclusive publication in yesterday's "Daily Express" of the full and correct details of the national scheme for an army of women in France to relieve men for the fighting line caused the greatest interest throughout the whole country.

So many women offered their services at St. Ermin's Hotel yesterday that, to prevent disappointment, Mrs. Tennant has arranged that names and addresses will be taken of any who wish to enrol, but it must be clearly understood that actual enrolment cannot be made until the official call for women is issued.

This tremendous interest has brought forward the immediate necessity of putting ahead of it another great scheme for women—an army of 100,000 women for the land.

For the moment, therefore, the Army scheme, which will by no means be held in abeyance, will occupy the second place.

FOOD.

The question of the food supply and the urgent necessity for supplying sufficient workers for the land without retaining too many men of an age and fitness for the Army means that women are needed as soon as possible for all branches of agricultural labour.

The Women's National Service Department state that they will shortly require some 100,000 for the land. An appeal will be made for women milkers, carters, shepherdesses, buttermakers, and the like. In fact, there will be agricultural employment available for women of every class, provided they are healthy, willing, and prepared to work as hard as possible for the good of the country.

FREE TRAINING.

Where such women are not already experienced free training will be afforded them, and when they start work they will be provided free of charge with suitable clothing, such as boots, gaiters, overalls, and breeches. The wages will be on a generous scale. The matter naturally depends very much on the work required and the conditions.

When the Women's Service Department are ready to deal with applicants a printed application form, which the women will be asked to fill in, will be issued through the post offices.

It is felt that the 100,000 women required will readily come forward for this patriotic work, for women have already proved to the utmost that they are only too eager to help once a call is made for their services in a direction where they will certainly find health, happiness,

Daily Express 21-2-16 682

THE WOMAN AS SOLDIER.

MILITARY WORK BEHIND THE LINES IN FRANCE.

NEW ASPECT OF THE ERA OF KHAKI.

The war has brought into being many different aspects of woman as worker, organiser, and general helper, but the greatest innovation of all is the woman soldier, recognised by the military authorities, uniformed, living in camps beside the men, under the same conditions as to food and lodging, and working day in, day out, under strict military discipline.

In past times there were the vivandières, who followed the armies in France all through Napoleon's campaigns, but according to history these women, though plucky and hard working, were rather a wild lot, with very little notion of discipline or feminine prestige, who were always ready to hobnob with their soldier comrades.

FIT MEN RELEASED.

To-day these vivandières are replaced in the British Army by regiments of women who attend to the housekeeping, cooking, and well-being of the men, but who are upheld in their work by a keen spirit of patriotism, and bear themselves with military discipline and a full sense of what befits their position as members of a military unit. Now the scope for women soldiers is to be extended on far wider lines, and they are to be employed with the Army both here and in France in practically every capacity in which they are able to carry out the work, and so release thousands of fit men for service with the regiments.

It has only lately been realised how much useful work women can carry out in that vast organisation, with its network of different sections, which constitutes an army on active service. There are kitchens and canteens which women can run quite as well as men. There are offices and pay departments where the clerical work can be undertaken by the woman accountant or typist every inch as successfully as by the male clerk. Women in these days, thanks to their own energy and determination, are qualified to drive motor-cars and to take charge of technical stores, which means a wide knowledge of bolts and screws and all the thousand-and-one pieces of mechanism that are required for motor-cars, lorries, and army equipment of this type.

COMING INTO HER OWN.

There is not the smallest doubt that, had it been suggested that women should undertake work of this kind during the first months of the war, there would have been a great outcry, and the busybodies would have shaken their wise heads and said it was asking the impossible. Because women had never had a chance of proving otherwise, the opinion prevailed that if brought into close touch with the soldiery they would prove frivolous, irresponsible, and undisciplined, inefficient as workers, and unreliable in every way. Experience has happily proved the contrary.

The idea of enrolling women to work in units on military lines originated with themselves. Several women leaders came forward with carefully worked-out schemes, the women quickly offered their services, and in a very little while there were a number of organisations carrying on useful war work where the women wore uniform and were supervised on lines of military discipline.

When once it was seen that women could be trusted to work quietly and efficiently their services were rapidly commandeered. One of the first moves made by the military authorities was to take over the cookery section of the Women's Legion and to establish women as cooks in training and convalescent camps all over the country. It naturally followed that the camp cooks must live in the camps beside the soldiers, and soon the neatly dressed military cook in her khaki uniform, and wearing her Women's Legion badge, was seen hard at work preparing the men's food and taking charge of the messes.

STURDY COURAGE.

It has been found that putting women

after elderly mothers or aunts who at such a time as this might strive to look after themselves. There are also thousands of women who are not doing more than a half-day's work. The last women who can be pressed to change their duties are the mothers of quite young children. Yet even they could have more time to spare were it possible to organise residential children's nurseries for the benefit of wage-earning mothers engaged in national service. Still, the work of mothers is national service of the best kind when it is well done; therefore, let us first try to mobilise the women who are less tied by duties to the next generation.

The day may not be far distant when it will be necessary to appoint women's tribunals to determine which women should be recruited for national service and which others ought to be left to do the work they have already undertaken.

Daily Express
17-2-17

WOMEN.

After a eulogy of the part played by women in the war, Mr. Chamberlain said:—"Many women are waiting impatiently for the call; the call will come soon. Women may have confidence that their devotion will not be abused."

On the subject of professional men Mr. Chamberlain said:—

"The last thing I desire is that a man working with his brain should work with his hands, unless he desires to. There will be clerical and administrative positions in Government offices and important establishments in industry, and we expect to fill these places with professional men."

enrol, but it must be clearly understood that actual enrolment cannot be made until the official call for women is issued.

This tremendous interest has brought forward the immediate necessity of putting ahead of it another great scheme for women—an army of 100,000 women for the land.

For the moment, therefore, the Army scheme, which will by no means be held in abeyance, will occupy the second place.

FOOD.

The question of the food supply and the urgent necessity for supplying sufficient workers for the land without retaining too many men of an age and fitness for the Army means that women are needed as soon as possible for all branches of agricultural labour.

The Women's National Service Department state that they will shortly require some 100,000 for the land. An appeal will be made for women milkers, carters, shepherdesses, buttermakers, and the like. In fact, there will be agricultural employment available for women of every class, provided they are healthy, willing, and prepared to work as hard as possible for the good of the country.

FREE TRAINING.

Where such women are not already experienced free training will be afforded them, and when they start work they will be provided free of charge with suitable clothing, such as boots, gaiters, overalls, and breeches. The wages will be on a generous scale. The matter naturally depends very much on the work required and the conditions.

When the Women's Service Department are ready to deal with applicants a printed application form, which the women will be asked to fill in, will be issued through the post offices.

It is felt that the 100,000 women required will readily come forward for this patriotic work, for women have already proved to the utmost that they are only too eager to help once a call is made for their services in a direction where they will certainly find health, happiness, and the gratitude of the nation.

1,000,000 WOMEN WAR WORKERS.

Mr. Walter Runciman, M.P., ex-President of the Board of Trade, speaking at a suffrage meeting at Queen's Hall last night, said that Lord Kitchener once made the following statement to him:—

"'England will not put forth her full strength until women are doing nearly everything now done by men.'

"So far as I know," Mr. Runciman added, "Lord Kitchener was the first of our prominent men to realise the fact. No fewer than a million women have passed through employment agencies since the war began, principally for war work. Three thousand women a day, I believe, are going through these exchanges for work principally connected with the war."

women soldiers is to be extended on far wider lines, and they are to be employed with the Army both here and in France in practically every capacity in which they are able to carry out the work, and so release thousands of fit men for service with the regiments.

It has only lately been realised how much useful work women can carry out in that vast organisation, with its network of different sections, which constitutes an army on active service. There are kitchens and canteens which women can run quite as well as men. There are offices and pay departments where the clerical work can be undertaken by the woman accountant or typist every inch as successfully as by the male clerk. Women in these days, thanks to their own energy and determination, are qualified to drive motor-cars and to take charge of technical stores, which means a wide knowledge of bolts and screws and all the thousand-and-one pieces of mechanism that are required for motor-cars, lorries, and army equipment of this type.

COMING INTO HER OWN.

There is not the smallest doubt that, had it been suggested that women should undertake work of this kind during the first months of the war, there would have been a great outcry, and the busybodies would have shaken their wise heads and said it was asking the impossible. Because women had never had a chance of proving otherwise, the opinion prevailed that if brought into close touch with the soldiery they would prove frivolous, irresponsible, and undisciplined, inefficient as workers, and unreliable in every way. Experience has happily proved the contrary.

The idea of enrolling women to work in units on military lines originated with themselves. Several women leaders came forward with carefully worked-out schemes, the women quickly offered their services, and in a very little while there were a number of organisations carrying on useful war work where the women wore uniform and were supervised on lines of military discipline.

When once it was seen that women could be trusted to work quietly and efficiently their services were rapidly commandeered. One of the first moves made by the military authorities was to take over the cookery section of the Women's Legion and to establish women as cooks in training and convalescent camps all over the country. It naturally followed that the camp cooks must live in the camps beside the soldiers, and soon the neatly dressed military cook in her khaki uniform, and wearing her Women's Legion badge, was seen hard at work preparing the men's food and taking charge of the messes.

STURDY COURAGE.

It has been found that putting women in uniform and housing them in huts is immensely successful. The mere fact of wearing uniform inculcates a sense of military discipline. The women are extremely proud of their position, they know that they are "doing their bit," and are thus able to be of direct assistance to their menfolk. They show themselves perfectly ready to adapt themselves to novel conditions. Discomforts are treated with a smile. A woman ploughing her way through seas of mud in a camp where the ground has become a veritable morass will treat it as a joke. They are obedient to orders, and even the strict rule that prevails in camps where the women cooks and waitresses are working that no woman in uniform may speak to a soldier within the camp precincts is seldom broken.

Without uniform it would naturally be impossible to keep control, and the sentries on duty would not be able to distinguish the legitimate workers from strangers, but these battalions of women soldiers can be as easily handled as battalions of drilled men. There is little doubt that the women who go over to France to undertake military work there will prove as successful as their sisters in the camps at home.

There can be no gibes in these days at the woman in uniform. Through her own steadfastness and courage she has won respect from all. The army of women workers has its recognised place in the defence of the nation and the nation's rights. It is no longer the woman's duty to sit at home and watch and wait. The call has come for her to be up and doing, to equip herself as a soldier, and, with a soldier's sense of responsibility and the stern necessity for discipline and obedience to orders, to carry on many kinds of important work in the very midst of the expeditionary forces.

Daily Express
28.2.17

682/15

WOMEN FOR SERVICE AT THE FRONT.

THE OFFICIAL CALL.

WHAT TO DO: WHERE TO APPLY: FULL DETAILS OF THE SCHEME.

The War Office yesterday issued the full conditions of service under the scheme devised by Lieut.-General Sir Nevil Macready, the Adjutant-General, for the enrolment of women in the army in France. The scheme was announced exclusively in the "Daily Express" on February 20.

Women will be required as clerks, typists, cooks, waitresses, drivers, and telephonists, and for various other classes of work. No woman under twenty or over forty will be accepted. The rates of pay, excluding overtime, range from £1 to £2 12s. 6d. a week.

FULL CONDITIONS OF SERVICE.

PAY, TRAINING, AND UNIFORM.

WAR OFFICE, Tuesday.

The conditions of service which have been sanctioned are as follows:—

PERIOD OF ENGAGEMENT.

For twelve months, subject to termination earlier at the discretion of the Army Council on one month's notice, except for misconduct or incompetence, when one week's notice will be given. The engagement may be renewed by mutual consent at the termination of the first period.

A bonus of £5 will be paid to each woman, irrespective of grade, on renewal of the agreement for a second period.

CLASSES OF EMPLOYMENT.

There are five main categories of employment:—

Clerical, typist, shorthand typist.
Cooks, waitresses, domestic staff.
Motor transport service.
Storehouse women, checkers, unskilled labour.
Telephone and postal services.

In addition there will be certain miscellaneous services.

RATES OF PAY.

CLERKS.	Per week, according to efficiency.
Ordinary clerical work and typists	23s. to 27s.
Clerks employed on higher clerical and supervisory duties	28s. to 32s.
Shorthand-typists	28s. to 32s.

The above rates of pay cover forty-two working hours a week, after which overtime will be paid at the rate of 7d. per hour for ordinary clerks, and 9d. per hour for clerks employed on higher work and shorthand-typists.

COOKS AND WAITRESSES.	Per annum.
Head cooks and waitresses	£40
Cooks, waitresses, housemaids	£26

(With free board and lodging and 6d. per week for personal washing.)

MOTOR TRANSPORT.	Per week.
Superintendents (1st class)	52s. 6d.
Superintendents (2nd class)	46s. 0d.
Head drivers	40s. 0d.
Qualified driver mechanics	35s. 0d
Washers	20s. 0d.

The above weekly rates include Sunday work when necessary, but if employed on Sunday a day's rest in lieu will be given. In addition, overtime will be allowed, except to superintendents, at the rate of 3d. per hour after 8½ working hours per day.

STORE WORKERS.	Per week.
Storehouse women and unskilled labour	20s.
(Extra pay up to 2s. per week where special aptitude is required.)
Loading hands	22s.
Checkers	22s. to 24s.
Assistant forewomen	24s
[illegible]	[illegible]

WHERE TO APPLY FOR ENROLMENT.

LIST OF QUESTIONS TO BE ANSWERED.

Women who wish to offer their services under the new scheme are asked to apply to:—

THE DIRECTOR,
Women's Dept., National Service,
St. Ermin's Hotel,
Westminster, S.W.

They will receive application forms on which the following particulars have to be stated:—

Name.
Age.
Nationality at birth.
Single or married.
Number of children.
Particulars of education.
School leaving age.
Names and addresses of two British householders who have known the applicant for two or more years.

Applicants are asked to state if they are willing to serve anywhere they may be required, and the point is emphasised that the offer of service can in no way be regarded as final enrolment.

Mrs. Tennant, Director of Women's National Service, informed a "Daily Express" representative yesterday that until the return of the commission which has been sent to France to make arrangements regarding accommodation for these women workers it will be impossible to say exactly how many will be required.

Women are urgently requested not to throw up any present occupation until they are certain that their offer of service has been accepted. Women working in munition factories and at essential trades are asked not to apply.

TRAINED WORKERS.

It should be clearly understood that only trained and fully experienced workers will be needed for the majority of the posts, and the untrained, inexperienced amateur need not offer her services for work where it is obvious that special knowledge is necessary. It is possible that only a limited number of women will be sent to work in France at first, and that a reserve of workers will be trained and employed in England until they are required abroad.

"The women will have a uniform, probably khaki," said Mrs. Tennant, "but the colour has not been definitely decided. The welfare and social arrangements will be carefully carried out, and everything possible will be done to safeguard the women."

Mrs. Tennant also states that there is a great and growing demand for women to help with the agricultural work of the nation at the present time. There is a wide scope for employment on the land, and women who are not fitted for the Army posts will have an opportunity of proving their patriotism by taking up land work instead. Details of the agricultural scheme as regard women workers will be published in full in the course of a few days.

Daily Express
28.2.17

682

THE CALL TO WOMEN.

A week ago the "Daily Express" exclusively announced the scheme under which women are to be employed in various capacities with the army in France. The conditions of service have now been published by the Adjutant-General. There can be no doubt that adequately trained women can be secured for the work allotted to them. Their engagement will release men who can be more advantageously employed in fighting units, and if the organisation is thorough and freed from red tape, the substitution should be effected swiftly and smoothly. Amateurs are not required. Only women technically equipped and experienced can be of any use. Other less exciting tasks are waiting for women with lower qualifications.

Daily Mail
2.3.17

WOMEN'S ARMY.

8,500 VOLUNTEERS.

APPLICANTS MUST NOT LEAVE WORK.

The first response to the appeal for volunteers for the Women's Army has been very great. Yesterday's posts brought 8,500 offers of service to the Women's Department of National Service, St. Ermins Hotel, Westminster. There were 5,500 completed forms and 3,000 applications for forms to fill in. There were hundreds of callers during the day.

Mrs. Tennant desires to point out that it is of the utmost importance that no woman shall leave her present employment in the hope of obtaining work under the National Service scheme. Although names of applicants are now being recorded no definite appeal for women for National Service has yet been issued, and if they leave their employment there is grave danger that a large number of them will be unemployed and will present a serious problem for the department. The scheme for the employment of women in agriculture is now ready and only awaits ratification by Mr. Neville Chamberlain before being announced.

Yesterday's offers came from every section of the community and from every part of Britain. Wealthy women, mill hands, teachers, clerks, domestic servants, dressmakers, factory forewomen, motor-car drivers, were among those represented. The postal staff at St. Ermins Hotel had to be increased from 6 to 20 in order to classify and register applications.

THE LURE OF FRANCE.

The number of offers from women willing to work on the land was probably a record for one day, but it is clearly service in France which has the greater appeal. All day there were little consultations in the hall where applicants filled up forms. The line "Nature of business" on the form was the subject of debate, and the problem the precise way in which to express a preference for work in France. Nearly all the applicants agreed to serve at home if necessary. They are being asked to register for service in either Great Britain or France, although preferences will be granted where possible.

There is a steady inflow of men volunteers for National Service. Of the 630 centres into which the country is divided, nearly 600 have notified the formation of local organising committees.

UNIFORM.

WAR OFFICE, Tuesday.

The conditions of service which have been sanctioned are as follows:—

PERIOD OF ENGAGEMENT.

For twelve months, subject to termination earlier at the discretion of the Army Council on one month's notice, except for misconduct or incompetence, when one week's notice will be given. The engagement may be renewed by mutual consent at the termination of the first period.

A bonus of £5 will be paid to each woman, irrespective of grade, on renewal of the agreement for a second period.

CLASSES OF EMPLOYMENT.

There are five main categories of employment:—

Clerical, typist. shorthand typist.
Cooks, waitresses, domestic staff.
Motor transport service.
Storehouse women, checkers, unskilled labour.
Telephone and postal services.

In addition there will be certain miscellaneous services.

RATES OF PAY.

	Per week, according to efficiency.
CLERKS.
Ordinary clerical work and typists	23s. to 27s.
Clerks employed on higher clerical and supervisory duties	28s. to 32s.
Shorthand-typists	28s. to 32s.

The above rates of pay cover forty-two working hours a week, after which overtime will be paid at the rate of 7d. per hour for ordinary clerks, and 9d. per hour for clerks employed on higher work and shorthand-typists.

	Per annum.
COOKS AND WAITRESSES.
Head cooks and waitresses	£40
Cooks, waitresses, housemaids	£26
(With free board and lodging and 6d. per week for personal washing.)

	Per week.
MOTOR TRANSPORT.
Superintendents (1st class)	52s. 6d.
Superintendents (2nd class)	46s. 0d.
Head drivers	40s. 0d.
Qualified driver mechanics	35s. 0d
Washers	20s. 0d.

The above weekly rates include Sunday work when necessary, but if employed on Sunday a day's rest in lieu will be given. In addition, overtime will be allowed, except to superintendents, at the rate of 5d. per hour after 8½ working hours per day.

	Per week.
STORE WORKERS.
Storehouse women and unskilled labour	20s.
(Extra pay up to 2s. per week where special aptitude is required.)
Leading hands	22s.
Checkers	22s. to 24s.
Assistant forewomen	24s
Forewomen	24s. to 30s.
(According to number of staff supervised.)

The above rates cover forty-eight working hours a week. Overtime, at time and a quarter for the first two hours a day; thereafter, and on Sundays, time and a half.

TELEPHONE AND POSTAL SERVICES.

Rates of pay are under consideration by the Postmaster-General, and will be announced later.

MISCELLANEOUS SERVICES.

Special rates of pay according to nature of employment with a minimum of 20s. per week.

GENERAL CONDITIONS.

Age.—No woman under twenty or over forty years of age will be eligible.

Agreement.—A short form of agreement will be entered into.

Health.—A medical examination by a woman doctor will be necessary.

Training.—The period of preparation in England will include elementary instruction in hygiene and discipline.

Journey.—Free conveyance to and from France on appointment and termination of engagement will be provided.

Leave.—A fortnight's leave will be given during each year's service.

Uniform.—An allowance of £4 will be paid to provide uniform at the beginning of service, with a further grant of £1 at the end of six months. Similar grants will be made for the second year's service. Slightly different grants will be made in the case of the motor transport section.

Board and Lodging.—In all cases other than cooks, waitresses, and domestic staff, storehouse women and unskilled labour, and miscellaneous services, a deduction not exceeding 14s. per week will be made to cover cost of board and lodging. In the case of storehouse women and unskilled labour and miscellaneous services, when the pay is less than 21s. per week the deduction will not in any case exceed 13s. a week

Accommodation in France.—The women will be accommodated while in France in hostels under the care and supervision of lady superintendents.

The above applies to France only. It must be understood that enrolment for service includes service at home as well as in France. Those who have a preference should declare it. Where preference for France is declared it will be satisfied if possible, and service in France may ultimately follow service begun at home.

ANSWERED.

Women who wish to offer their services under the new scheme are asked to apply to:—

THE DIRECTOR,
Women's Dept., National Service,
St. Ermin's Hotel,
Westminster, S.W.

They will receive application forms on which the following particulars have to be stated:—

Name.
Age.
Nationality at birth.
Single or married.
Number of children.
Particulars of education.
School leaving age.
Names and addresses of two British householders who have known the applicant for two or more years.

Applicants are asked to state if they are willing to serve anywhere they may be required, and the point is emphasised that the offer of service can in no way be regarded as final enrolment.

Mrs. Tennant, Director of Women's National Service, informed a "Daily Express" representative yesterday that until the return of the commission which has been sent to France to make arrangements regarding accommodation for these women workers it will be impossible to say exactly how many will be required.

Women are urgently requested not to throw up any present occupation until they are certain that their offer of service has been accepted. Women working in munition factories and at essential trades are asked not to apply.

TRAINED WORKERS.

It should be clearly understood that only trained and fully experienced workers will be needed for the majority of the posts, and the untrained, inexperienced amateur need not offer her services for work where it is obvious that special knowledge is necessary. It is possible that only a limited number of women will be sent to work in France at first, and that a reserve of workers will be trained and employed in England until they are required abroad.

"The women will have a uniform, probably khaki," said Mrs. Tennant, "but the colour has not been definitely decided. The welfare and social arrangements will be carefully carried out, and everything possible will be done to safeguard the women."

Mrs. Tennant also states that there is a great and growing demand for women to help with the agricultural work of the nation at the present time. There is a wide scope for employment on the land, and women who are not fitted for the Army posts will have an opportunity of proving their patriotism by taking up land work instead. Details of the agricultural scheme as regard women workers will be published in full in the course of a few days.

ment of National Service, St. Ermins Hotel, Westminster. There were 5,500 completed forms and 3,000 applications for forms to fill in. There were hundreds of callers during the day.

Mrs. Tennant desires to point out that it is of the utmost importance that no woman shall leave her present employment in the hope of obtaining work under the National Service scheme. Although names of applicants are now being recorded no definite appeal for women for National Service has yet been issued, and if they leave their employment there is grave danger that a large number of them will be unemployed and will present a serious problem for the department. The scheme for the employment of women in agriculture is now ready and only awaits ratification by Mr. Neville Chamberlain before being announced.

Yesterday's offers came from every section of the community and from every part of Britain. Wealthy women, mill hands, teachers, clerks, domestic servants, dressmakers, factory forewomen, motor-car drivers, were among those represented. The postal staff at St. Ermins Hotel had to be increased from 6 to 20 in order to classify and register applications.

THE LURE OF FRANCE.

The number of offers from women willing to work on the land was probably a record for one day, but it is clearly service in France which has the greater appeal. All day there were little consultations in the hall where applicants filled up forms. The line "Nature of business" on the form was the subject of debate, and the problem the precise way in which to express a preference for work in France. Nearly all the applicants agreed to serve at home if necessary. They are being asked to register for service in either Great Britain or France, although preferences will be granted where possible.

There is a steady inflow of men volunteers for National Service. Of the 630 centres into which the country is divided, nearly 600 have notified the formation of local organising committees.

Daily Express
21-2-17

WOMAN-POWER CHIEFS.

LADY MACKWORTH TO WORK FOR NATIONAL SERVICE.

Mr. Neville Chamberlain, Director-General of National Service, has appointed the following Commissioners for Women's Service:—

SCOTLAND.—Miss M. M. Paterson, a National Health Insurance commissioner for Scotland.

WALES.—The Hon. Lady Mackworth.

LONDON.—Miss Mona Wilson, a National Health Insurance commissioner for England.

Lady Mackworth, who is one of the survivors of the Lusitania disaster, is Lord Rhondda's only daughter, and she has given him valuable aid in business. She is a director of a dozen companies, and has affairs of her own in Cardiff. When her father went to America in 1915 she took over the entire management of his affairs.

Mr. Arthur Henderson, speaking at a National Service meeting at Leeds last night, said we could not afford to allow the numbers in the Army, engaged on munitions, or employed in essential industries to fall below a safety minimum.

"I want to make it unmistakably plain," he added, "that if the numbers are not forthcoming, we shall have recourse to the only other alternative—compulsion."

The National Service Department makes a special appeal for ex-ploughmen who are now in other occupations to offer their services at once. They are urgently needed.

Star 13-3-17

WOMEN AND THE ARMY.

Miss Macarthur's Views of the War Office Scheme.

Miss Mary Macarthur, the women's labour leader, predicts a large and prompt response to the War Office appeal directly it is issued for women recruits for service with the Army in France. Women, she said, would offer themselves in great numbers, in spite of the fact that the wages offered are in several instances very much below the market rates.

The scheme, she pointed out to a "Daily News" interviewer, is bound to make a powerful appeal to sentiment, as the wages would be regarded to some extent from the same point of view as a soldier's pay, and many women would undoubtedly be influenced by a desire to be near their menfolk at the front.

"It is important," Miss Macarthur added, "to remember that no separation allowances are offered. Therefore women with dependents cannot think of volunteering. Again, it will be necessary that the women should be under strict discipline. To plant tens of thousands of women in the midst of an armed camp is an experiment that will need the utmost care and forethought. It will be very hard to draw the line between necessary supervision and harsh, intolerable restrictions. I am very glad to see that no girl under 20 will be eligible, and I think the age limit might well have been higher.

"While wishing the scheme well, one feels that it will need very careful watching, and that the country is entitled to the fullest possible information upon those points which appeal specially to women."

Evening News
26-2-17

MORE WOMEN COMMISSIONERS.

Other women commissioners, it is expected, may be appointed in addition to those who with Lady Mackworth are already in office.

The duties of a woman commissioner include:—

Increasing the supply of women's labour.

Considering the substitution of women for men.

Co-operation with the men commissioners in maintaining good relations between employers and employed.

Ensuring the welfare of the workers in the centres of employment.

Evening News
1-3-17

WHAT WOMEN CAN DO.

MRS. TENNANT OUTLINES THEIR WAR WORK.

Women who are eager to enlist for National Service may wait patiently and with confidence. Mrs. Tennant has them in mind. She has a place for every woman in the National Service.

"The wisdom of allowing a girl of seventeen to enrol for National Service has been questioned," Mrs. Tennant told The Evening News. "But it must be remembered that not every girl of seventeen who enrols will be accepted. The Selection Board which we are setting up will decide as to her fitness.

"In the dire need of the land for workers I think it would be a pity to refuse a strong, healthy girl of seventeen, because she was only that age. On the other hand, I have no prejudice against the middle-aged woman worker.

Mrs. H. J. Tennant.

"There are many women between forty-five and fifty who have been used to agricultural work, for instance, who would do much better work than a younger woman.

"There are many ways also for women to take the places of men and for older women to take the work of younger ones and release them for more active service. Office work, for instance, could be more in the hands of the older women

Part Time Workers.

"Women who have only part time to give will be used also.

"We are hoping to get them to work on such projects as:

Care Committee.
Infant Welfare Schemes.
Working Girls' Clubs.

"When the appeal for enrolment is made, if a woman will put herself in our hands, the Selection Board will decide whether she is doing better service where she is than she could do elsewhere."

Three directions in which women's work is to be used have been decided. They are:

The Women's Land Army.
The Women's Industrial Army.
The Women's Auxiliary Army.

The Land Army.

"In a very few days," said Mrs. Tennant, "the details of the land scheme will be made known to women.

"I cannot too strongly emphasise the national need for women to train for work on the land.

"It may not seem to women that in such work they are as closely helping the war as when they actually enable a man to join the fighting forces, but it has to be remembered that the forces must be fed. That is why we want the women workers on the land.

The Industrial Army:

Is simply a continuation of the substitution of women for men. This work has to be very carefully carried out. In many cases it has to be considered process by process.

"An industry having 80 different processes, for instance, may be able to substitute women for men in 10 different processes or in 70, and then the greatest nicety of adjustment is required.

"We shall use the existing Employment Exchange machinery in effecting this.

"We are also setting up a National Service Exchange at St. Ermin's Hotel in connection with the Employment Exchanges."

The Auxiliary Army.

Employment with the Auxiliary Army is divided into five classes:—

(a) Clerical, Typist, Shorthand-Typist.

(b) Cooks, Waitresses, and Domestic Staff.

(c) Motor, Transport Service.

(d) Storehouse Woman, Checkers, and Unskilled Labour.

(e) Telephone and Postal Services.

In addition there will be certain miscellaneous services which do not fall within the above main classification.

The rates of pay are:—

Clerical work: 23s. to 38s. for a 43-hour week. Overtime, 7d. per hour.

Head cooks £40 per annum with free board and lodging and 6d. per week for washing.

Assistant cooks, waitresses and housemaids £26 per annum.

In the transport service wages range from 24s. for washers to 32s. 6d. for superintendents. Unskilled labour is paid 20s. per week.

"For the clerical and technical work," said Mrs. Tennant, "women with experience are wanted. Not this is not an appeal for

Evening News
20-2-17

682

500,000 WOMEN WANTED.

Great Scheme for Helping in Army Work.

An Army of women is to be called up shortly for service with the Forces both at home and in France. "The Evening News" understands that about half a million women will eventually be needed.

They are to take the places of fighting men in clerical work, including typists, secretaries, accountants for the Army Pay Department; in housekeeping and cooking, in canteens; and as motor drivers, storekeepers, mechanical engineers, etc.

Only women with some experience will be taken at first, and they will be drafted to France in small detachments. Their services will be required as soon as the machinery is ready to deal with the new departure.

At present representative women who have most experience in dealing with the employment of women are engaged in drawing up a scheme which will absolutely ensure the welfare of the women who are sent to France.

No women will be sent until these authorities and the Army Council are satisfied that the arrangements are quite satisfactory.

Colonel Leigh-Wood and Mrs. Chalmers Watson, M.D., who are at the head of the new department formed to carry out this scheme of substitution, are therefore going to France in a day or two to arrange the housing and other matters for the Army women. Huts and hostels will probably be provided for the women.

A Woman Controller for France has also been appointed and Mrs. Gwynne-Vaughan, who is at present at Birkbeck College, will take this position.

CONDITIONS OF SERVICE.

The women soldiers will receive board and lodging and will wear uniform—khaki if possible. A full kit will be supplied to each woman exactly as if she were a soldier. The women will probably also have badges denoting to which "battalion" they belong. The rates of pay are now under consideration of the War Office, but it is expected the rates will be good.

Already about 33,000 women are employed in the Army as cooks, waitresses, and motor drivers, and in other work.

The headquarters of the new department are at Devonshire House, but women should not apply there. Mrs. Tennant, Director of the Women's Branch of National Service at St. Ermin's Hotel, will supply all the women needed.

St. Ermin's Hotel was besieged to-day by women anxious to volunteer for Army Service, either at home or abroad, and many women members of the clerical staff employed at the building submitted formal applications as soon as they reached headquarters to-day.

The applicants came from all parts of London, and many of them arrived in taxis. They were all informed that applications could not be considered, but that a scheme for National Service for women was in course of preparation, when forms similar to those issued to men would be procurable at all post offices and labour exchanges.

682/16

now in other occupations to offer their services at once. They are urgently needed.

Star 1-3-17

WOMEN AND THE ARMY.

Miss Macarthur's Views of the War Office Scheme.

Miss Mary Macarthur, the women's labour leader, predicts a large and prompt response to the War Office appeal directly it is issued for women recruits for service with the Army in France. Women, she said, would offer themselves in great numbers, in spite of the fact that the wages offered are in several instances very much below the market rates.

The scheme, she pointed out to a "Daily News" interviewer, is bound to make a powerful appeal to sentiment, as the wages would be regarded to some extent from the same point of view as a soldier's pay, and many women would undoubtedly be influenced by a desire to be near their menfolk at the front.

"It is important," Miss Macarthur added, "to remember that no separation allowances are offered. Therefore women with dependents cannot think of volunteering. Again, it will be necessary that the women should be under strict discipline. To plant tens of thousands of women in the midst of an armed camp is an experiment that will need the utmost care and forethought. It will be very hard to draw the line between necessary supervision and harsh, intolerable restrictions. I am very glad to see that no girl under 20 will be eligible, and I think the age limit might well have been higher.

"While wishing the scheme well, one feels that it will need very careful watching, and that the country is entitled to the fullest possible information upon those points which appeal specially to women."

Evening News 26-2-17

MORE WOMEN COMMISSIONERS.

Other women commissioners, it is expected, may be appointed in addition to those who with Lady Mackworth are already in office.

The duties of a woman commissioner include:—

Increasing the supply of women's labour.

Considering the substitution of women for men.

Co-operation with the men commissioners in maintaining good relations between employers and employed.

Ensuring the welfare of the workers in the centres of employment.

ter work than a younger woman.

Mrs. H. J. Tennant.

"There are many ways also for women to take the places of men and for older women to take the work of younger ones and release them for more active service. Office work, for instance, could be more in the hands of the older women

Part Time Workers.

"Women who have only part time to give will be used also.

"We are hoping to get them to work on such projects as:

Care Committee.
Infant Welfare Schemes.
Working Girls' Clubs.

"When the appeal for enrolment is made, if a woman will put herself in our hands, the Selection Board will decide whether she is doing better service where she is than she could do elsewhere."

Three directions in which women's work is to be used have been decided. They are:

The Women's Land Army.
The Women's Industrial Army.
The Women's Auxiliary Army.

The Land Army.

"In a very few days," said Mrs. Tennant, "the details of the land scheme will be made known to women.

"I cannot too strongly emphasise the national need for women to train for work on the land.

"It may not seem to women that in such work they are as closely helping the war as when they actually enable a man to join the fighting forces, but it has to be remembered that the forces must be fed. That is why we want the women workers on the land.

The Industrial Army:

Is simply a continuation of the substitution of women for men. This work has to be very carefully carried out. In many cases it has to be considered process by process.

"An industry having 80 different processes, for instance, may be able to substitute women for men in 10 different processes or in 70, and then the greatest nicety of adjustment is required.

"We shall use the existing Employment Exchange machinery in effecting this.

"We are also setting up a National Service Exchange at St. Ermin's Hotel in connection with the Employment Exchanges."

The Auxiliary Army.

Employment with the Auxiliary Army is divided into five classes:—

(a) Clerical, Typist, Shorthand-Typist.

(b) Cooks, Waitresses, and Domestic Staff.

(c) Motor, Transport Service.

(d) Storehouse Woman, Checkers, and Unskilled Labour.

(e) Telephone and Postal Services.

In addition there will be certain miscellaneous services which do not fall within the above main classification.

The rates of pay are:—

Clerical work: 23s. to 38s. for a 43-hour week. Overtime, 7d. per hour.

Head cooks £40 per annum with free board and lodging and 6d. per week for washing.

Assistant cooks, waitresses and housemaids £26 per annum.

In the transport service wages range from 20s. for washers to 52s. 6d. for superintendents. Unskilled labour is paid 20s. per week.

"For the clerical and technical work," said Mrs. Tennant, "women with experience are wanted. But this is not an appeal for them to enrol for service yet.

"If they wish, they can register their names on forms which will be supplied from St. Ermin's Hotel. Women who do not register until an appeal is actually made will stand just the same chance of selection as those who have already done so."

women. Huts and hostels will probably be provided for the women.

A Woman Controller for France has also been appointed and Mrs. Gwynne-Vaughan, who is at present at Birkbeck College, will take this position.

CONDITIONS OF SERVICE.

The women soldiers will receive board and lodging and will wear uniform—khaki if possible. A full kit will be supplied to each woman exactly as if she were a soldier. The women will probably also have badges denoting to which "battalion" they belong. The rates of pay are now under consideration of the War Office, but it is expected the rates will be good.

Already about 33,000 women are employed in the Army as cooks, waitresses, and motor drivers, and in other work.

The headquarters of the new department are at Devonshire House, but women should not apply there. Mrs. Tennant, Director of the Women's Branch of National Service at St. Ermin's Hotel, will supply all the women needed.

St. Ermin's Hotel was besieged to-day by women anxious to volunteer for Army Service, either at home or abroad, and many women members of the clerical staff employed at the building submitted formal applications as soon as they reached headquarters to-day.

The applicants came from all parts of London, and many of them arrived in taxis. They were all informed that applications could not be considered, but that a scheme for National Service for women was in course of preparation, when forms similar to those issued to men would be procurable at all post offices and labour exchanges.

682/16

Financial News
5 · 3 · 17

MR. CHAMBERLAIN WANTS 5 0,000 MEN.

Speaking at Whitefield's Mission yesterday, Mr. Neville Chamberlain said the enemy was wavering. Now was the time to hit him hardest. To do this not only was it necessary to keep up the forces in the field, but also to maintain continuous supplies of munitions for the armies and the food for civilians. He had now 100,000 volunteers for National Service—five divisions of the new Industrial Army; but he wanted five times as many. He should get them if he were supported, as he believed he would be, by the patriotism and good will of the people of this country.

15,000 APPLICATIONS FROM WOMEN.

The following was issued by the National Service Department on Saturday evening:—

Although no direct appeal has been made by the National Service Department (Women's Section) for offers of Service from Women in the way they have been invited from men, 15,000 applications from women have been received at St. Ermin's Hotel within the last three days. Saturday morning's first post brought nearly 2,000 letters and forms, and further heavy deliveries are expected during the day. A staff of 50 skilled sorters are at work on the posts, and a still larger staff will be employed on Monday to deal with the week-end deliveries. So well is the work organised that each day's post is completely dealt with by night time. The applications are sifted in five large rooms at St. Ermin's, Westminster. In the first room the letters are opened, and application forms and important letters are sorted; in the second the letters are read and classified; in the third, registered and numbered; in the fourth, envelopes are addressed and numbered application forms are enclosed. The return application forms are dealt with in the fifth room, where they are attached to the original letters classified according to district and sent to the Commissioners, to be further sorted according to trades and occupations and sifted in final readiness for the individual candidate to be called up for National Service. Applications have been received from every class of women throughout the land, and from the wealthiest to the poorest the most earnest desire is expressed to serve the nation. Very many trained and skilled women have applied; also a great number of domestic servants.

The following additional meetings have been arranged by the Parliamentary National Service (Meetings) Committee: March 9, Right Hon. R. Munro, K.C., M.P., Harrogate; March 7, Sir L. Chiozza Money, M.P., Kettering; March 16, Right Hon. Sir J. Compton-Rickett, M.P., York; March 18, Mr. T. W. Dobson, Woking (at 3.15 p.m.).

Daily Mail
16 · 3 · 17

USE THE GIRL GUIDES.

To the Editor of The Daily Mail.

Sir,—It is a source of surprise to me that a call is not made to the "Girl Guides" of England.

There are thousands of girls in this movement trained for domestic work, cookery, clerk's work, and the like. I feel sure they would welcome the call to be of any use in this critical time.

I. R.

ARE WOMEN REALLY WANTED?

To the Editor of The Daily Mail.

Sir,—Are women really wanted?

Twice since May 1916 the Government has had my name on the register to help, and twice (each after an interval of four months) a different Department has written asking me if I still wished my name to be on the register.

My brave brother was blown to pieces at sea in July 1915—is it any wonder I wished to help to end this war? And yet we are still being told that conscription for women will soon come into force.

ELIZABETH J. WELLBURN.

Sheen Cottage, Thorpe-lane, Robin Hood's Bay.

The Gentlewoman
10 · 3 · 17

6

682

National Service & Mrs. Tennant's Plans.

OUT of the chaos of conflicting claims for the first drafts of the Women's Army, Mrs. Tennant is gradually being able to evolve a definite scheme of service. She has been confronted during the first fortnight of her work with considerable difficulties such as invariably attend the inception of every new movement. When the call for women voluntary workers was first mooted, a good many departments were anxious to utilise their services, and it was an extremely difficult thing to determine which branch of national activity had the strongest claims. The premature publication of the request for volunteers for France must have complicated matters in no small degree, and so anxious were women to enter upon this attractive adventure that many thousands sent in their applications. It cannot be said that they were much to blame, inasmuch as there is something fascinating about the prospect of being able to help our men in or about the actual battlefield. It showed clearly that the glorious spirit which animated Joan of Arc is not dead amongst British women.

It is a pity to have to damp the ardour of these chivalrous volunteers for foreign service, but it should be pointed out that the needs which the Government have in view will be defeated if any woman offers her services who is at present employed in necessary and useful work to the country. Furthermore, it should be clearly understood that there are other considerations infinitely more important than the supply of women for France, and Mrs. Tennant has now made it perfectly clear that the paramount scheme for the moment is that for the employment of women in agriculture. As the Prime Minister pointed out, our food stocks are getting dangerously low, and, in order that they shall be preserved and increased, every ounce of available labour must, for the time being, be diverted to the land. Occupation of this sort does not possess the glamour of foreign service, but if every woman who undertakes it realises that she is doing more to help our soldiers and our country by devoting herself to agricultural work than any other form of activity just now, she will feel that her patriotism is no vain thing, but is of real practical use in the solution of a very great problem.

I am informed that offers have come in from every section of the community, and from every part of Britain. The wealthy women, mill hands, teachers, clerks, domestic servants, dressmakers, factory forewomen, motor-car drivers, are amongst those who have sent in to offer their services, and the postal staff at St. Ermin's has had to be considerably increased in order to classify and register applications. Applications for service under the War Office are now being dealt with by the Women's Section of National Service, but in order that the thousands who have applied should not be disappointed and disheartened they must be warned that even after the successful applicants have been enrolled it will necessarily be some time before all will be called up; the War Office, at present, demands a steady flow of women workers, and not a sudden rush. The demands for agriculture come simultaneously with those for War Office Service, and in the considered opinion of many are of greater importance; and while there are fields to be ploughed, land to be cleaned, and crops to be sown, it is the duty of all not engaged in other necessary work to throw themselves with vigour into the work of the soil. By doing this they will prevent a great deal of unnecessary suffering at home, and be able to keep our fighting men well supplied with food. I would therefore urge on my readers who happen to be in one of the 630 centres into which the country is divided to support the local organising committees who are recruiting women for this urgent national work.

Morning Post
7. 3. 17

NATIONAL SERVICE.

EXPLAINING THE SCHEME.

CONFERENCE OF LOCAL DELEGATES.

An important conference of representatives from National Service Committees which have been set up in every part of Great Britain was held at Caxton Hall, Westminster, yesterday. Lord Rhondda, President of the Local Government Board, presided, and was supported by Mr. Neville Chamberlain, Director-General of National Service; Mr. Hayes Fisher, M.P., Parliamentary Secretary to the Local Government Board; the Lord Mayor of London, the Lord Provost of Edinburgh, the Mayor of Westminster, many members of Parliament, and the chief officials of the National Service Department. About 600 delegates were present, and the hall and galleries were crowded.

Lord Rhondda said he thought the local authorities and recruiting committees had been complimented in being asked to take up the work, and he hoped they would do their utmost to support Mr. Chamberlain by forming, as speedily as they could, special Associations for National Service in every town and district, and by instituting a house-to-house canvass for volunteers. He also urged that the political agents of each party should be brought into the scheme.

Mr. Neville Chamberlain said he was aware that some persons in the country thought that a compulsory scheme ought to have been started at once. But that was a matter for the War Cabinet, and they were under pledges that the voluntary system should have its trial. It was their duty as patriotic citizens to do everything in their power to make the best of it, and render compulsion unnecessary. There were some also who feared that compulsion would come hereafter. If it should, the Prime Minister had given him leave to say that the original volunteers would be released from their engagements, so that in no way would they be on a worse footing than those who were brought in under compulsion. A second point was often raised: Why were those who were already Government employees asked to enrol? Because the appeal was universal. It was not desired to have exemptions on this ground or that, as in the case of the early recruiting for the Army, but because all were asked to enrol it did not mean that all would be called up. Indeed, the more who enrolled the smaller would be the proportion of the called-up, and no one would be removed from his present work except to work in which he could do better service to his country.

Business and Professional Men.

The problem of business and professional men was the next point. Such might, in many cases, hang back, and be afraid that they might have to do work of an unsuitable kind, even manual labour, and at a lower rate of remuneration than would enable them to live as they and their dependents had been accustomed to live. They were making special provision for these, and were asking them to present themselves for examination at Employment Exchanges or public buildings before specially appointed representatives. Their cases would be considered by men of their own class, often, indeed, by other volunteers, who could do the country good service by undertaking this task. For the most part they looked to find work for these business and professional men in Government offices, in clerical and administrative posts vacated by young men going into the Army because of the cancellation of Government exemptions. They knew that on a volunteer being called up, after his offer of service, his employer had a right of appeal against his being taken away on the ground that he was already doing work of national importance. As orginally arranged, this appeal would go to the Sub-Commissioner in the district, whose judgment was final. The object of that was to avoid the delays which had occurred in connection with the military Tribunals, but they might have to modify the scheme. They had decided to give a right of appeal not only to the employer, but to the employee also, and to set up a local Court of Appeal. This might remove the doubts of a would-be volunteer afraid to trust to the judgment of a single man. The question of part-time service was constantly being brought up. It was much harder to allocate part-time than whole-time service, and for this reason they had decided on a whole-time scheme. But they were endeavouring to arrange for some part-time service locally. For instance, they had been able to make use of the Stock Exchange's offer of one day a week, and this week the members and their staff were engaged in addressing letters from the Government to the agriculturists of the country. A certain amount of work in Government Departments would also be taken up by the Stock Exchange and their staff. With regard to the employment of women, there were many difficulties which prevented them from moving at so quick a pace—difficulties connected with the kind of work, with housing, &c. But appeals would be made to women for special work as required.

Lord Rhondda, before leaving the chair, announced that, although he was within three months of sixty-one, he had enrolled himself as a National Volunteer. (Hear, hear.)

The Employment of Women.

Major C. G. C. Hamilton, M.P., Chief of the Enrolment Section, then addressed the conference on points of organisation. He mentioned that on March 24 it was intended to have a National Service Day, and on the following day the clergy and ministers of all denominations would be asked to make a special appeal from the pulpits. On March 31 the present campaign for volunteers would come to an end, so that there were only three weeks in which to carry it through. Referring to the question of women, Major Hamilton said that women were not wanted to enrol at present on the ordinary enrolment cards. Special appeals would be issued in due course. Mrs. Tennant hoped to hold a mass meeting of women in London in about ten days' time, when the scheme for the enrolment of women would be launched. The important point

Daily Express
9. 3. 17

682 | 18

WOMEN AND THE WAR.

NATIONAL SERVICE CAMPAIGN EXTENDED INDEFINITELY.

The great mass meeting of women at which the women's national service scheme will be launched once again will be held at the Royal Albert Hall on Saturday, March 17. Mr. Chamberlain will preside, and Mrs. Tennant and Miss Violet Markham, the chiefs of the Women's National Service Department, will speak.

It was officially stated yesterday that there is, at present, no time limit for voluntary enrolment under the National Service scheme, and that the enrolment of volunteers will be continued beyond March. 31. The statement that the campaign would end on March 31 was made at the conference at Westminster on Tuesday by Major Hamilton, M.P., chief of the enrolment section.

It is hoped, however, that by March 31 the success of Mr. Neville Chamberlain's scheme will be ensured. The number of volunteers enrolled up to mid-day yesterday was 114,803.

"If I am to be guided by the experience I have gained in moving up and down the country," said Mr. Arthur Henderson at Reading yesterday, "I do not hesitate to say that the army of men and women who will presently be enrolled will be sufficient to enable us to carry out our objects in view, which will lead to a successful termination of the war."

In order to employ to the best possible advantage national service volunteers of the professional and administrative type, Mr. Chamberlain has arranged for the co-operation of the professional and business register, which is a branch of the employment department of the Ministry of Labour. Employers should address applications to the Professional and Business Register, Ministry of Labour, Queen Anne's-chambers, Westminster.

Daily Mail
12. 3. 17

THE QUEEN AND WOMEN'S SERVICE.

WOMEN-ONLY MEETING AT ALBERT HALL.

The Queen will attend a great mass meeting for women only—the most representative gathering of women ever held—at the Albert Hall next Saturday, when the women's scheme of National Service will be launched. This is the first time her Majesty has consented to attend a public meeting. She has relaxed her rule owing to the great interest she is taking in the scheme.

Mr. Neville Chamberlain will preside. Mrs. Tennant, Director of the Women's Department of the National Service Ministry, and Miss Violet Markham, Assistant-Director, will explain the scheme. Other speakers include Lord Derby, Secretary for War; Mr. Prothero, Minister of Agriculture; and Mr. Hodge, Labour Minister.

The audience will be composed not only of representative women and women organisers of all classes but also of women and girls straight from their daily work in uniforms and overalls, Red Cross, V.A.D., munitionières, van-girls and motor-drivers, women under the War Office, women police, postwomen, and many others doing men's work.

Every one of the 9,000 seats in the Albert Hall will be free. Seats will be given to those who state they will be present, and a limited number of admission tickets can be had on application to "Albert Hall Meeting," National Service, Women's Section, Westminster.

The meeting begins at 3 p.m.; doors open 2 p.m.

The Man and Woman muddle is referred to in Page 6.

Daily Telegraph
12. 3. 17

682

HER MAJESTY AND WOMEN'S WAR WORK.

ALBERT HALL MEETING

It is officially announced that the Queen has consented to be present at the Women's National Service meeting at the Royal Albert Hall next Saturday afternoon. Her Majesty has thus once again shown her active support in all matters pertaining to the interests of women. It is entirely contrary to her Majesty's usual practice to attend at any public meeting, but in view of the great importance of this particular gathering she has made an exception, and, by her presence, will convince the women assembled, an through them their sisters throughout the Empire, of the necessity of all working together towards final victory.

This will be the most representative gathering of women workers ever brought together. All those anxious to help to beat the Hun should make an effort to be present, or represented, to hear the Secretary of State for War, the President of the Board of Agriculture, and the Minister for Labour tell them what is required of women in this most critical moment of the nation's history, and also to hear their own advocates, Mrs. Tennant and Miss Markham, tell what great work women have already done in the nation's service since Aug. 4, 1914, and what they are further ready to undertake. The audience will be composed, not only of representative women of all classes, and organisers of effort, but also of women and girls who have come straight from their actual daily work; the uniforms and overalls of the Red Cross and V.A.D. services, of munition workers, transport workers, women under the War Office, women police, post women, and many other women who are now undertaking men's work, will be brought together. Invitations have been sent to the various women's societies placing boxes at their disposal, to peeresses, the wives of lords-lieutenant, Cabinet Ministers, members of Parliament, and of the clergy, to representative women of Roman Catholicism, Nonconformity, and of the arts.

The meeting will commence at three p.m., and the doors are to be open at two o'clock. Every one of the 9,000 seats in the Albert Hall will be free. Seats will be allocated to those who signify their intention of being present, and a limited number of admission tickets can be had on application to "Albert Hall Meeting," National Service, Women's Section, Westminster, as the supply is already nearly exhausted.

CONFERENCE WITH LABOUR.

The Director-General of National Service, feeling that his scheme has not yet been fully understood by those who are likely to be most valuable to it, has invited trade union representatives from all the societies in the United Kingdom to meet him at the Central Hall, Westminster, on Wednesday next, at half-past two, to discuss some very important proposals which are being made in respect to the remuneration which labour is to receive in connection with the voluntary scheme for national service. The chair will be taken by Mr. Stephen Walsh, M.P., Parliamentary Secretary to the National Service Department, who will be speaking in public for the first time in his new capacity. Other speakers will be Mr. Arthur Henderson and Mr. John Hodge. About 600 representatives of trade unions are expected to be present.

that was a matter for the War Cabinet, and they were under pledges that the voluntary system should have its trial. It was their duty as patriotic citizens to do everything in their power to make the best of it, and render compulsion unnecessary. There were some also who feared that compulsion would come hereafter. If it should, the Prime Minister had given him leave to say that the original volunteers would be released from their engagements, so that in no way would they be on a worse footing than those who were brought in under compulsion. A second point was often raised: Why were those who were already Government employees asked to enrol? Because the appeal was universal. It was not desired to have exemptions on this ground or that, as in the case of the early recruiting for the Army, but because all were asked to enrol it did not mean that all would be called up. Indeed, the more who enrolled the smaller would be the proportion of the called-up, and no one would be removed from his present work except to work in which he could do better service to his country.

BUSINESS AND PROFESSIONAL MEN.

The problem of business and professional men was the next point. Such might, in many cases, hang back, and be afraid that they might have to do work of an unsuitable kind, even manual labour, and at a lower rate of remuneration than would enable them to live as they and their dependents had been accustomed to live. They were making special provision for these, and were asking them to present themselves for examination at Employment Exchanges or public buildings before specially appointed representatives. Their cases would be considered by men of their own class, often, indeed, by other volunteers, who could do the country good service by undertaking this task. For the most part they looked to find work for these business and professional men in Government offices, in clerical and administrative posts vacated by young men going into the Army because of the cancellation of Government exemptions. They knew that on a volunteer being called up, after his offer of service, his employer had a right of appeal against his being taken away on the ground that he was already doing work of national importance. As orginally arranged, this appeal would go to the Sub-Commissioner in the district, whose judgment was final. The object of that was to avoid the delays which had occurred in connection with the military Tribunals, but they might have to modify the scheme. They had decided to give a right of appeal not only to the employer, but to the employee also, and to set up a local Court of Appeal. This might remove the doubts of a would-be volunteer afraid to trust to the judgment of a single man. The question of part-time service was constantly being brought up. It was much harder to allocate part-time than whole-time service, and for this reason they had decided on a whole-time scheme. But they were endeavouring to arrange for some part-time service locally. For instance, they had been able to make use of the Stock Exchange's offer of one day a week, and this week the members and their staff were engaged in addressing letters from the Government to the agriculturists of the country. A certain amount of work in Government Departments would also be taken up by the Stock Exchange and their staff. With regard to the employment of women, there were many difficulties which prevented them from moving at so quick a pace—difficulties connected with the kind of work, with housing, &c. But appeals would be made to women for special work as required.

Lord RHONDDA, before leaving the chair, announced that, although he was within three months of sixty-one, he had enrolled himself as a National Volunteer. (Hear, hear.)

THE EMPLOYMENT OF WOMEN.

Major C. G. C. HAMILTON, M.P., Chief of the Enrolment Section, then addressed the conference on points of organisation. He mentioned that on March 24 it was intended to have a National Service Day, and on the following day the clergy and ministers of all denominations would be asked to make a special appeal from the pulpits. On March 31 the present campaign for volunteers would come to an end, so that there were only three weeks in which to carry it through. Referring to the question of women, Major Hamilton said that women were not wanted to enrol at present on the ordinary enrolment cards. Special appeals would be issued in due course. Mrs. Tennant hoped to hold a mass meeting of women in London in about ten days' time, when the scheme for the enrolment of women would be launched. The important point for local committees to remember, added Major Hamilton, was the urgency of this appeal. It had to be completed by March 24. It was not a very long time, but it was long enough if they really tried.

A discussion followed, in which numerous questions were asked by delegates and replied to by Major Hamilton.

In reply to a question whether all men between eighteen and sixty-one were asked to enrol, Major Hamilton said that such was Mr. Neville Chamberlain's desire. To another delegate Major Hamilton pointed out that the limitations in regard to the transference of men from one non-essential industry to another industry was, after all, very limited in its operation, since all men between eighteen and forty-one were supposed to be either employed in essential occupations or were in the Army, so that the restrictions, in effect, applied only to men between forty-one and sixty-one. The obligation of a volunteer to carry out his undertaking for National Service, he stated, was a matter of honour, and compulsion did not apply to it. Replying to a question whether the Education Department had instructed the school teachers not to enrol, Major Hamilton said that it was the case, but he believed the instruction was to be withdrawn. Since the matter had come before the War Cabinet, it had been considered that teachers should enrol for the same reason as munition workers, volunteers, or others employed at present on important work for the State.

the professional and administrative type, Mr. Chamberlain has arranged for the co-operation of the professional and business register, which is a branch of the employment department of the Ministry of Labour. Employers should address applications to the Professional and Business Register, Ministry of Labour, Queen Anne's-chambers, Westminster.

Daily Mail
12 3-17

THE QUEEN AND WOMEN'S SERVICE.

WOMEN-ONLY MEETING AT ALBERT HALL.

The Queen will attend a great mass meeting for women only—the most representative gathering of women ever held—at the Albert Hall next Saturday, when the women's scheme of National Service will be launched. This is the first time her Majesty has consented to attend a public meeting. She has relaxed her rule owing to the great interest she is taking in the scheme.

Mr. Neville Chamberlain will preside. Mrs. Tennant, Director of the Women's Department of the National Service Ministry, and Miss Violet Markham, Assistant-Director, will explain the scheme. Other speakers include Lord Derby, Secretary for War; Mr. Prothero, Minister of Agriculture; and Mr. Hodge, Labour Minister.

The audience will be composed not only of representative women and women organisers of all classes but also of women and girls straight from their daily work in uniforms and overalls, Red Cross, V.A.D., munitionières, van-girls and motor-drivers, women under the War Office, women police, postwomen, and many others doing men's work.

Every one of the 9,000 seats in the Albert Hall will be free. Seats will be given to those who state they will be present, and a limited number of admission tickets can be had on application to "Albert Hall Meeting," National Service, Women's Section, Westminster.

The meeting begins at 3 p.m.; doors open 2 p.m.

The Man and Woman muddle is referred to in Page 6.

quired of women in this most critical moment of the nation's history, and also to hear their own advocates, Mrs. Tennant and Miss Markham, tell what great work women have already done in the nation's service since Aug. 4, 1914, and what they are further ready to undertake. The audience will be composed, not only of representative women of all classes, and organisers of effort, but also of women and girls who have come straight from their actual daily work; the uniforms and overalls of the Red Cross and V.A.D. services, of munition workers, transport workers, women under the War Office, women police, post women, and many other women who are now undertaking men's work, will be brought together. Invitations have been sent to the various women's societies placing boxes at their disposal, to peeresses, the wives of lords-lieutenant, Cabinet Ministers, members of Parliament, and of the clergy, to representative women of Roman Catholicism, Nonconformity, and of the arts.

The meeting will commence at three p.m., and the doors are to be open at two o'clock. Every one of the 9,000 seats in the Albert Hall will be free. Seats will be allocated to those who signify their intention of being present, and a limited number of admission tickets can be had on application to "Albert Hall Meeting," National Service, Women's Section, Westminster, as the supply is already nearly exhausted.

CONFERENCE WITH LABOUR.

The Director-General of National Service, feeling that his scheme has not yet been fully understood by those who are likely to be most valuable to it, has invited trade union representatives from all the societies in the United Kingdom to meet him at the Central Hall, Westminster, on Wednesday next, at half-past two, to discuss some very important proposals which are being made in respect to the remuneration which labour is to receive in connection with the voluntary scheme for national service. The chair will be taken by Mr. Stephen Walsh, M.P., Parliamentary Secretary to the National Service Department, who will be speaking in public for the first time in his new capacity. Other speakers will be Mr. Arthur Henderson and Mr. John Hodge. About 600 representatives of trade unions are expected to be present.

682/19 62.

NATIONAL SERVICE FOR WOMEN.

THE DEFINITE SCHEME for the enrolment of women in the various branches of Women's National Service will be launched at a great war meeting for women only, to be held at the Royal Albert Hall on March 17. Mr Neville Chamberlain will preside, and the speakers will be Lord Derby, Secretary of State for War; Mr Prothero, President of the Board of Agriculture; Mr John Hodge, M.P., Minister for Labour; Mrs H. J. Tennant and Miss Violet Markham. Mrs Tennant is most anxious that this should be a representative gathering, and to this end the chief women's societies are being invited to attend, and seats will be reserved for peeresses, wives of Lords Lieutenants of Counties and of Cabinet Ministers, wives of M.P.'s, as well as for women prominent in all branches of women's life and work. But as it is particularly desired that women who are in a position to undertake national service, and who are not engaged in essential occupations, should attend the meeting, the great bulk of the 9000 seats in the Albert Hall will be open and free.

Women for France.

Now that the National Service Department (Women's Section) has undertaken to recruit for the War Office an army of women to release fit men who are now doing civilian work in the army, there will be a continued response from women as further need arises for recruits.

For the present further applications in this section are not required, as the response made, as a result of the War Office statement on February 28 of the proposed conditions and terms, has been so far in excess of the probable immediate requirements, that it was found necessary to give notice on March 7 that no more applications should be made for the present. For reasons of economy, the training of the first batch of recruits is to take place in London, and it follows that those nearest London will be called first. Mrs Tennant is anxious that women who are not communicated with at once shall not think that they are left out, and disappointment will be avoided if it is realised that enrolment will follow in other areas as and when necessity arises.

No woman should leave her present employment at the time of making application, nor even when actually enrolled. She is, upon enrolment, exactly in the position of the man who is waiting to be called up, and who continues quietly in his civilian occupation until the latest possible moment.

Women on the Land.

The authorities at St. Ermin's are at present making all arrangements to assist the Board of Agriculture by arranging to regulate supply to meet demand. Milkers, shepherdesses, plough-women, haymakers, horse-keepers, cowkeepers, market gardeners, harvesters, all must be forthcoming.

Within the next few days the scheme will be issued officially; application forms will be obtainable at every Post Office; enrolment will begin, and the work be put in hand with expedition.

Mrs Tennant feels that it would be beneficial that all women in the provincial towns should know what excellent work has been done in certain villages to augment the autumn food supply. Under a scheme of the Board of Trade and the Board of Agriculture, a registrar was appointed in most village centres last year to keep a number of girls and women willing to work on the land. In the course of February, for instance, the registrar of one small village canvassed a hundred of the cottages, urging them to plant as many potatoes as they could make room for, before April, in their gardens and allotments. The whole order for the village was sent to one grower, and the costs advanced by the registrar. There is now, then, a prospective supply of at least 670 pecks of home-grown potatoes for next winter in that one village. Given a simple plan like this in all villages, and a horse and cart for distribution in each district, and the addition to next winter's food supply would be a most important asset. The need for women's work upon the land is now extremely urgent.

Women in Industry.

Women Commissioners have been appointed whose duty will be to assist with measures for increasing the supply of labour within their respective areas, and to consider questions of substituting women for men in various trades, closely co-operating with the men commissioners for inducing both employers and employees to facilitate substitution, and facilitating and maintaining good relations between the two.

One important work undertaken by the Women Commissioners will be to see that proper steps are taken for the welfare of the workers in each centre of employment, and also to see that the women workers in National Service are properly paid and housed.

Miss Mona Wilson is the Commissioner for London, and is well known all over the country as one who has devoted her career to the investigation of the problems of industrial life, especially as touching women. She is a daughter of Canon Wilson, formerly Archdeacon of Manchester, and has been associated in her public work with such widely known people as Mr Charles Booth, Mr Seebohm Rowntree, Miss Gertrude Tuckwell, Lady Dilke, and Miss Mary Macarthur.

Miss Mary Paterson is the Commissioner for Scotland, and has transferred her energies from the National Health Insurance for Scotland to the wider field of National Service. She has a very thorough knowledge of the conditions under which women work, and her knowledge of procedure and her organising ability qualify her for work of distinction in the post she has now undertaken.

Lady Mackworth, the Commissioner for Wales, is the daughter of Lord Rhondda, and wife of Sir Humphrey Mackworth, of Caerleon, Monmouth, President of the Local Government Board. She is a woman of remarkable business ability, and a Director of many influential companies, chiefly connected with coal and shipping. Recently Lord Rhondda took over the assets of a business formerly in the hands of enemy aliens, and Lady Mackworth was elected to the chairmanship.

THE DEFINITE SCHEME for the enrolment of women in the various branches of Women's National Service will be launched at a great war meeting for women only, to be held at the Royal Albert Hall on March 17. Mr Neville Chamberlain will preside, and the speakers will be Lord Derby, Secretary of State for War; Mr Prothero, President of the Board of Agriculture; Mr John Hodge, M.P., Minister for Labour; Mrs H. J. Tennant and Miss Violet Markham. Mrs Tennant is most anxious that this should be a representative gathering, and to this end the chief women's societies are being invited to attend, and seats will be reserved for peeresses, wives of Lords Lieutenants of Counties and of Cabinet Ministers, wives of M.P.'s, as well as for women prominent in all branches of women's life and work. But as it is particularly desired that women who are in a position to undertake national service, and who are not engaged in essential occupations, should attend the meeting, the great bulk of the 9000 seats in the Albert Hall will be open and free.

Women for France.

Now that the National Service Department (Women's Section) has undertaken to recruit for the War Office an army of women to release fit men who are now doing civilian work in the army, there will be a continued response from women as further need arises for recruits.

For the present further applications in this section are not required, as the response made, as a result of the War Office statement on February 28 of the proposed conditions and terms, has been so far in excess of the probable immediate requirements, that it was found necessary to give notice on March 7 that no more applications should be made for the present. For reasons of economy, the training of the first batch of recruits is to take place in London, and it follows that those nearest London will be called first. Mrs Tennant is anxious that women who are not communicated with at once shall not think that they are left out, and disappointment will be avoided if it is realised that enrolment will follow in other areas as and when necessity arises.

No woman should leave her present employment at the time of making application, nor even when actually enrolled. She is, upon enrolment, exactly in the position of the man who is waiting to be called up, and who continues quietly in his civilian occupation until the latest possible moment.

Women on the Land.

The authorities at St. Ermin's are at present making all arrangements to assist the Board of Agriculture by arranging to regulate supply to meet demand. Milkers, shepherdesses, plough-women, haymakers, horse-keepers, cowkeepers, market gardeners, harvesters, all must be forthcoming.

Within the next few days the scheme will be issued officially; application forms will be obtainable at every Post Office; enrolment will begin, and the work be put in hand with expedition.

Mrs Tennant feels that it would be beneficial that all women in the provincial towns should know what excellent work has been done in certain villages to augment the autumn food supply. Under a scheme of the Board of Trade and the Board of Agriculture, a registrar was appointed in most village centres last year to keep a number of girls and women willing to work on the land. In the course of February, for instance, the registrar of one small village canvassed a hundred of the cottages, urging them to plant as many potatoes as they could make room for, before April, in their gardens and allotments. The whole order for the village was sent to one grower, and the costs advanced by the registrar. There is now, then, a prospective supply of at least 670 pecks of home-grown potatoes for next winter in that one village. Given a simple plan like this in all villages, and a horse and cart for distribution in each district, and the addition to next winter's food supply would be a most important asset. The need for women's work upon the land is now extremely urgent.

Women in Industry.

Women Commissioners have been appointed whose duty will be to assist with measures for increasing the supply of labour within their respective areas, and to consider questions of substituting women for men in various trades, closely co-operating with the men commissioners for inducing both employers and employees to facilitate substitution, and facilitating and maintaining good relations between the two.

One important work undertaken by the Women Commissioners will be to see that proper steps are taken for the welfare of the workers in each centre of employment, and also to see that the women workers in National Service are properly paid and housed.

Miss Mona Wilson is the Commissioner for London, and is well known all over the country as one who has devoted her career to the investigation of the problems of industrial life, especially as touching women. She is a daughter of Canon Wilson, formerly Archdeacon of Manchester, and has been associated in her public work with such widely known people as Mr Charles Booth, Mr Seebohm Rowntree, Miss Gertrude Tuckwell, Lady Dilke, and Miss Mary Macarthur.

Miss Mary Paterson is the Commissioner for Scotland, and has transferred her energies from the National Health Insurance for Scotland to the wider field of National Service. She has a very thorough knowledge of the conditions under which women work, and her knowledge of procedure and her organising ability qualify her for work of distinction in the post she has now undertaken.

Lady Mackworth, the Commissioner for Wales, is the daughter of Lord Rhondda, and wife of Sir Humphrey Mackworth, of Caerleon, Monmouth, President of the Local Government Board. She is a woman of remarkable business ability, and a Director of many influential companies, chiefly connected with coal and shipping. Recently Lord Rhondda took over the assets of a business formerly in the hands of enemy aliens, and Lady Mackworth was elected to the chairmanship.

[Sport and General Press Agency Ltd.

WORKING THE TRACTOR AND THE THREE-FURROW PLOUGH.

WOMEN'S WORK FOR THE NATION.

By THEKLA BOWSER.

HUNDREDS OF THOUSANDS OF WOMEN have been hard at work for the nation ever since that sad August day in 1914, but even yet there are women of all ages and all classes, who are not doing definite national work. The reason for this is very largely that they do not know what to do or how to set about doing it.

The magnificent response made by Queen readers to our appeal a few weeks since for munition workers, shows that women of the "better" classes want only to be shown a real, straight-forward need for them to come forward readily and even gratefully.

Hoeing Strawberry Plants.

The solution of a Chinese puzzle, surely, would be child's play by the side of the task undertaken by Mrs Tennant and Miss Violet Markham, who are endeavouring to put round women into round holes and square women into square holes, all the "holes" being national ones!

We want to make the Queen newspaper a medium by which worker and work can get in touch, and we believe that we can be of some service to the country in explaining difficulties, in answering questions and in helping to marshal the willing woman worker through the apparently intricate maze of National Service.

St. Ermin's Hotel, Westminster, the headquarters of the Department of National Service, has suddenly become one of the most interesting spots in London, and it is there that the London applicant must go to offer her services.

But shall I be paid? Can I go for a week or two to see if I like it? Can I go to France at once? Will they insist on my milking cows, because, if so, I should be paralysed with fright? And so the questions roll out ad infinitum, and unless they can be answered promptly it is more than likely that the candidate will decide that she is not needed and will sink back into the routine of her life, content to knit a few pairs of socks and cajole herself into believing that she is doing all the "war" work that is necessary.

We women have given much; we have given our men and we have given our leisure but, alas, the end of the war is not yet, nor the demands that it must make upon us! Those who can possibly be spared must offer themselves as "whole-timers" to the Government and must work with a will to fill the awful gaps made in our daily needs by the absence of the men who are suffering such an infinitely harder fate on the battlefield than ever can we at home.

But at the very outset we want to keep level-headed and to plan out, methodically and sytematically, the scheme upon which we mean to work so that every ounce of benefit may be produced for our country's good. For the woman who is already working in a munition factory to dash off to offer her services at St. Ermin's is worse than useless, or for the nurse or probationer who is capably filling a post in a hospital to insist on going on the land, though she is entirely ignorant of agricultural work, is the height of wastefulness.

To the woman of any class who already has her hands full of serviceable national work, the National Service Department has nothing whatever to say, except that it says her to stay where she is and not add to the huge amount of work which already has to be got through by the staff. There is nothing finer than to come across the woman who tells you simply "Yes, I have been in this 'job' for a long time and mean to stick to it for duration."

It may not be a great or a glorious task, but she knows how to do it, and her superior knows she can be trusted to do it well. All honour to her, for she is having a willing to do agricultural work should not complicate things by coming to town, for, if possible, she will be given work in her own district. She will go to the nearest post office and fill up the form she can shortly get there and then hand it in.

The woman, however, who wishes to work for the army will find that there are five main kinds of employment. These are:—

(a) Clerical, typist, shorthand-typist.
(b) Cooks, waitresses and domestic staff.
(c) Motor transport service.
(d) Storehouse women, checkers and unskilled labour.
(e) Telephone and postal services.
(f) In addition there will be certain miscellaneous services which do not fall within the above main classifications.

The woman who is really competent in any of these directions can be of immense use to the army both at home and abroad, but she must be good at her work. Enthusiasm and patriotism are fine attributes, but they must be allied to sound knowledge before they can help to win the war. There is no place for the amateur who "means well," nor for the dilettante who is filled with a mighty exaltation to-day but finds the work dull and uninteresting to-morrow.

The Government holds out no tempting bait in the form of big salaries for it rightly knows that the only bait worthy of acceptance by the real patriot is that of putting in an effective wedge against the foe. Does it matter how thin or frail is your end of the wedge so that it grows and grows in bulk and in importance until it has swelled to the proportions of a mighty department?

The rates of pay are fair and they have been worked out on a truly fascinating basis. Thousands of cultured men have thrown up well-paid positions of trust to [illegible] the greatest war the world has ever known, with the thing accomplished.

With infinite trouble it has been worked out by Mrs Tennant that the wages given to all women undertaking National Service will leave them with at least the same amount (7s. a week) in their pockets as Tommy has for himself. The only difference is that he spends his days and nights in the wretchedness of the trenches, that he risks life and limb and that he suffers more than any of us—even we who have been fairly near the firing line—can guess, because he simply never tells us all he has gone through "up there."

Here are the rates of pay as arranged at present, though there may be slight alterations.

(a) Ordinary clerical work and typists, 23s. to 27s. per week, according to efficiency.

Clerks employed on higher clerical and supervisory duties, 28s. to 38s. per week, according to efficiency.

Shorthand typists, 28s. to 38s. per week, according to efficiency.

The above rates of pay cover 43 working hours per week, after which overtime will be paid at the rate of 7d. per hour for ordinary clerks, and 9d. per hour for clerks employed on higher work and shorthand-typists.

(b) Head cooks and waitresses, £40 per annum with free board and lodging, together with 6d. per week for personal washing. Cooks, waitresses and housemaids, £26 per annum with free board and lodging, together with 6d. per week for personal washing.

(c) Superintendents, 1st class, 52s. 6d. per week. Superintendents, 2nd class, 46s. per week. Head drivers, 40s. per week. Qualified driver mechanics, 35s. per week. Washers, 20s. per week.

The above weekly rates include Sunday work when necessary, but if employed on Sunday a day's rest in lieu will be given.

In addition, overtime will be allowed, except to superintendents, at the rate of 5d. per hour after 8½ working hours a day.

(d) Storehouse women and unskilled labour, 20s. per week. Extra pay up to 2s. per week where special aptitude is required. Leading hands, 2[illegible]s. per week. Checkers, 23s. to 24s. per week. Assistant forewomen, 24s. per week. Forewomen, 24s. to 30s. per week, according to number of staffs supervised.

The above rates cover 48 working hours per week; overtime, at time and a quarter for first two hours per day; thereafter and on Sundays, time and a half.

(e) Telephone and postal services. Rates of pay are under consideration by the Postmaster General and will be announced later. Miscellaneous services. Special rates of pay according to nature of employment, with a minimum of 20s. a week.

"Work on Sundays!" exclaims someone as she reads down the conditions.

"Certainly—why not? Our men seem to have their biggest 'scraps' on Sundays, but no one ever heard of Tommy being paid 'overtime' when he has been on duty day in and day out with no chance of a sleep and perhaps short rations because the ration waggon had been 'unlucky' in catching a shell!"

The conditions offered to women workers are fair and the real patriot will find nothing to grumble at in them.

No woman under twenty years of age will be eligible for employment and all candidates must pass a medical examination by a (lady) doctor

Foreign Service

A large number of applicants want to be assured that they will be sent to France to work, but no such assurance is given by those in authority at St. Ermin's. It will be a mobile army of workers, but mobile only by order and individuals will have no power to move themselves from national work. The reason for this is very largely that they do not know what to do or how to set about doing it.

Photo. Sport and General Press Agency Ltd.

Cutting and Trimming Cabbages.

The magnificent response made by Queen readers to our appeal a few weeks since for munition workers, shows that women of the "better" classes want only to be shown a real, straight-forward need for them to come forward readily and even gratefully.

HOEING STRAWBERRY PLANTS.

The solution of a Chinese puzzle, surely, would be child's play by the side of the task undertaken by Mrs Tennant and Miss Violet Markham, who are endeavouring to put round women into round holes and square women into square holes, all the "holes" being national ones!

We want to make the Queen newspaper a medium by which worker and work can get in touch, and we believe that we can be of some service to the country in explaining difficulties, in answering questions and in helping to marshal the willing woman worker through the apparently intricate maze of National Service.

St. Ermin's Hotel, Westminster, the headquarters of the Department of National Service, has suddenly become one of the most interesting spots in London, and it is there that the London applicant must go to offer her services.

But shall I be paid? Can I go for a week or two to see if I like it? Can I go to France at once? Will they insist on my milking cows, because, if so, I should be paralysed with fright? And so the questions roll out ad infinitum, and unless they can be answered promptly it is more than likely that the candidate will decide that she is not needed and will sink back into the routine of her life, content to knit a few pairs of socks and cajole herself into believing that she is doing all the "war" work that is necessary.

We women have given much; we have given our men and we have given our leisure but, alas, the end of the war is not yet, nor the demands that it must make upon us! Those who can possibly be spared must offer themselves as "whole-timers" to the Government and must work with a will to fill the awful gaps made in our daily needs by the absence of the men who are suffering such an infinitely harder fate on the battlefield than ever can we at home.

But at the very outset we want to keep level-headed and to plan out, methodically and sytematically, the scheme upon which we mean to work so that every ounce of benefit may be produced for our country's good. For the woman who is already working in a munition factory to dash off to offer her services at St. Ermin's is worse than useless, or for the nurse or probationer who is capably filling a post in a hospital to insist on going on the land, though she is entirely ignorant of agricultural work, is the height of wastefulness.

To the woman of any class who already has her hands full of serviceable national work, the National Service Department has nothing whatever to say, except that it begs her to stay where she is and not add to the huge amount of work which already has to be got through by the staff. There is nothing finer than to come across the woman who tells you simply "Yes, I have been in this 'job' for a long time and mean to stick to it for duration."

It may not be a great or a glorious task, but she knows how to do it, and her superior knows she can be trusted to do it well. All honour to her, for she is laying a solid brick in the great edifice which will bring a wonderful and a lasting victory to our land.

Now we will suppose that a woman who is free to offer herself to do National work goes to St. Ermin's in order to find out the obligations and the regulations. She will do that if she lives in London, but the woman who is

(d) Storeho[illegible] women, [illegible]

(e) Telephone and postal services.

(f) In addition there will be certain miscellaneous services which do not fall within the above main classifications.

The woman who is really competent in any of these directions can be of immense use to the army both at home and abroad, but she must be good at her work. Enthusiasm and patriotism are fine attributes, but they must be allied to sound knowledge before they can help to win the war. There is no place for the amateur who "means well," nor for the dilettante who is filled with a mighty exaltation to-day but finds the work dull and uninteresting to-morrow.

The Government holds out no tempting bait in the form of big salaries for it rightly knows that the only bait worthy of acceptance by the real patriot is that of putting in an effective wedge against the foe. Does it matter how thin or frail is your end of the wedge so that it grows and grows in bulk and in importance until it has swelled to the proportions of a mighty department?

The rates of pay are fair and they have been worked out on a truly fascinating basis. Thousands of cultured men have thrown up well-paid positions of trust to accept the soldier's shilling-a-day, and now we women are being put on the same high level. Everything has been turned topsy-turvy by the war and here is a new kind of trades-unionism! Many a working woman has clamoured in the old days to be treated "like the men" in the matter of wages, and here we are in the midst of

Here are the rates of pay [illegible] there may be slight alterations.

(a) Ordinary clerical work and typists, 23s. to 27s. per week, according to efficiency.

Clerks employed on higher clerical and supervisory duties, 28s. to 38s. per week, according to efficiency.

Shorthand typists, 28s. to 38s. per week, according to efficiency.

The above rates of pay cover 43 working hours per week, after which overtime will be paid at the rate of 7d. per hour for ordinary clerks, and 9d. per hour for clerks employed on higher work and shorthand-typists.

(b) Head cooks and waitresses, £40 per annum with free board and lodging, together with 6d. per week for personal washing. Cooks, waitresses and housemaids, £26 per annum with free board and lodging, together with 6d. per week for personal washing.

(c) Superintendents, 1st class, 52s. 6d. per week. Superintendents, 2nd class, 46s. per week. Head drivers, 40s. per week. Qualified driver mechanics, 35s. per week. Washers, 20s. per week.

The above weekly rates include Sunday work when necessary, but if employed on Sunday a day's rest in lieu will be given.

In addition, overtime will be allowed, except to superintendents, at the rate of 5d. per hour after 8½ working hours a day.

(d) Storehouse women and unskilled labour, 20s. per week. Extra pay up to 2s. per week where special aptitude is required. Leading hands, 22s. per week. Checkers, 23s. to 24s. per week. Assistant forewomen, 24s. per week. Forewomen, 24s. to 30s. per week, according to number of staffs supervised.

The above rates cover 48 working hours per week; overtime, at time and a quarter for first two hours per day; thereafter and on Sundays, time and a half.

(e) Telephone and postal services. Rates of pay are under consideration by the Postmaster General and will be announced later. Miscellaneous services. Special rates of pay according to nature of employment, with a minimum of 20s. a week.

"Work on Sundays!" exclaims someone as she reads down the conditions.

"Certainly—why not? Our men seem to have their biggest 'scraps' on Sundays, but no one ever heard of Tommy being paid 'overtime' when he has been on duty day in and day out with no chance of a sleep and perhaps short rations because the ration waggon had been 'unlucky' in catching a shell!"

The conditions offered to women workers are fair and the real patriot will find nothing to grumble at in them.

No woman under twenty years of age will be eligible for employment and all candidates must pass a medical examination by a (lady) doctor

Foreign Service

A large number of applicants want to be assured that they will be sent to France to work, but no such assurance is given by those in authority at St. Ermin's. It will be a mobile army of workers, but mobile only by order, and individuals will have no power to move themselves from one district to another. This must be so if the greatest amount of good work is to be extracted from the workers. Only very competent and capable workers will be sent to France, and they will be selected after they have passed various tests. All condidates must enrol for a year's purpose to minimise the demands [illegible] and daughters uncontaminated by commerce.

at the homestead makes upon the physical and mental

To-day we are past and beyond all these ideas, y

[Photos. Sport and General Press Agency Ltd.

CUTTING AND TRIMMING CABBAGES.

service and at the very beginning they will undergo a certain amount of training in which will be included elementary instruction in hygiene and discipline. A short form of agreement will be entered into and an allowance of £4 will be made for uniform at the beginning of the service, with a further grant of £1 at the end of the first six months. If sent to France workers will travel free of cost.

Board and lodging is provided in every case, a deduction of (not exceeding) 14s. per week being made to cover the cost and personal washing. In some cases the deduction will be less.

In France hostels have been arranged and all workers will live in them under the charge of lady superintendents.

There will be no voluntary work, but women who are already engaged in work of national importance will be ineligible and should not apply. Those who are selected and enrolled should not give up their work until they are called up. They will be in precisely the same position as the "reservist" soldier who goes on with his job, knowing that he may have to answer his country's call at any moment.

During the year of service two weeks' leave will be given, and if a second period of work is signed for (a second year) a bonus of £5 will be paid, irrespective of grade.

Agriculture.

It is urgently necessary that an army of women should be trained in agricultural work at once, and the Director of National Service (Women's Section) is now hard at work on the details of the scheme which will be shortly published. Women who love country life and have spent their happy leisure hours in gardening and in sport may well throw themselves into this fine side of labour which will bring us our daily bread.

It is interesting to go amongst the women of high education and culture who have already become very useful on the land, for one hears nothing but enthusiastic praise of the life. The compulsory early rising is compensated for by the new wonders which are opened out by the glorious dawns of winter and spring days, and the strenuous life brings its own joys all through the working hours, by reason of the new sense of freedom and exhilaration which come as soul-reviving revelations to many a woman who has spent much of her life within four walls.

It is hoped that a steady stream of applicants for work will pour into St. Ermin's for many months to come so that each applicant may be dealt with to the very best advantage. There must be no more waste in putting the skilled labour into unskilled work than there must be wastage in food. Economy, in its truest and widest sense, is the note which must be struck by all who love their native land, but most of all by the women; for they, after all, hold in their hands the greatest opportunities of effecting savings, which, growing and growing, shall become one of the most honourable monuments raised by them in this terrible time of stress and strain.

WOMEN ON THE LAND.

A GREAT DEAL has been learned during the past two years concerning the capacity or fitness of women for work on the land. When the movement for substituting women for men in farm and garden work was started, knowledge of their aptitude and powers of endurance was limited, and it has to be admitted that many answered the call for volunteers who were but indifferently fitted for work of a kind new to them, and which has to be performed under conditions to which they had not been accustomed. In the circumstances it was not surprising that a substantial proportion proved after a short but enlightening experience, disappointment had to follow from the [illegible] of the great [illegible] which was [illegible] the well as the efficiently equipped department over which Miss Talbot presides at the Board of Agriculture, conduct operations on so sound a basis and with so thorough an understanding of the duties to be undertaken that the sifting process may be said to be completed at the source, and before money, time, and patience are wasted in distributing unsuitable applicants throughout the counties. The first rush of volunteer workers included a liberal proportion who, though willing, lacked the strength or the ability to reconcile themselves to their new environment, and their presence did the cause no good. But although failures have been common, successes have been sufficiently numerous not only to justify past exertions, but to inspire hopes of still greater results in the future. We are at the beginning of one of the most important seasons in agricultural routine, and never in the history of the country have the spring months been fraught with greater possibilities than is the case this year. Within the next five or six weeks—the earlier the better—there has to be committed to the ground the seed from which will spring the harvests of this supremely critical year. There is no time to weigh and ponder the relative efficiency of male and female labour in this or that class of work; time presses so urgently that every available hand must be summoned to the task if the country is to even maintain its normal modest standard of self-sufficiency in cereals and other essential stuffs. Wisely or unwisely skilled men of military age have gone from the land in their hundreds of thousands, and they have to be replaced from one source or another. The temporary release of soldiers and prisoners of war, and the provision of interned civilians and conscientious objectors are promised, but help from these quarters cannot go very far in making good the deficiency, and in the main it devolves upon the women of the country to fill the places of the absent labourers.

Fetching Straw Bedding from the Stack.

Women have responded so splendidly to all other calls that there can be no doubt as to the result of the capacity of those who undertake it. But while it may be strenuous it is not monotonous. Indeed with the exception of such operations as the milking of cows and dairy work generally, it varies from week to week, perhaps even from day to day, with the weather and the season, and thus few tasks last long enough or are so sustained as to become tedious or objectionable. If they really set themselves to it there is hardly any kind of work on the farm which women could not undertake in the case of necessity. Ploughing, drilling, carting of manure, and the like are not really women's work, and they would not be asked from choice to undertake any of these operations, but in very many cases this season these vital tasks will remain undone unless women come to the rescue and, having regard to the importance of home production of food, it is in the interests of the nation that they should at least make an effort, and be encouraged by the farmers to do so, to take the places of the skilled men who are with the colours.

While necessity may require women to turn their hands to all kinds of work connected with the production of food, there are certain capacities in which their services will be especially useful. The sprinkling of eligible men who remain on the land, supplemented by others under or over military age, may suffice for the heavier and more intricate operations, and if this be the case, as it is understood to be in most districts, the women workers will be so graded according to physical and mental capacity as to make good the deficiency in the less arduous and technical work. Those who have had exceptional opportunities for judging of women's fitness for farm work divide them into two main classes and advise that as far as may be practicable this order should be observed in the interests of the employed and the employers. The two categories are field workers and workers at the homestead—the one relating to the growing of crops and the other to the management of live stock. The educated classes with limited experience of country life and work, find their proper sphere in managing and feeding cattle, pigs, and other animals, while the local women, more inured to the strain and exposure of rural work, can render the best service in field operations. This broad classification is in accordance with an intelligent interpretation of the conditions that govern such matters, and while at such busy periods as seed time and the hay and corn harvests, it may be departed from with advantage, general success in utilising emergency labour will be largely dependent upon the judgment with which work is allotted and individual talents utilised.

Photo: Sport and General Press Agency, Ltd.

Haymaking.

THE BRITISH BUSINESS WOMAN.

Her Part in a National Service Scheme.

By MRS MARGARET HEITLAND.

I AM NOT EXACTLY A BUSINESS WOMAN myself, but I belong to the first generation of women of the Victorian era that was not altogether scared and intimidated by the machinery of finance. To the generation of women before us no book was so mysterious as a cheque book, and such words as "rent charge," "debentures," and "ordinary shares" were alarming without having any real meaning. Our own generation was less dismayed by the language of business, yet not many of us proceeded far into the commercial world. I shall not attempt to give any long explanation of this disappointing fact, for there are, indeed, several explanations. One of these was the sort of vague discredit which used to attach to the practice of money-making when conducted by a woman. If it was humiliating for a gentlewoman to be "decayed" or "in straitened circumstances," it was scarcely more admirable for her to make a big turnover and profit in some shrewd commercial undertaking. Many men were not over-proud of their money-making exploits, and found their best excuse for such achievements in short form of agreement will be entered into and an allowance of £4 will be made for uniform at the beginning of the service, with a further grant of £1 at the end of the first six months. If sent to France workers will travel free of cost.

Board and lodging is provided in every case, a deduction of (not exceeding) 14s. per week being made to cover the cost and personal washing. In some cases the deduction will be less.

In France hostels have been arranged and all workers will live in them under the charge of lady superintendents.

There will be no voluntary work, but women who are already engaged in work of national importance will be ineligible and should not apply. Those who are selected and enrolled should not give up their work until they are called up. They will be in precisely the same position as the "reservist" soldier who goes on with his job, knowing that he may have to answer his country's call at any moment.

During the year of service two weeks' leave will be given, and if a second period of work is signed for (a second year) a bonus of £5 will be paid, irrespective of grade.

Agriculture.

It is urgently necessary that an army of women should be trained in agricultural work at once, and the Director of National Service (Women's Section) is now hard at work on the details of the scheme which will be shortly published. Women who love country life and have spent their happy leisure hours in gardening and in sport may well throw themselves into this fine side of labour which will bring us our daily bread.

It is interesting to go amongst the women of high education and culture who have already become very useful on the land, for one hears nothing but enthusiastic praise of the life. The compulsory early rising is compensated for by the new wonders which are opened out by the glorious dawns of winter and spring days, and the strenuous life brings its own joys all through the working hours, by reason of the new sense of freedom and exhilaration which come as soul-reviving revelations to many a woman who has spent much of her life within four walls.

It is hoped that a steady stream of applicants for work will pour into St. Ermin's for many months to come so that each applicant may be dealt with to the very best advantage. There must be no more waste in putting the skilled labour into unskilled work than there must be wastage in food. Economy, in its truest and widest sense, is the note which must be struck by all who love their native land, but most of all by the women; for they, after all, hold in their hands the greatest opportunities of effecting savings, which, growing and growing, shall become one of the most honourable monuments raised by them in this terrible time of stress and strain.

WOMEN ON THE LAND.

A GREAT DEAL has been learned during the past two years concerning the capacity or fitness of women for work on the land. When the movement for substituting women for men in farm and garden work was started, knowledge of their aptitude and powers of endurance was limited, and it has to be admitted that many answered the call for volunteers who were but indifferently fitted for work of a kind new to them, and which has to be performed under conditions to which they had not been accustomed. In the circumstances it was not surprising that a substantial proportion retired after a short but enlightening experience. Disillusionment had to follow from the sifting process may be said to be completed at the source, and before money, time, and patience are wasted in distributing unsuitable applicants throughout the counties. The first rush of volunteer workers included a liberal proportion who, though willing, lacked the strength or the ability to reconcile themselves to their new environment, and their presence did the cause no good. But although failures have been common, successes have been sufficiently numerous not only to justify past exertions, but to inspire hopes of still greater results in the future. We are at the beginning of one of the most important seasons in agricultural routine, and never in the history of the country have the spring months been fraught with greater possibilities than is the case this year. Within the next five or six weeks—the earlier the better—there has to be committed to the ground the seed from which will spring the harvests of this supremely critical year. There is no time to weigh and ponder the relative efficiency of male and female labour in this or that class of work; time presses so urgently that every available hand must be summoned to the task if the country is to even maintain its normal modest standard of self-sufficiency in cereals and other essential stuffs. Wisely or unwisely skilled men of military age have gone from the land in their hundreds of thousands, and they have to be replaced from one source or another. The temporary release of soldiers and prisoners of war, and the provision of interned civilians and conscientious objectors are promised, but help from these quarters cannot go very far in making good the deficiency, and in the main it devolves upon the women of the country to fill the places of the absent labourers.

Women have responded so splendidly to all other calls that there can be no doubt as to the result of the renewed appeal for their assistance in maintaining the production of foodstuffs. It would serve no good purpose to minimise the demands work on the land or at the homestead makes upon the physical and mental perhaps even from day to day, with the weather and the season, and thus few tasks last long enough or are so sustained as to become tedious or objectionable. If they really set themselves to it there is hardly any kind of work on the farm which women could not undertake in the case of necessity. Ploughing, drilling, carting of manure, and the like are not really women's work, and they would not be asked from choice to undertake any of these operations, but in very many cases this season these vital tasks will remain undone unless women come to the rescue and, having regard to the importance of home production of food, it is in the interests of the nation that they should at least make an effort, and be encouraged by the farmers to do so, to take the places of the skilled men who are with the colours.

FETCHING STRAW BEDDING FROM THE STACK.

While necessity may require women to turn their hands to all kinds of work connected with the production of food, there are certain capacities in which their services will be especially useful. The sprinkling of eligible men who remain on the land, supplemented by others under or over military age, may suffice for the heavier and more intricate operations, and if this be the case, as it is understood to be in most districts, the women workers will be so graded according to physical and mental capacity as to make good the deficiency in the less arduous and technical work. Those who have had exceptional opportunities for judging of women's fitness for farm work divide them into two main classes and advise that as far as may be practicable this order should be observed in the interests of the employed and the employers. The two categories are field workers and workers at the homestead—the one relating to the growing of crops and the other to the management of live stock. The educated classes with limited experience of country life and work, find their proper sphere in managing and feeding cattle, pigs, and other animals, while the local women, more inured to the strain and exposure of rural work, can render the best service in field operations. This broad classification is in accordance with an intelligent interpretation of the conditions that govern such matters, and while at such busy periods as seed time and the hay and corn harvests, it may be departed from with advantage, general success in utilising emergency labour will be largely dependent upon the judgment with which work is allotted and individual talents utilised.

[Photos. Sport and General Press Agency Ltd.

HAYMAKING.

THE BRITISH BUSINESS WOMAN.

Her Part in a National Service Scheme.

BY MRS MARGARET HEITLAND.

I AM NOT EXACTLY A BUSINESS WOMAN myself, but I belong to the first generation of women of the Victorian era that was not altogether scared and intimidated by the machinery of finance. To the generation of women before us no book was so mysterious as a cheque book, and such words as "rent charge," "debentures," and "ordinary shares" were alarming without having any real meaning. Our own generation was less dismayed by the language of business, yet not many of us proceeded far into the commercial world. I shall not attempt to give any long explanation of this disappointing fact, for there are, indeed, several explanations. One of these was the sort of vague discredit which used to attach to the practice of money-making when conducted by a woman. If it was humiliating for a gentlewoman to be "decayed" or "in straitened circumstances," it was scarcely more admirable for her to make a big turnover and profit in some sheer commercial undertaking. Many men were not over-proud of their money-making exploits, and found their best excuse for such achievements in the fact that they were thus enabled to put their boys into liberal professions or political life and to keep wife and daughters uncontaminated by commerce.

To-day we are past and beyond all these ideas, yet the influence of what has been remains with us. The commercial training available for women is still very poor. Exception should be made for some of the younger universities (notably, perhaps, Birmingham), which are offering students of both sexes the wide courses of study that modern commerce demands; but those young people, and especially girls, who have no means of attending such universities are offered little or nothing more than a few classes or private lessons in book-keeping, typing, and shorthand. Book-keeping is an indispensable elementary subject in commercial education, but shorthand and typewriting lead no further into the world of commerce than the clerk's desk.

On a Fruit Farm.

Studying Present Conditions.

If I were to define our chief educational need I should say that what as a nation we want is a thorough study of the present. We study the past perpetually. We discuss again and again such trains of events as the history of Germany during the life of Frederick the Great, the crises of the French Revolution, the battles of the Napoleonic wars. The world of the present we only study when we are forced to do so, and generally too late. The governmental system of Germany, the physical geography of Gallipoli, the racial influences at work in certain states of South America—these and a hundred other matters of the deepest importance to our own people have hitherto been known only to a few travellers, and have been excluded from commercial education as superfluities of information. Small wonder that commerce has not greatly attracted the more highly educated women, accustomed as they are to being told that the prime qualities for business success are shrewdness, quickness, tact, and a hand-to-mouth, muddling-through sort of cleverness.

From this subject of commercial education, vital though it is, let us turn to a consideration of women's present position in affairs. For many years some women have done exceedingly well in certain kinds of small private businesses. They have distinguished themselves as caterers for a few customers of rather exacting taste. In planning the one gown for the one customer, many women are indefatigable artists. The same statement is true in a limited sphere of house decoration. They are not equally talented (our British women) in running the little restaurant where each person's appetite should be sympathetically studied. British women do not think deeply and earnestly, as many men do, whether it shall be a chop to-day for luncheon or a cut from the joint, and whether a tankard of stout or a half-bottle from our "gallant Allies" is the ideal accompaniment. I am bound to admit that the male trader sells a gown to a woman with better feigned interest than a woman offers a man her advice regarding the menu. In commercial imaginativeness we have still something to learn.

If women's commercial enterprise has hitherto stopped short of running wholesale or big retail businesses, it has certainly shown possibilities in other directions. Some women who have had the chance to distinguish themselves have proved themselves to be successful buyers for large drapery houses and competent commercial travellers in various "lines." I believe, further, that some of them would make good saleswomen of agricultural and garden produce. I see no convincing reason why a man and not a woman should be employed by vegetable and fruit growers to drive into the market town and do a round of the greengrocers' shops. For this nothing more is wanted than attention to the tradesmen's orders and honesty.

Publicity Work.

An important branch of commerce is what is now called "publicity." Here many women with good wits, a training in a newspaper office, and a close study of the tastes of the general public, could certainly do fully as well as the men who now devote their attention to the devising of telling exhortations in six-foot type from our walls, by the aid of mother wit and common eye, and so forth. It is not due to them, I imagine, but to the more practised sex that deep red bills with black lettering (which are both painful to look at and imperfectly legible) are still to be seen.

If we ask ourselves where the directors of the National Service scheme can most readily find women with real business ability, we shall not hesitate long in our reply. The most useful business women for the nation's purpose are those who, well educated to begin with, have had some considerable experience in the organisation of effort. There are certain great movements of thought which for their realisation have demanded tremendous systematised organisation during the past twelve years. The arranging of meetings, advertising them, speaking at them, forming societies and conducting newspaper correspondence, have given to women a most valuable practical training in the essential principles of propaganda work. And, in saying this, I include also those women who have obtained similar knowledge as systematic opponents of the movement in question. The workers, too, for other causes and other societies (such as the Y.W.C.A., temperance bodies, war savings committees, &c.), have likewise been often unconsciously students in the school of business.

Already a good many women are obtaining commercial knowledge by serving as directors of limited companies, for housing schemes, steam laundries, and clubs, although we have not as yet many Lady Mackworths. Women factory inspectors, women house agents, women rent-collectors, market gardeners, and many others, including especially the women who are doing important "welfare" work in the big arsenals and factories, are all acquiring commercial experience which must be of great value at the present time. Lord Buckmaster's Bill for enabling women to become solicitors, which so successfully passed its second reading in the House of Lords, has to my mind a special significance. Few persons obtain a more all-round knowledge of commercial matters than solicitors, and I believe that able women, as soon as they find themselves in this profession, will get an understanding of all that domain of affairs which touches the law on one side and business on the other, an understanding that has been almost impossible for them hitherto.

Women are not on the whole inclined to be either money-grubbers or profiteers. They are much more concerned that their work should be interesting to them than that it should be lucrative. For this reason they do particularly well as organisers or administrators of some kind of public work in which there is scope for practical abilities and a good spice of living human interest. I therefore hope that as the National Service scheme develops it will give opportunities to women to take a more serious part in the progress of our country's business.

THE AUTOMOBILE WORLD.

INASMUCH as this issue of the Queen is specially devoted to the subject of women's national service, it is only fitting that reference should be made on this page to the ways in which women are helping and may render still more help in connection with automobile driving of every kind. I may take the opportunity of summarising here the various spheres of useful activity in which women motorists have patriotically played their part in these days of stress and need. The number of women who are now driving motor ambulances on the streets of London is very great, and so familiar has the sight become that surprise is only felt when the driver at the helm is seen to be a man. The British Red Cross Society and the St. John Ambulance Association have, of course, depended largely upon women's help from the early days of the war both at home and at the front, and particularly valuable aid has been rendered by the Scottish branch. But there are also two other forms of ambulance driving which are highly necessary to the community, and which are carried on ceaselessly by day and night. The Metropolitan Asylums Board, in the first place, is responsible for the transport of all infectious cases in their own extensive area. It has a considerable fleet of motor ambulances, recognisable by their green and grey bodies. For many months past these have been driven entirely by women, and they have not only to be in constant readiness to answer emergency calls from every quarter of the huge metropolis, so far as concerns the civilian inhabitants, but have also to transport urgent cases from the military camps. In the second place there is the ambulance service of the London County Council, and this is concerned with street accident cases, which have been, as everyone knows, abnormally numerous during the last two years. It is not too much to say that without the help of women neither of these important services could have been maintained at full strength.

As regards ordinary cars, it may be said that women drivers are now attached to almost every branch of official service. Many are employed by the Ministry of Munitions and the War Office, and the Royal Flying Corps have also utilised women's help. Since the Royal Automobile Club threw open its Owner Drivers' Corps to women a number have been allotted to the special class of work which the club has performed for the War Office and other Government departments ever since the war broke out. Then, of course, thousands of private cars are now driven by lady owners or paid chauffeuses, and this means in nearly every case the release of a man for military service. Nor must the van-woman be forgotten. The work of driving a motor van through the dense traffic of London is no sinecure, but the number of women performing this exacting work appears to increase almost every day. Tradesmen's delivery carriers, too, are now quite commonly in the hands of girls.

(Photos. Sport and General Press Agency Ltd.

Fruit Under Glass.

Lady Alice Sackville having a Lesson in Pruning.

On a Fruit Farm.

elementary subject in commercial education, but shorthand and typewriting lead no further into the world of commerce than the clerk's desk.

Studying Present Conditions.

If I were to define our chief educational need I should say that what as a nation we want is a thorough study of the present. We study the past perpetually. We discuss again and again such trains of events as the history of Germany during the life of Frederick the Great, the crises of the French Revolution, the battles of the Napoleonic wars. The world of the present we only study when we are forced to do so, and generally too late. The governmental system of Germany, the physical geography of Gallipoli, the racial influences at work in certain states of South America—these and a hundred other matters of the deepest importance to our own people have hitherto been known only to a few travellers, and have been excluded from commercial education as superfluities of information. Small wonder that commerce has not greatly attracted the more highly educated women, accustomed as they are to being told that the prime qualities for business success are shrewdness, quickness, tact, and a hand-to-mouth, muddling-through sort of cleverness.

From this subject of commercial education, vital though it is, let us turn to a consideration of women's present position in affairs. For many years some women have done exceedingly well in certain kinds of small private businesses. They have distinguished themselves as caterers for a few customers of rather exacting taste. In planning the one gown for the one customer, many women are indefatigable artists. The same statement is true in a limited sphere of house decoration. They are not equally talented (our British women) in running the little restaurant where each person's appetite should be sympathetically studied. British women do not think deeply and earnestly, as many men do, whether it shall be a chop to-day for luncheon or a cut from the joint, and whether a tankard of stout or a half-bottle from our "gallant Allies" is the ideal accompaniment. I am bound to admit that the male trader sells a gown to a woman with better feigned interest than a woman offers a man her advice regarding the menu. In commercial imaginativeness we have still something to learn.

If women's commercial enterprise has hitherto stopped short of running wholesale or big retail businesses, it has certainly shown possibilities in other directions. Some women who have had the chance to distinguish themselves have proved themselves to be successful buyers for large drapery houses and competent commercial travellers in various "lines." I believe, further, that some of them would make good saleswomen of agricultural and garden produce. I see no convincing reason why a man and not a woman should be employed by vegetable and fruit growers to drive into the market town and do a round of the greengrocers' shops. For this nothing more is wanted than attention to the tradesmen's orders and honesty.

Publicity Work.

An important branch of commerce is what is now called "publicity." Here many women with good wits, a training in a newspaper office, and a close study of the tastes of the general public, could certainly do fully as well as the men who now devote their attention to the devising of telling exhortations in six-foot type from our walls. In the sort of mother-wit and commonsense that are needed for these straight appeals to passers-by many women are well endowed. But what they lack is the technical knowledge of colour-printing, of the right size and shape of bills to produce certain effects on the such universities are offered little or nothing more than a few classes or private lessons in book-keeping, typing, and shorthand. Book-keeping is an indispensable

The most useful business women for the nation's purpose are those who, well educated to begin with, have had some considerable experience in the organisation of effort. There are certain great movements of thought which for their realisation have demanded tremendous systematised organisation during the past twelve years. The arranging of meetings, advertising them, speaking at them, forming societies and conducting newspaper correspondence, have given to women a most valuable practical training in the essential principles of propaganda work. And, in saying this, I include also those women who have obtained similar knowledge as systematic opponents of the movement in question. The workers, too, for other causes and other societies (such as the Y.W.C.A., temperance bodies, war savings committees, &c.), have likewise been often unconsciously students in the school of business.

Already a good many women are obtaining commercial knowledge by serving as directors of limited companies, for housing schemes, steam laundries, and clubs, although we have not as yet many Lady Mackworths. Women factory inspectors, women house agents, women rent-collectors, market gardeners, and many others, including especially the women who are doing important "welfare" work in the big arsenals and factories, are all acquiring commercial experience which must be of great value at the present time. Lord Buckmaster's Bill for enabling women to become solicitors, which so successfully passed its second reading in the House of Lords, has to my mind a special significance. Few persons obtain a more all-round knowledge of commercial matters than solicitors, and I believe that able women, as soon as they find themselves in this profession, will get an understanding of all that domain of affairs which touches the law on one side and business on the other, an understanding that has been almost impossible for them hitherto.

Women are not on the whole inclined to be either money-grubbers or profiteers. They are much more concerned that their work should be interesting to them than that it should be lucrative. For this reason they do particularly well as organisers or administrators of some kind of public work in which there is scope for practical abilities and a good spice of living human interest. I therefore hope that as the National Service scheme develops it will give opportunities to women to take a more serious part in the progress of our country's business.

C.A.V. ACCUMULATORS are the result of 24 years' solid experience, and are guaranteed to be the soundest procurable. An accumulator for every purpose and every climate.—Particulars from C. A. Vandervell and Co. Ltd., Electrical Engineers, Acton, London, W. Tel. Chiswick 1234 (8 lines.—[Advt.]

render still more help in connection with automobile driving of every kind. I may take the opportunity of summarising here the various spheres of useful activity in which women motorists have patriotically played their part in these days of stress and need. The number of women who are now driving motor ambulances on the streets of London is very great, and so familiar has the sight become that surprise is only felt when the driver at the helm is seen to be a man. The British Red Cross Society and the St. John Ambulance Association have, of course, depended largely upon women's help from the early days of the war both at home and at the front, and particularly valuable aid has been rendered by the Scottish branch. But there are also two other forms of ambulance driving which are highly necessary to the community, and which are carried on ceaselessly by day and night. The Metropolitan Asylums Board, in the first place, is responsible for the transport of all infectious cases in their own extensive area. It has a considerable fleet of motor ambulances, recognisable by their green and grey bodies. For many months past these have been driven entirely by women, and they have not only to be in constant readiness to answer emergency calls from every quarter of the huge metropolis, so far as concerns the civilian inhabitants, but have also to transport urgent cases from the military camps. In the second place there is the ambulance service of the London County Council, and this is concerned with street accident cases, which have been, as everyone knows, abnormally numerous during the last two years. It is not too much to say that without the help of women neither of these important services could have been maintained at full strength.

As regards ordinary cars, it may be said that women drivers are now attached to almost every branch of official service. Many are employed by the Ministry of Munitions and the War Office, and the Royal Flying Corps have also utilised women's help. Since the Royal Automobile Club threw open its Owner Drivers' Corps to women a number have been allotted to the special class of work which the club has performed for the War Office and other Government departments ever since the war broke out. Then, of course, thousands of private cars are now driven by lady owners or paid chauffeuses, and this means in nearly every case the release of a man for military service. Nor must the van-woman be forgotten. The work of driving a motor van through the dense traffic of London is no sinecure, but the number of women performing this exacting work appears to increase almost every day. Tradesmen's delivery carriers, too, are now quite commonly in the hands of girls.

[Photos, Sport and General Press Agency Ltd.

Fruit Under Glass.

Lady Alice Sackville having a Lesson in Pruning.

various tests. All condidates must enrol for a year's

Daily Mail 17. 3. 17

THE QUEEN AND WOMEN'S SERVICE.

THIS AFTERNOON'S MEETING.

The Queen will be present at the Women's National Service meeting at the Royal Albert Hall this afternoon, arriving at the hall at three o'clock. Her Majesty will be received by Lady Ampthill, chairman of the organising committee; Miss Clapham, principal officer, women's section; and Mr. J. Jeffrey, assistant-director, women's section. Ticket holders are asked to be in their places by a quarter to three.

Mr. Neville Chamberlain is to preside, and the speakers will be Mrs. Tennant, Director of Women's Section National Service, Mr. Prothero, the Earl of Derby, Miss Markham, deputy-director, and Mr. John Hodge, M.P.

Among those on the platform will be Lady Curzon, Lady Derby, Mrs. Asquith, Miss Balfour, Lady Crewe, Mrs. Austen Chamberlain, Mrs. Prothero, Mrs. Pember Reeves, Lady Rhondda, Lady Reading, Mrs. Hodge, and Miss Mary MacArthur.

More details will be given of the scheme for the employment of women in France and for their employment in agriculture. Two other important schemes which are likely to employ thousands of workers have been organised by Mrs. Tennant and will be produced by her as a surprise at the meeting.

So great has been the demand for admission that an overflow meeting will be held. The hall itself seats 9,000, but many more than that number of women wished to hear the plans for the scheme of National Service.

Share Your "Daily Mail" and Save Tonnage for The Nation.

Daily Express 14. 3. 17 682/23

RALLY OF 10,000 WOMEN.

THE QUEEN AT THE GREAT ALBERT HALL MEETING.

TREE FELLING AND A WOOL CANVASS.

By MARY MORTIMER MAXWELL.

There was every kind of woman at the Albert Hall on Saturday afternoon. I do not suppose that ever before in England, if in any other part of the world, was there such a "mixed" gathering. There was no class in the world, and no occupation in which women are now engaged, which was not represented. Furthermore, all the occupations in which the women of the future will be engaged were represented, for in the breast of every woman there a spark of ambition to do "something" was glowing.

Personally I do not believe there is any work in the world which a woman—some woman, I mean—cannot do and will not do, and therefore I regarded this meeting of ten thousand women as an ominous thing—ominous to Germany. My charwoman was there, or rather the charwoman I used to have, and so was the Queen of England. I mention the charwoman first out of no disrespect to her Majesty.

MR. PROTHERO.

Since hearing him speak at this meeting I shall always have a new thought of Mr. Prothero. I shall think of him as the man who told the women the truth about work on the land; that it was not a "case of a lilac sunbonnet"; that it was hard work, dirty work, and monotonous work; that it was not poetry, but downright plain and practical prose; and then, with the sublime confidence of a man patriot in women patriots, told the women they were needed on the land just as soon as they could get there.

"On the land," said Mr. Prothero, "you will be doing work that is the nearest you can come to approaching the hardships of your brothers in the trenches!" That diplomatic touch will gain thousands of women workers for the land. Truly, Mr. Prothero knows as much of women and of tact as he does of potatoes

Lord Derby presented himself as the "War Office lamb," in spite of the fact that he knows he is already possessed of the lion's share in the way of offers of service from women who wish to join the Women's Army for France, for there is something about service in France that beckons, and that was a good stroke of Mrs. Tennant's when she reminded the women that they must not forget the Glory of England in the Glamour of France.

PLAIN SPEAKING.

Miss Markham, too, had something to say about the difficulties in connection with placing women precisely where they belonged. Plain speaking was the order of the platform, and every one gloried in Mr. Hodge's rebuke to a few women who started to leave before the meeting was over, when he reminded them of their breach of good manners in going before the Queen.

I was particularly interested in Mrs. Tennant's reference to the need of women for felling timber, and then her appeal for the saving of waste woollen and cotton materials in every home. She appealed to every household to collect all such waste material, and asked women to organise a house-to-house canvass.

Mr. Neville Chamberlain was in the chair, and somehow, as I looked at him and thought of the work he had done, and had yet to do, I remembered a Biblical text that seemed to fit him. It was this:—

"In quietness and in confidence shall be your strength."

Daily Mirror 19. 3. 17 682

SCOPE OF THE NEW SCHEME FOR NATIONAL SERVICE.

By Our Special Correspondent.

The following article represents the point of view of Mrs. Tennant and her helpers in the organisation of woman's work.

SATURDAY'S meeting at the Albert Hall was attended by the Queen. The highest lady in the land went there to help in launching the scheme that is finally to organise our woman-power for the last stage of the war.

The scope of the National Service scheme, as far as it affects women, was fully explained by the speakers at the Albert Hall meeting. I do not propose to go over the ground again; for I am sure that what was said on this occasion will be carefully studied by every woman who is debating in her own mind whether she shall come forward. We explained that there would be no general appeal for women, that the work would be organised before workers are asked for, and that it would be the policy of the Department only to appeal for women in strict relation to an ascertained demand. Until a definite call is made women were especially asked to remain where they are at present employed, and not give up their posts. The national cause is not helped by restlessness and a game of general post, which upsets employers and employed. However, there are a few points which may be more fully explained, and there are a few suggestions that I should like to make.

Married women are torn between two pressing duties in the present crisis. Many of them feel that should a call for service be made they will be neglecting their domestic responsibilities. The question has been raised very often, and it is one that can be answered only with great reserve. Every woman must consider her own case impartially and very critically; she must not allow her inclinations to colour or to influence her decision. But if a woman knows that should she volunteer she must neglect her children, or fail to look after the men of her household who are doing national work, I am satisfied she should remain at her post.

RURAL HOUSING.

An appeal has been made for women to volunteer for work on the land. The food supply of the country must be maintained. It has run very low. The reserves are almost exhausted—and a great deal of the food which is necessary must be produced at home. This means that the women must do the work, since the men are, for the most part, otherwise employed. The land cannot wait—it is crying aloud for cultivation—and Mrs. Tennant appeals to the women to come forward.

One point about which there is naturally considerable anxiety is the question of the accommodation which will be available for workers on the land. In many rural districts this is a very difficult problem; but I think that the difficulty has been overcome. The arrangements are being made by the County War Agricultural Committees, and where necessary hostels will be established; and it may be taken for granted that they will ensure the comfort and welfare of the workers.

The women agricultural workers will be guaranteed a minimum wage, and they will be provided with an outfit by the State. Another attraction is the guarantee of 15s. a week for a period of four weeks during unemployment. But, as a matter of fact, claims on this allowance are not likely to be numerous. The call for labour is far too insistent and omnivorous.

Women have shown a splendid eagerness for service. It will be the business of the Department to direct their enthusiasm and goodwill into the right channels.

Daily Telegraph
19-3-17

682/24

682

STIRRING CALL TO THE WOMEN OF BRITAIN.

ALBERT HALL MEETING.

THE QUEEN PRESENT.

Saturday's great National Service meeting for women at the Albert Hall was a wonderful and inspiring sight. Round the building half an hour before the doors were opened stood a ring of women four abreast, and broken only for a few yards before the main entrance, facing the Albert Memorial. Another great queue was in the course of formation on the west side near the College of Music. There were stories told by those waiting of enthusiasts who had taken up their positions at eight in the morning, and certainly many had waited three hours. Within the hall the great balcony began to fill rapidly, and later the gallery had all its accommodation soon occupied. To the boxes in due course came representatives of every well-known organisation of women in the country. In one could be seen the bonnets and uniform of the Salvation Army; in another was a contingent of district visitors. From the National Union of Women Workers came those who have associated themselves with all phases of social endeavour. Labour sent members of the executives of the trade unions All the special corps that the war has brought into being were to be seen—the Women's Patrols, the Women's Volunteer Reserve, and the Women Police, only to name a few. Brisk little Girl Guides helped in various ways.

Meantime a very distinguished company had assembled in the Royal box to await the arrival of the Queen. Among them were the Hon. Lady Haig, Lady Robertson, Adeline Duchess of Bedford (who has borne so active a part in connection with the Joint War Committee); Lady Perley, Lady Borden, Mrs. Fisher, Mrs. Schreiner, and Mrs. Massey, representing the self-governing Dominions, and Mrs. Creighton. The Queen was accompanied by Princess Victoria of Schleswig-Holstein, who was specially identified herself with the work of the Young Women's Christian Association, and in attendance were Countess Fortescue, Lady Bertha Dawkins, and Sir E. W. Wallington. Lady Ampthill received her Majesty, together with Miss Clapham (principal officer, Women's Section) and Mr. J. Jeffrey (assistant director). The ladies of the Royal Choral Society (conducted by Sir Frederick Bridge) had passed the hour of waiting very pleasantly with their selections, and on her Majesty's arrival the National Anthem was sung. As the Queen took her place it was noticed that by a very happy arrangement the box on her right was occupied by the senior sisters of the Royal Naval Nursing Service, while on the other hand were the Matron-in-Chief of Queen Alexandra's Imperial Military Nursing Service, with several members of her staff, the Matron-in-Chief of the Territorial Nursing Service, and the Matron-in-Chief of the Australian Nursing Service.

OVATION TO THE QUEEN.

Mr. Neville Chamberlain's graceful reference to the presence of "our beloved Queen" was the signal for the first round of hand-clapping. Being an entirely feminine audience, it did not cheer, but it showed its appreciation with no less vigour in this manner. Mrs. Tennant was heard well throughout the hall, speaking slowly and clearly, her appeal for wool now lying useless in various forms at home creating a good deal of interest. And her call to women to continue their useful efforts among the mothers and babies, and at clubs for girls, was a just recognition of the value of what women have been doing in these not very showy directions. Quite a new suggestion was Lord Derby's—that women could help with timber-felling, and the girls present listened with special attention to it. There was a ripple of amusement, too, when the Secretary for War referred to Mr. Prothero's promise that the outfits for women agricultural workers should be made to measure by Army contractors as easing upon the War Office one of the most difficult burdens that it had yet borne.

It remained for Mr. Hodge "to gather up the crumbs," as he said, and also to bring about the greatest scene of enthusiasm of the proceedings. He had spoken of her Majesty consist merely of putting on uniforms and forming fours. There were many methods of rendering assistance to the country of a less sensational character. ("Hear, hear," and laughter.)

TASKS FOR VOLUNTEERS.

Mrs. H. J. Tennant, Director of the Women's Section of National Service, said the object of the meeting was rather to give direction to the universal energy women had shown than to make any appeal for an increase of that energy. There had never been a shortage of national service. Even in those directions in which some hesitation might have been anticipated there had been none. An appeal to women to serve in filling factories, at a moment when the country heard the news of a terrible explosion in which many lives were lost, was answered by more women coming forward for dangerous work than were necessary. (Cheers.) That was a tribute to the spirit of the women of this country. The need for service remained. The enemy act of sinking our ships left us tasks of a magnitude which had never been anticipated. One of those tasks was to supply timber for war needs. Timber-felling had, she supposed, been undertaken in this country as a rare relaxation and exercise by a very few women. But women were very adaptable, and it was hoped they would volunteer for the lighter classes of work in connection with the felling of trees and preparation of the timber. They would particularly and gratefully welcome the help of any of their overseas sisters who had had experience in this direction. A few had already volunteered. (Cheers.) Then both we and our Allies were short of wool. Here again the help of women was asked for. They wanted from every home all the waste material containing wool or cotton that could be spared. In the heavy woollen district of Yorkshire and other parts of the country it had been the practice on no insignificant scale to turn material of that kind afresh into yarn and cloth. It must now be done, not on the scale of peace-time, but of war-time; and as in peace time the conversion had been at the rate of 1,500 tons a week, they wanted every household to spare all the material of this kind it could do.

They wanted the help of all women's societies in this matter. They also wanted the help of all individuals who would come into their organisation for a house-to-house canvass and for the collection of the material. It meant blankets and clothing for the Army and the Navy. (Cheers.) Mrs. Tennant emphasised the fact that the care of mothers and of children was really national work.

"The needs of the Army in France and at home are pressing," Mrs. Tennant added. "I can understand their attraction; but in the glamour of France let us not forget the glory of England. The glory of England finds expression in many ways, but first of all it depends on her children." (Cheers.)

THE CALL OF THE LAND.

Mr. Prothero said the cultivation of the soil had become an urgent necessity of vital need. Appeals had been already made in a hundred ways to women, and they had responded so loyally and so bravely that Great Britain was thrilled with admiration for her women folk. He was confident the women would not fail now. (Cheers.) Women, constitutionally and physically strong, who had had experience of work on the land, these were the women wanted—women who, once engaged, would stick to the work not only in the summer months but through the winter. (Laughter and cheers.) The appeal was made to all women 18 years old and upwards. They would have to go before a selection committee composed of women—and there were on an average three such committees in every county—which would be instructed, except in special cases, to give preference to women of maturer age and character than women of 20. (Laughter.) The women selected would be given free an outfit supplied by the Army Clothing Department and supplied to measure. (Laughter.) All travelling expenses connected with the employment would be paid. From three to four weeks' free training would be given, either in depôts or on the farm. When once they were trained it was hoped to pass them out for work on the land. During unemployment they would be maintained free for four weeks.

He might try (Mr. Prothero continued) to paint the charms of working upon the land. (Laughter.) He did not pretend that work on the land was attractive to many women. It was hard, fatiguing, backaching work. Though it had variety, it was for long spells monotonous. It was dirty work. (Laughter.) It was work in all weathers, and it was poorly paid. The accommodation was rough, and those who undertook it had to face physical discomfort. In all these respects it was comparable to the work their men folk were doing in the trenches at the front. (Loud cheers.) "We want" (continued Mr. Prothero) "food grown here at home. The whole foundation of our being able to continue the war depends on food. Your sisters working in public offices feel that they have set men free to play the man's part in the trenches or on the seas. Your sisters working in munition factories are nerved to work beyond their strength by the thought that their labour spares the lives of men at the front. Your sisters nursing in the hospitals know that their ministrations save the sufferings of the wounded and bring them back to life. But without food, what is all that worth? You women who go to work on the land can feel that every weed you destroy, every ear of corn you help to grow, every animal you help to rear, means strength to the men at the front; it means restoring health to the wounded; it means the maintenance of the national strength to continue this struggle. Every sod you turn is a help towards the triumphant conclusion of this war. That you can do on the land. That is the call of the land. (Cheers.) If you women, from disinterested motives, out of patriotism, out of sheer patriotic endeavour,

Exchanges than they could find places for. But as the National Service organisation was completed, by substitution and dilution places would be found for more and more women. He therefore asked women to have patience until those plans were perfected. (Hear, hear.) "May I be permitted to remark," said Mr. Hodge, "how greatly indebted we fell to her Majesty for honouring us by her presence to-day?"

At these words the whole audience rose and broke into long-sustained applause.

The proceedings closed with the singing of the National Anthem, followed, on the call of Mr. Neville Chamberlain, by hearty cheers for the Queen.

CALL OF DUTY.

THE CITIZEN'S CHANCE.

Many interesting messages on the urgency of National Service have been received by the Director-General, two of which—from Lord Sydenham and Field-Marshal Sir Evelyn Wood—we quote below. Lord Sydenham's letter is as follows: "I am afraid that too many men and women still fail to realise the meaning and the need of National Service, or the patriotic duty which it imposes. We have reached a stage of the war at which success or failure turns upon the organised effort of the nation as a whole. Events draw to a crisis, and the enemy is throwing his whole weight and energy into the scales of war. For the sakes of our liberties and all that we hold dearest there must be no withholding of personal service if the Empire is to be maintained intact, untarnished in honour, and in the van of the world's progress. Our sailors and soldiers have fought most gallantly, and given their lives ungrudgingly, on sea and land and in the air. They have the right to claim that those who cannot fight should play a part in the unceasing work of all kinds which the supreme needs of the war demand. All of us have some aptitude or experience that can be turned to national account. There is work of the brain and of the hand, skilled and unskilled, in the factories, in the docks, and on the land. Men over the fighting age, and women, can release recruits for the ranks, and thus help to swell our armies in the field, and to keep alive essential industries which directly or indirectly provide for the necessities of the war and sustain the national life. We look to the Government so to organise the remaining resources of working power as to secure that each volunteer shall be employed in the capacity in which he or she can render the best aid to the Empire in the hour of danger. The National Service Department has undertaken these functions, and all to whom the love of country appeals have now the means of contributing their quota to the national strength. Never in our history has the call of duty been so clear and so imperative, and never before has the chance been given to every citizen to help to make certain the victory of the national cause."

"GO AND DO IT."

Sir Evelyn Wood's message is as follows:

"I suppose most British people of all classes have read the introduction of Nicholas Nickleby to his duties at Dotheboys Hall by Mr. Squeers, in the seventh chapter of Charles Dickens's marvellous creation. It will be remembered that Mr. Squeers's method was intensely practical. The eldest boy in the school was studying Bottinney (sic) by weeding the garden, and the second senior was directed to spell 'clean winder,' and then ordered to 'go and do it.'" Dotheboys Hall was not a model establishment, but I urge that the practical part of the lesson, 'Go and do it,' should be carried out by my fellow-countrymen, and so, in spite of appearing to be vainglorious, I mention the efforts of my own family. Our head, a midshipman, my great-nephew, has been mentioned in despatches from the Dardanelles; my three sons are all serving, two overseas, since the beginning of the war; one grandson overseas, and two training. My gardener, with one eye, has worked overtime in a V.A.D. hospital since the beginning of the war, and is now in the R.A.M.C.; the garden boy joined this week on attaining 18 years of age; my butler and coachman have been pensioners for thirty-five years or more; one groom overseas since early in the war; another classed C3 (v.d.h.) is serving. All the women servants, unasked by me, bought War Bonds. My little paddock was put under potatoes last year; my household is 2lb. under the weekly meat allowance; my bread expenditure has been to date 7oz in excess, which it is hoped will be corrected in future."

outfits for women agricultural workers should be made to measure by Army contractors as casting upon the War Office one of the most difficult burdens that it had yet borne.

It remained for Mr. Hodge "to gather up the crumbs," as he said, and also to bring about the greatest scene of enthusiasm of the proceedings. He had spoken of her Majesty as "a mother before a Queen." He had recalled how, at a garden party at Buckingham Palace some years ago, when the Royal children were younger than they are to-day, Mrs. Hodge had noted how they clung to their mother. He said he knew he was expressing all feelings when he asked them to join in thanking the Queen for the great encouragement she had given to all women's work. The applause that followed was tumultuous and prolonged. Suddenly, as though seized by one impulse, the whole audience rose, and, turning towards the Royal box, accorded a real ovation to her Majesty. It was just one of those spontaneous demonstrations that come from a full understanding. The Queen herself was obviously moved. As the rounds of clapping and the waving of handkerchiefs subsided a little she rose, and bowed repeatedly in acknowledgment.

A few minutes later and the speeches were over. Everyone joined with hearty fervour in singing the National Anthem, thus terminating one of the most remarkable gatherings of women that have ever been brought together. They had come to reaffirm their fixed desire to help in any way that would win the war, and they showed scant patience with the two or three feeble and ill-judged little efforts of discontented individuals who wanted to "protest" about something or other not quite in keeping with their own petty views.

MESSAGE FROM THE QUEEN.

Upon Mr. Neville Chamberlain rising, as chairman, to open the proceedings, a woman in the body of the hall shouted, "I am here on behalf of the Women's Suffrage Federation to express our strong opposition to national service, because we know it means industrial conscription." The interruption was met with hisses from different parts of the hall, and the interrupter was quietly escorted from the building. Silence having been obtained, Mr. CHAMBERLAIN said: This great meeting will be memorable in many respects, but first of all because we have been honoured by the presence of our beloved Queen. (Cheers.) Her Majesty has been graciously pleased to desire that I should say to you what pleasure it gives her to be present this afternoon at such an important meeting, and to convey to you her Majesty's great appreciation of the magnificent services rendered by the women of this country since the beginning of the war. (Cheers.) The Queen earnestly hopes that all those who are not already engaged in essential work will respond whole-heartedly to any further calls which may be made upon them. In the name of this vast assembly, I desire to thank her Majesty for the encouragement she has given us by her presence and by her gracious message. (Cheers.) We deeply appreciate this mark of her ever-present interest in women's work, given to us under the shadow of a great sorrow, and we assure her Majesty that her inspiring words will find a ready and a loyal echo in the heart of every woman in the land. (Cheers.)

Mr. Chamberlain said he had another message to give to the meeting which came from France, and was as follows: "The Association for the Voluntary Encouragement of French Women for National Service, one in heart and thought and hope with their sisters in Great Britain, desire to express to them their warmest sympathy on this great occasion." (Cheers.) He proposed to send the following reply: "This great meeting of British women thank their French sisters most warmly for the inspiring message of sympathy and support, and pledge their unalterable resolve to further the great cause of liberty and civilisation which unites both nations in sacred bonds." (Cheers.)

Among all the changes in our social fabric brought about by the war, he continued, none was more remarkable than the development of women's activities, in which connection he desired to read a letter from Sir Edward Carson, which was as follows:

My dear Chamberlain.—I should like to be permitted to express, on behalf of the Board of Admiralty, our sense of deep obligation to the women who have come forward to help us in various ways at this time of national stress. Before the war no women were employed in our central offices in London; we now avail ourselves of the services of nearly 2,000. In the Royal dockyards and naval establishments at home there were about 400 women employed before the war; there are now about 7,000. In the private engineering shops before the war there were, of course, many women employed, but the number since the war has increased manifold. In the private shipyards before the war there were probably few, if any, women employed; there are now many thousands. I could not easily overstate their devotion to their work. Their physical endurance is, in my opinion, beyond the expectation even of those who rightly understand the spirit which inspires them. I shall be glad if you will allow me this opportunity of making this statement, and to say that undoubtedly we shall want many more women as the work of dilution and substitution in the Royal dockyards and naval establishments and in the private engineering shops and shipyards proceeds. (Cheers.)

All he desired to impress upon the meeting, the chairman added, was that national service did not [illegible] every [illegible] of corn you help to grow, every animal you help to rear, means strength to the men at the front; it means restoring health to the wounded; it means the maintenance of the national strength to continue this struggle. Every sod you turn is a help towards the triumphant conclusion of this war. That you can do on the land. That is the call of the land. (Cheers.) If you women, from disinterested motives, out of self-sacrifice, out of sheer patriotic endeavour, take up this work on the land—(A Voice: This means industrial slavery, against which I protest)—I believe you will exercise over this country and in country districts an untold influence for good. Into the remote districts the war has hardly penetrated. Men go on in their old ways. They do not feel the urgency of the need, and you women can carry into these remote districts a fiery cross of patriotic endeavour. (Cheers.)

WAR SECRETARY'S CONFIDENCE.

The Earl of DERBY, Secretary for War, said Mr. Prothero and himself were present not as the opponents some people would make believe they were, but as allies joining hand in hand to advance a cause which in turn would help both of them. He had to get men for the Army; he knew that Mr. Prothero had to get work done on the farms. They both knew that the only way in which their requirements could be met was by women coming forward to help in the work. (Cheers.)

In the last few months he had often had to appeal for men to join the Army. He now appealed for women to join the great industrial army, in order that men might be released for the front. They could do it by taking the places of men at home as substitutes. Mr. Prothero had mentioned one branch. There were many others. Munitions work especially was a branch of our national activities in which they could relieve men to go to the front. With reference to timber, which was now under War Office control, if they could get all they required in England and France, it would practically nullify the loss of the whole of the shipping sunk by German submarines last year. He understood from what Mr. Prothero had said that the War Office had now undertaken to supply women's clothing. (Laughter.) He felt that of all the heavy burdens the War Office had taken on its shoulders that was by far the heaviest. (Laughter.) Women, he proceeded, could help in works from which so many men had been taken that the firms could not struggle on. It was only by additional labour, and that women's labour, that the industries of this country would be continued. In connection with the work of the Royal Flying Corps alone, the War Office would require the help of something like 6,000 women.

Then there was work in France. That seemed to attract an enormous number of ladies. They wanted comparatively few at present, and although the number required would grow, they had already something like ten times as many applicants as they could possibly employ. There was a certain amount of truth in the statement that novelty appealed to almost every woman. If it was confined to hats and clothes it did not matter much—(laughter)—but if it meant leaving one form of national work to take up another because it was more attractive, then he could say that was not patriotic. (Hear, hear.) If he were able to do so he would prevent any woman coming into the ranks of War Office employment who had given up other national work to do so. He asked women to give up as much time as they could spare from their homes to work in Army and munitions canteens, which had proved of inestimable value. Their services, however, would not be of the least use unless they stuck to what they said they would do.

"We do not intend in any way," Lord Derby added, to interfere with the work of national service. It is through Mr. Chamberlain we shall get all the assistance we require, and it is only to him that we shall apply for women's services. This is not a meeting to inaugurate women's work, but to reaffirm the determination of all women to help in every way they possibly can. Let me say with all the force at my command that this country will have to see far greater privations before the end is reached than any of those present, perhaps, may have any idea of. In this we want the help of women as well as of men—women who will not grumble, but will take everything as it comes as being only part and parcel of the burden the war is placing upon us. I look forward to the future with absolute confidence, resting assured that women will undertake their work and their duties with the same courage, confidence, and self-sacrifice as are their brothers in the trenches in France and Flanders." (Cheers.)

RESERVE OF WOMAN POWER.

Miss VIOLET MARKHAM, Deputy-Director Women's Section of National Service, said it must be remembered that the women's problem was different from that of the men. There was a shortage of men: there was no shortage of women. (Laughter.) Before the war there were over twelve million women in this country between the ages of 18 and 60, of whom nearly five million were unmarried. Of that total over four million were occupied women, engaged in wage-earning, and of them some 40 per cent. were employed in industry. Since the war it was calculated that about one million more women had entered wage-earning occupations. Of course, from the twelve million women available for work very large reductions had to be made, but even then the figure showed a large reserve of woman power in this country.

Mr. JOHN HODGE, Minister of Labour, remarked that more women had registered at the Labour

Daily Mail
19-3-17

WILLING WOMEN.

To the Editor of The Daily Mail.

Sir,—I am well fitted for war work and I have good health, but because I am over 41 I am passed by. I put my name down at the Labour Bureau and after three weeks received a communication of regret. I tried next through the "Woman's Service" and had no reply. And then to the Admiralty, with the same result.

I have arranged my home duties so that I can give from 10 to 6 to outside work, and I am anxious to do so. Surely there should be someone to interview willing workers who are over 41 years of age—someone who could judge by their appearance and record of good health their fitness for war work.

A. E. G.

Morning Post
19-3-17

WOMEN'S WAR WORK.

No more inspiriting overture could have been devised to the call to national service for women than the great meeting at the Albert Hall on Saturday. It afforded another convincing demonstration—though to-day further evidence is hardly needed—of that eagerness to bear sacrifice and to render service which the women of this country, not less than the men, have displayed in the present supreme national ordeal. The trouble with the authorities—who, truly, appear sensible of the fact—will be not to get women workers enough but to allot to them the parts that they can most usefully play. As Mr. CHAMBERLAIN said, it may well be that "women, properly organised, may give the nation the strength that will enable us to win the last lap and to secure an honourable and lasting peace," but it were idle to ignore the fact that the organisation will not be an easy matter. It may be doubted, for instance, whether there is much scope for women in the work of tree-felling; and whether women on the land can ever be adequate substitutes for the skilled agriculturists who have been withdrawn for the Army. But unquestionably women have proved their capacity for all sorts of work which were thought before the war to be man's exclusive province; and it may be hoped that in their laudable zeal and enthusiasm they will not forget that there is still one vital branch of national service in which many of them are irreplaceable—the service of the home. It may not be heroic, but it is nevertheless priceless.

A branch of that service is to be found in the domestic economy to which a call was uttered on Saturday. There women can help the nation's need, both by influence and example, as no other power in the State can do. They are trained to economy in the little things that may make so much difference in the total result; and the authorities would be well-advised in such a matter in obtaining women's assistance in the organisation of their schemes. That would be both a timely and prudent endorsement of "the great appreciation of the magnificent services rendered by the women of the country since the beginning of the war," which the QUEEN, in her gracious message, expressed. The compliment was one which the women of this country must be anxious to return. For no woman has shown more earnestness in good works "since the beginning of the war" than her MAJESTY herself. She has given a lead for which the country cannot be too grateful, and with results that are too little known. As soon as the war began the QUEEN opened her Work for Women's Fund, with benefits that have grown with time, and with the same insight and initiative her MAJESTY reorganised her Queen Mary's Needlework Guild in order to adapt it to the supply of clothes and comforts for the fighting forces. From the great depot opened at St. James's Palace hundreds of thousands of garments for our soldiers and sailors have been issued; and it is easy to believe that without such an organisation in existence the War Office authorities would have found themselves more than once in the position of not being able to fulfil the demands which they had to meet. It is the memory of such gracious and practical acts that makes still stronger any appeal that the QUEEN may issue to the women of England; and how instant and overwhelming was the response to Saturday's message may be read in the spirit and character of Saturday's meeting.

New Statesman
24-3-17

682/25

682

We see that the Daily Chronicle, usually a supporter of the Government, definitely announces that it will insert no more advertisements appealing for merely general enrolment for National Service, which it declares to be nothing but waste of public money. This is a rebuke which Mr. Neville Chamberlain will appreciate; and we may, it is to be hoped, look for the early abandonment of what was, from the outset, an impracticable scheme. The appeal for women now at last issued, unlike that for men, is on the right lines. Volunteers are invited for a specific industry; a definite wage is guaranteed (18s. per week as a minimum); free training is provided, with the necessary clothing; and suitable arrangements for lodging are promised. Whether the wage offered is, at present food prices, at all adequate for trained women doing the work of men, when untrained townsmen are to get 25s. per week, may well be doubted; but if it does not attract the amount can be raised. At any rate (and this may be commended to the Board of Agriculture) the wage is to be paid in cash—another nail in the coffin of "allowances"! Meanwhile the Local Government Board refuses to allow eager Town Councils to set free thousands of men, who are now being wasted in our extravagant system of multiple retail distribution, by organising a municipal distribution of milk and coal.

Evening News
31-3-17

WOMEN FOR THE WOODS.

Woodcutters to Live in Caravans and Use the Cross-Cut Saw.

Sixteen woman woodcutters were selected at the Women's National Service Headquarters to-day.

They are to start work in the woods at Bucknell, Shropshire, after Easter. They will live in caravans and be under the direction of Miss Dorothy Cook, who has already had experience in pit-prop cutting.

Miss Cook's agent, Miss Gwendoline Caffrey, who selected the girls, said that she must have those—

Used to out-door life;
Fairly young;
Prepared to meet physical exertion.

"Girls used to rowing," said Miss Caffrey, "are specially useful; they have the right muscles developed."

The women will—

Learn to measure and mark the trees for logs;
Use the cross-cut saw;
Clear undergrowth, using the billhook.

About sixty women will be wanted in all for the party.

British Australasian
5-7-17

Women workers are wanted in yet another strenuous occupation—to prepare and fell timber for pit-props, light sleepers, and other war purposes. The National Service Department is arranging for the training of a certain number of women in this kind of work as an experiment, and all volunteers must be strong and reliable, and over 18 years of age. The High Commissioner for Australia has been asked by the department to make the matter known among suitable Australian women who may have an aptitude for and be attracted by this kind of work. Outfits, free training, and travelling expenses will be provided free to begin with, and after that volunteers will be asked to sign an agreement to do forestry work until the end of the autumn, and to go where the Department likes to send them. The particulars may be learned from the High Commissioner

The Queen
24. 3. 17

682/26

682

WOMEN'S NATIONAL SERVICE.

ALBERT HALL MEETING.

ALL ROUND THE ALBERT HALL last Saturday stood women in a close-packed, orderly crowd, hoping by dint of patient waiting to gain a place when the doors opened. There were enough of them to fill the hall and to leave a big audience for the overflow meeting. Inside the dark appearance of the crowd (mourning being very generally worn for the late Duchess of Connaught) was broken by patches of lighter tones. On one side of the Royal box was a group of Army nurses, and on the other Naval nurses wearing the characteristic flowing white cap. A line of khaki was picked out by the members of the Women's Volunteer Reserve, who also, under the direction of Mrs Charles, acted as stewards in concert with the Girl Guides. Meantime white-dressed women of the Royal Choral Society, conducted by Sir Frederick Bridge, sang just the right kind of songs. To Sir Hubert Parry's setting Blake's lines seemed to give the text that the great occasion signified:

I will not cease from mental fight,
Nor shall my sword sleep in my hand.
Till we have built Jerusalem
In England's green and pleasant land.

Presently the Queen arrived, accompanied by Princess Victoria of Schleswig-Holstein, and attended by Countess Fortescue, Lady Bertha Dawkins, and Sir Edward Wallington. Her Majesty was received at the entrance by Lady Ampthill, chairman of the organising committee; Miss Clapham, principal officer of the Women's Section; and Mr J. Jeffrey, assistant director of the same department. Seats in the Royal box were also occupied by Mrs Schreiner, Mrs Fisher, Lady Perley, and Lady Mackenzie, wives of the Colonial High Commissioners for South Africa, Australia, Canada, and New Zealand; Lady Borden, wife of the Canadian Premier; Mrs Massey, wife of the Premier of New Zealand; Lady Haig, wife of Sir Douglas Haig; Lady Robertson, wife of Sir William Robertson; Adeline Duchess of Bedford, and Mrs Creighton.

The platform was crowded with women well known in the spheres of political and administrative work. There were Mrs Asquith, Lady Curzon, Marchioness of Crewe, Countess of Derby, Mrs Austen Chamberlain, Mrs Neville Chamberlain, Mrs Prothero, Lady Doreen Long, Lady Reading, Mrs McKenna, Mrs Winston Churchill, Mrs Arthur Henderson, Mrs H. A. L. Fisher, Lady Cave, Countess of Selborne, Viscountess Harcourt, Mrs Lowther, Miss Talbot (the organiser of women's agricultural work), Lady Rhondda, Lady Emmott, Miss Mary MacArthur (the industrial authority), Miss Anderson (the chief woman factory inspector), and Miss Constance Smith, Miss Mona Wilson (one of the Commissioners for Women's National Service), Lady Robert Cecil, Mrs Furse, Lady Askwith, Viscountess Cowdray, Lady Edmund Talbot, Miss Durham (superintendent of the Women's Department of the Employment Exchanges), as well as representatives of the women's colleges, the War Employment Committees, Board of Agriculture, Home Office, Local Government Board, Ministry of Munitions, and Ministry of Labour. Boxes were allotted to some of the leading women's societies.

[J. Gashion.

THE QUEEN ARRIVING AT THE WOMEN'S WAR SERVICE MEETING AT THE ALBERT HALL.

The Queen's Message.

As the Queen entered a wave of enthusiasm passed over the audience. Everyone rose; and when the notes of the National Anthem ceased the chairman, Mr Neville Chamberlain, beginning, as did all the speakers, with the words, "May it please your Majesty," went on to say that this would be a meeting memorable in many respects, but especially by being honoured by the presence of their beloved Queen, who had further desired him to say on her behalf that it gave her great pleasure to be present at such an important meeting. Her Majesty, he continued, had appreciated the magnificent services rendered by the women of this country since the beginning of the war. It was the Queen's hope that all women who were not already engaged in essential work would respond to the call made upon them. On behalf of the meeting Mr Chamberlain thanked Her Majesty for this gracious message. A cordial message of sympathy from the President of the Association for the Voluntary Enrolment of French Women in the National Service was also read by the chairman, together with a draft of the telegram of thanks which he proposed to send in reply. Yet a third message came from Sir Edward Carson on behalf of the Board of Admiralty, recording the valuable help which women had given to the Board. Nearly 2000 women were now employed at the Central Office, and some 7000 at the dockyards, as well as a great number in the private engineering shops and shipyards. It would not be easy, Sir Edward Carson thought, to overstate the devotion to their work which women had shown. As the work of dilution and substitution proceeded many more women would be required by the Board of Admiralty.

Speaking on his own behalf, Mr Neville Chamberlain said he had never doubted that the response of women to the call made upon them would be immediate and overwhelming. The difficulty, indeed, had been that women had searched before work was ready for them to do. [illegible] mean putting on uniform or joining corps. It was often much less sensational in character. But woman power, properly organised, would give the nation strength to win the last lap, and to secure for themselves and their children a lasting peace.

Timber Women and Foresters.

It had been rumoured that Mrs Tennant, Director of the Women's Section, would have some new suggestion to offer. It came in the form of an appeal to young and strong women to make good the loss of timber caused by the sinking of ships and the withdrawal of woodmen. Timber was required for pit-props, railway sleepers, huts, and many other purposes. She thought women might undertake the lighter tasks of timber hewing and cutting, and she appealed to those overseas women who had had experience of the work to help their British sisters. Her second proposal was made with the object of conserving our stocks of wool. She asked women who could give part-time to organise a house-to-house collection of disused woollen, and also cotton articles, which could be made again into yarn for cloth. In peace time 1500 tons a week were converted in this way, and now the need was much more urgent, since large stores of blankets and Army cloth were wanted. But Mrs Tennant devoted some of her time to making an appeal to women at home to go on with some of the good works in which they were previously engaged. She emphasised the special need for well-managed girls' clubs and for societies undertaking the care of infants and young mothers. The glory of England must depend upon her children.

Our Fields and Kitchen Gardens.

Gardening was "not a case of lilac sunbonnets," said Mr Prothero, who was not out to mince matters. ("It was more a case of corduroy breeches," whispered one lady.) It was backaching, dirty work, and must be carried on in the winter as well as in the summer. All the nearer, then, did it approach to some of the hardships which our men were enduring in the trenches. But the country had lost a third of its ordinary cultivators, and the nation must have food. The Board of Agriculture called for strong young women of good character, preferably about the age of twenty. It would give them a free outfit from the Army Clothing Department—"made to measure," he added enticingly—and a training of from three to four weeks in a depot or on a farm. Then the pupils would be passed on for work under suitable conditions of housing and pay. They would not be left in isolation, but in every parish a woman would be appointed to see after their welfare. Between engagements they would be maintained during unemployment for not more than four weeks. The cultivation of the land offered no scope for great achievement, but, added the President of the Board of Agriculture, it had surely been "the part of women to do the little things and to do them greatly."

The Novelty Hunting Woman.

Lord Derby's view was that one of the most interesting chapters in the history of the war would be the history of women's work. Before the war that work had only been organised in sections. What women had already accomplished as Red Cross, V.A.D., and canteen workers was beyond all praise. He asked other women whether they, too, could not play their part equally well, yet he did not wish women to suppose that a "general mobilisation" was contemplated. He asked each woman to do what she was best fitted to undertake. He appealed more particularly to women to join the industrial army in order to release more men for the front. He emphasised the demands already made for women in munition works, in the timber trade, and for making good the deficiencies of clothing material. Then there was the Flying Corps, whose requirements necessitated the work of women, of whom 600 more [illegible] Office of work in France had met with an enormous response. Novelty appealed to almost every woman. If it was restricted to novelty in hats and clothes it did not so much matter; but the War Office did not desire the services of women who were ready to give up important national work for work that was more attractive. "You must stick to the work you say you'll do!" he declared seriously; and it is to be hoped that Lord Derby's statement will be noted by many women whom it concerns. The War Office, he added, would engage women through the National Service Department at St. Ermin's. There was a sentence of general warning in the speech, when Lord Derby said that the country would have to see far greater privations before the end was reached. This meeting must be regarded as reaffirming women's determination to help in every way possible, and to undertake their tasks with the same self-sacrifice and courage as were displayed by their brothers in France and Flanders

"No Shortage of Women."

Miss Violet Markham, Deputy Director of Women's National Service, abstained as clearly as did Lord Derby from encouraging women to think they ought to take any tremendous step in the way of mobilising themselves. "There was a shortage of men, there was no shortage of women," she said, in clear tones, looking at the vast hall packed with members of her sex. Before the war there were twelve millions of women between the ages of eighteen and sixty, of whom nearly five millions were unmarried, and four millions were in wage-earning employments. About one million more had entered wage-earning occupations during the war. Making all deductions, there were large reserves of woman power. There was a shortage of skilled women, but a great surplus of women eager to serve, yet untrained. One lesson of the war was that every woman ought to be trained in a trade or occupation, and be competent to do some one thing well. The war could not have been carried on successfully without the services of women, and Miss Markham paused to pay special tribute to the labours of munition workers. Yet she reminded her hearers that there were 66,000 women on the "live" registers of the Employment Exchanges. There had been widespread dislocation of industry, and there were large "patches of unemployment." Substitution and dilution of industry would raise difficult and delicate problems. Wholesale and heroic measures were not possible, nor must women in employment be asked to play "general post." Therefore they of the Women's National Service Department did not propose to call up women in the mass but individually and as required. She asked each woman to be ready to answer the call to work when it came.

A genial little speech from Mr Hodge, Minister of Labour, wound up the afternoon, and at his suggestion three hearty cheers were given for the Queen.

The general impression left by the speeches was that the leaders of the Women's Section of National Service are at present rather feeling their way. It is impossible to say everything about women's employment within a couple of hours, and especially in a place like the Albert Hall. Yet it might perhaps have been indicated that a really good education on scientific lines would enable many women to fill important posts and to perform valuable service who now form part of the mass of the great unwanted.

M. H.

director of the same department. Seats in the Royal box were also occupied by Mrs Schreiner, Mrs Fisher, Lady Perley, and Lady Mackenzie, wives of the Colonial High Commissioners for South Africa, Australia, Canada, and New Zealand; Lady Borden, wife of the Canadian Premier; Mrs Massey, wife of the Premier of New Zealand; Lady Haig, wife of Sir Douglas Haig; Lady Robertson, wife of Sir William Robertson; Adeline Duchess of Bedford, and Mrs Creighton.

The platform was crowded with women well known in the spheres of political and administrative work. There were Mrs Asquith, Lady Curzon, Marchioness of Crewe, Countess of Derby, Mrs Austen Chamberlain, Mrs Neville Chamberlain, Mrs Prothero, Lady Doreen Long, Lady Reading, Mrs McKenna, Mrs Winston Churchill, Mrs Arthur Henderson, Mrs H. A. L. Fisher, Lady Cave, Countess of Selborne, Viscountess Harcourt, Mrs Lowther, Miss Talbot (the organiser of women's agricultural work), Lady Rhondda, Lady Emmott, Miss Mary MacArthur (the industrial authority), Miss Anderson (the chief woman factory inspector), and Miss Constance Smith, Miss Mona Wilson (one of the Commissioners for Women's National Service), Lady Robert Cecil, Mrs Furse, Lady Askwith, Viscountess Cowdray, Lady Edmund Talbot, Miss Durham (superintendent of the Women's Department of the Employment Exchanges), as well as representatives of the women's colleges, the War Employment Committees, Board of Agriculture, Home Office, Local Government Board, Ministry of Munitions, and Ministry of Labour. Boxes were allotted to some of the leading women's societies.

[J. Gashion.

THE QUEEN ARRIVING AT THE WOMEN'S WAR SERVICE MEETING AT THE ALBERT HALL.

The Queen's Message.

As the Queen entered a wave of enthusiasm passed over the audience. Everyone rose; and when the notes of the National Anthem ceased the chairman, Mr Neville Chamberlain, beginning, as did all the speakers, with the words, "May it please your Majesty," went on to say that this would be a meeting memorable in many respects, but especially by being honoured by the presence of their beloved Queen, who had further desired him to say on her behalf that it gave her great pleasure to be present at such an important meeting. Her Majesty, he continued, had appreciated the magnificent services rendered by the women of this country since the beginning of the war. It was the Queen's hope that all women who were not already engaged in essential work would respond to the call made upon them. On behalf of the meeting Mr Chamberlain thanked Her Majesty for this gracious message. A cordial message of sympathy from the President of the Association for the Voluntary Enrolment of French Women in the National Service was also read by the chairman, together with a draft of the telegram of thanks which he proposed to send in reply. Yet a third message came from Sir Edward Carson on behalf of the Board of Admiralty, recording the valuable help which women had given to the Board. Nearly 2000 women were now employed at the Central Office, and some 7000 at the dockyards, as well as a great number in the private engineering shops and shipyards. It would not be easy, Sir Edward Carson thought, to overstate the devotion to their work which women had shown. As the work of dilution and substitution proceeded many more women would be required by the Board of Admiralty.

Speaking on his own behalf, Mr Neville Chamberlain said he had never doubted that the response of women to the call made upon them would be immediate and overwhelming. The difficulty, indeed, had been that women had responded before work was ready for them to do. National work, he would remind them, did not always clubs and for societies undertaking the care of infants and young mothers. The glory of England must depend upon her children.

Our Fields and Kitchen Gardens.

Gardening was "not a case of lilac sunbonnets," said Mr Prothero, who was not out to mince matters. ("It was more a case of corduroy breeches," whispered one lady.) It was backaching, dirty work, and must be carried on in the winter as well as in the summer. All the nearer, then, did it approach to some of the hardships which our men were enduring in the trenches. But the country had lost a third of its ordinary cultivators, and the nation must have food. The Board of Agriculture called for strong young women of good character, preferably about the age of twenty. It would give them a free outfit from the Army Clothing Department—"made to measure," he added enticingly—and a training of from three to four weeks in a depot or on a farm. Then the pupils would be passed on for work under suitable conditions of housing and pay. They would not be left in isolation, but in every parish a woman would be appointed to see after their welfare. Between engagements they would be maintained during unemployment for not more than four weeks. The cultivation of the land offered no scope for great achievement, but, added the President of the Board of Agriculture, it had surely been "the part of women to do the little things and to do them greatly."

The Novelty Hunting Woman.

Lord Derby's view was that one of the most interesting chapters in the history of the war would be the history of women's work. Before the war that work had only been organised in sections. What women had already accomplished as Red Cross, V.A.D., and canteen workers was beyond all praise. He asked other women whether they, too, could not play their part equally well, yet he did not wish women to suppose that a "general mobilisation" was contemplated. He asked each woman to do what she was best fitted to undertake. He appealed more particularly to women to join the industrial army in order to release more men for the front. He emphasised the demands already made for women in munition works, in the timber trade, and for making good the deficiencies of clothing material. Then there was the Flying Corps, whose requirements necessitated the work of women, of whom 6000 more would shortly be needed. The offer to women by the War on successfully without the services of women, and Miss Markham paused to pay special tribute to the labours of munition workers. Yet she reminded her hearers that there were 66,000 women on the "live" registers of the Employment Exchanges. There had been widespread dislocation of industry, and there were large "patches of unemployment." Substitution and dilution of industry would raise difficult and delicate problems. Wholesale and heroic measures were not possible, nor must women in employment be asked to play "general post." Therefore they of the Women's National Service Department did not propose to call up women in the mass but individually and as required. She asked each woman to be ready to answer the call to work when it came.

A genial little speech from Mr Hodge, Minister of Labour, wound up the afternoon, and at his suggestion three hearty cheers were given for the Queen.

The general impression left by the speeches was that the leaders of the Women's Section of National Service are at present rather feeling their way. It is impossible to say everything about women's employment within a couple of hours, and especially in a place like the Albert Hall. Yet it might perhaps have been indicated that a really good education on scientific lines would enable many women to fill important posts and to perform valuable service who now form part of the mass of the great unwanted.

M. H.

Weekly Courier
31. 3. 17

68

700,000 WOMEN

EMPLOYED IN MUNITION WORKS

URGENT CALL FOR WORKERS ON THE LAND.

Mr. Neville Chamberlain, Director-General of National Service addressing a crowded meeting at the Sun Hall, Liverpool, referring to a previous speech in which he said he wanted half a million volunteers, remarked that it would clear up any misunderstanding on that score if he pointed out that that figure was not a careful calculation based upon the complete estimate of our present and future needs. It was rather a round figure sufficient to cover present needs, but the position was constantly changing, and if the war was prolonged he had very little doubt that they would require more than that. Where were they to come from? In the first place, they must make use of their woman-power. They had done that already, and to a greater extent than most people realised. He believed that there was something like 700,000 women employed at present in munition works. He did not know the number of women employed before the war, but he thought it must have increased at least fourfold since the war began. The process of putting women to do men's work would go on until the end of the war, and as the great struggle went on they would have to find more and more women to help them. At present there was no shortage of woman labour, but there were certain things for which women were wanted, and they were going to make special appeals in this connection. He felt quite certain they would get women to undertake the jobs for which they were required. One of them was essentially a woman's department. They wanted women in connection with the V.A.D., which had rendered splendid service. Not only nurses were wanted, but also general staff women, and he believed that in the course of the next six months they might have to ask for a fresh contingent of something like 10,000 women.

Work on the Land.

Dealing with employment of women in the treatment of home-grown timber, Mr. Chamberlain said it seemed somewhat unusual to imagine women going into forests and cutting down trees, but he had been informed that women could be of great service not in the felling of trees, but in cutting off the smaller branches, etc. Canadian women experienced in that kind of work had been brought over to act as instructresses in timber work, and he was very hopeful of the result of an appeal to women in this direction, because it would set free considerable tonnage for the carriage of food to the country.

The great task for which they required women was on the land. Perhaps the work was not very attractive. The pay was rather low, but he was informed it would keep them, and allow for pocket money. There was no attractive uniform, but there was a pair of top boots. Many women might like to go to France to share the discomforts of their brothers in the firing-line. Something would be done in that direction, for women would be able to set free men by acting as cooks, clerks, drivers, etc. That involved a great deal of preliminary work in the provision of proper accommodation, hospitals in case of illness. Obviously those things would have to be duplicated for the sexes. They could take large numbers of women on the land at the present moment, and although there were many discomforts attached to the work, he felt sure that the women of the country would undertake it. The work was of definite value to the country.

Organisation of Labour.

Turning to another aspect of the labour problem, the speaker said there would have to be greater organisation of the labour that was already employed in essential industries. He explained that he had heard of cases where groups of men in one workshop had not enough work to do, while at the same time similar work was waiting to be done in a neighbouring shop. He thought that if the employers and the trade unionists would work together they might find a very considerable supply of labour from that source alone.

Then there was the transference of labour from less essential to more essential occupations. He fully appreciated the importance to the country of maintaining its industries, and they did not want to destroy any industry if they could help it. There was only one way of solving the problem of finding employment for the men who would come back when the war was over. That was by so organising their industries that they could find employment for all. (Hear, hear.) Yes, but how could they find employment in industries if there was no nucleus left for them to build upon? At present there was not enough labour to go round, and so it must be the duty of someone to say who must go short. They had endeavoured in an order recently issued to divide the labour. That order had been received with a certain amount of criticism, which was directed not so much against the object as against the method of carrying it out.

Do Without Beer.

If there was not enough labour to go round, well we must try and do for a time as best we can without our pianos, gramophones, without our furs, and without our beer bottles. He did not think anybody would object to that. (Laughter.) What was objected to was that in restricting these occupations it was said they were preventing a certain number of people from finding employment in the trade to which they were accustomed, and yet at the same time they were unable to find them occupation in the trades which required the reinforcement of labour. That was a very reasonable criticism. It was one they had to meet, and they were endeavouring to meet it in this way, that they said anybody who would enrol as a National Service Volunteer might be taken on by any employer in any trade whatsoever. Their objection in creating these restrictions was to divert labour from less essential to more essential occupations. If they could not give a man a job in a more essential occupation there was no reason why he should be lost. Therefore they said, "Continue at your old employment, enrol as a volunteer for national service, and if we find a vacancy we can come to you and ask you to fill it." (Cheers.) That was the object of the order, but he was not sure that even so it was an ideal method of carrying out what was wanted. At any rate they were going to try something else.

Men for the Army.

In the new circumstances of which he spoke a large number of men had got to be drawn from the munition works for the Army, and they would have a demand which would be much more definite in character, and which enabled them to go to men and say what work they would be put to and the wages they would get if they undertook to do it. (Cheers.) It had been suggested to him from various quarters that if they took a town or district and said, "We want so many men from you," then there would be no difficulty in obtaining volunteers. There was a good deal to be said for that, but on the other hand they had got to work quickly, and he was afraid if they took town by town there would be certain jealousy as between one trade and another as to who should furnish the men, and much time might be occupied in settling disputes of that character. He thought it was possible to take separate trades and deal with them in that way. They had a scheme now for dealing with these restricted occupations, taking them trade by trade, and getting returns from the employers of the largest groups, so that they could see what they could do. They would fix for each trade the number of men they thought could be released without doing more injury to the trade than was necessary. This would be a voluntary scheme, and if dealt with in a broad-minded and patriotic spirit they would have no reason to be afraid of the result. One trade alone had already put up a scheme by which 2,000 men could be released for the Army and another 1,000 men as substitutes. If that could be done in one trade, he believed if the process were extended throughout the country it might go far to solve the problem he had before him. (Hear, hear.) There had been much talk in some parts of the country as to whether this scheme should not have been compulsory rather than voluntary.

No Threats.

It was decided by the War Cabinet that they should try a voluntary scheme, and if that was not successful then they might make it compulsory. "I am not using any threats," said Mr. Chamberlain. "I don't think Englishmen need to be threatened. (Hear, hear.) But I do put it to you that in this crisis of our country, if we put our whole strength into the struggle we may perhaps achieve some decisive result at an early date. It is up to all of us to put aside prejudices and suspicions, and work shoulder to shoulder and wholeheartedly in support of whatever scheme may be put up to us. (Cheers.)

WOMEN'S NATIONAL SERVICE.

Questions and Complications.

By MRS MARGARET HEITLAND.

THE PROBLEM of women's National Service has not been altogether clarified by the Albert Hall meeting. The effect of that great meeting was to still in the bosoms of some of the elder and less vigorous women the anxiety to be doing other work than that which life had prescribed for them. These would return to their homes feeling that (as servants say) there was no call for them to "leave their present situation." But many of the younger women—though the average age of the audience was a ripe one—must remain tormented with self-questionings. To some of these younger women, but not by any means to all, did the speakers indicate appropriate national labour.

Let me try to explain what, as I believe, a large number of educated, capable girls are thinking. They wish very much to be up and doing; though, indeed, most of them are by no means unoccupied as it is. They wish intensely to help their people through the last and most critical stage of the war. But they are not quite sure that they will help most effectively by making a complete sacrifice of all their previous education and training, especially if by making such a sacrifice they were to become less useful members of the community during the difficult years of international economic struggle that lie before us. Not a few of them are preparing at the Universities, colleges, and training centres to become scientific investigators, inspectors, industrial superintendents, chemists, organisers, and utilisers in various ways of trained mental powers. Ought they to break off the course of this elaborate preparation to go upon the land and to receive eighteen shillings a week?

The Question of Crops.

Perhaps they may decide that they ought to do this. For my own part, I think the right decision depends a good deal upon the circumstances of each case. If a girl has not yet begun her higher or professional training, then, if her health is sound, let her postpone this training and give from now till the end of the autumn to the cultivation of foodstuffs. Let any possible interlude be employed in this or in some other of the species of labour that are more obviously labelled just now as National Service. And it is well to point out that these apparent sacrifices sometimes mean more gain than loss. It is a great advantage to anyone, but to women especially, to get out of a social or professional groove. Often one gains more real change by going to live in a cottage or farm half a mile from home than by moving from hotel to hotel in what is supposed to be the enjoyment of foreign travel. Similarly, many girls who have left comfortable homes to enter munition factories have thus learnt more about life than they would have done by remaining in the decent stagnation of a residential district.

Postponing the General Call to Women.

I have mentioned "Questions and Complications" at the head of this article, and I think it right, though in no carping spirit, to indicate them. Our towns, since the Albert Hall meeting, have been more thickly placarded than ever with appeals for National Service. But it is apparent that these appeals are more immediately addressed to men. Women may, of course, offer their labour at once through any of the Employment Exchanges, as they have been doing since the outbreak of war. They have been asked to offer more particularly for farm and garden work, forestry and joinery, aeroplane work, and munition making. But for the present they are not to be nationally registered afresh, as are the men, nor are they appealed to in the mass. The chief reasons for the call to service not being addressed to them in the mass are: first, because there are so many women; second, that so few of them are skilled in the right way. The very mention of such reasons as these causes a sense of disappointment, and sets women questioning why training has been withheld from them.

This question of training for important work is rankling a good deal just now. Small casual indications suggest an answer. The objections offered by professional bodies of lawyers to the entry of women into their profession; the opposition of the London taxi-drivers to drivers' licences being given to qualified women; the curious hindrances encountered by women who try to learn certain well-paid trades—all these hindrances explain themselves too readily. Already we hear of the compulsory restriction of trades; and if these trades employ numerous women workers, women may have further reason to wonder how their powers are to find free scope. Twenty years ago optimists were wont to assure young women workers that there was "plenty of room at the top." It may have been true; but when the top was reached women were apt to find that the space was reserved. Undoubtedly women occupy far more posts than they did at salaries of from £200 to £500 or more a year; but they only do so by virtue of the University education which they have insisted on securing, and even now complaints of the absence of proper chances for promotion are many and well made out.

Wanted: The Note of Encouragement.

It is with these difficulties and doubts that the organisers of women's National Service will have to contend. I could have wished that one or other of the Albert Hall speakers had said in effect, "You women who have done well at the Universities, we can use you. The country will need more women of your type later. You who think of studying engineering, do so. If any of you are skilled chemists, come forward. If you are good linguists, replace men temporarily in some of the commercial houses. We want accountants for the banks. We want stockbrokers' clerks who shall have a chance of learning stockbroking. There is a shortage of men's labour; there is no shortage of women's. Consequently we must help women to train at once, so that they can make good that shortage. And after the war, when trade is skilfully developed, all of you who have become expert and valuable workers will help your country infinitely better than if you remained, what so many of you are now, compulsorily unskilled and compulsorily underpaid." I should have liked, in short, to hear the note of hope more clearly sounded in the ears of that eager and enthusiastic crowd.

I realise that if it had been sounded there would have been an even bigger rush of women to St. Ermin's than had been the case during the preceding weeks. Such a rush would be inconvenient, because the majority of the applicants would not be ready to fill the places that are vacant. But surely this is the cogent reason for handling this mass of women betimes, and moulding them by training for the work they are required to do. In agriculture such a scheme of training is in tolerable though not very complete working order. It is complicated by the offer of soldiers' labour which is made in some districts; and the extremely low pay suggested for women is a distinct difficulty. The value of money declines weekly, and the purchasing power of 18s. may perhaps be reckoned to-day at about 10s. 6d. This point is not sufficiently regarded. Even the comparatively high wages earned by women in munition work are not in all cases such a vast improvement on pre-war pay, if we reduce the sum in money to its terms in purchasing power. If £1 to-day means for buying purposes 12s., 25s. (which sounds such a comfortable wage for an uneducated girl) is only for practical purposes 15s., or the old fairly good wage of the factory girl, whose toil was moderate and never included nightwork.

Women in general will not cavil about the nature of their work or about the amount of their wages, provided two conditions are met. These conditions are (1) that they are working for the benefit of the nation at large (as, at the front, the soldiers, the doctors, the chaplains, and the nurses are working) and not to yield an extra war profit to an individual employer, and (2) that they as workers are put fairly on an equality with men, and are given good opportunities for training and for subsequent promotion. In short, the fear of exploitation must be banished.

Training First and Always.

The conditions imposed by the war are putting in women's way many good opportunities for training. One of the most far-seeing women's societies has helped women to do some of the finer kinds of engineering, metal-work, and glass-blowing, which such workers would not have been allowed even to learn to do in former times. To the printing trade women are gaining admission, and employers are announcing the discovery that their work is good. To Mrs Tennant, as Director of Women's National Service, it is clear that we may look for a lead with regard to some branches of the building trades, notably those connected with woodwork and carpentry. She has, it is understood, a considerable scheme on hand for the building by women of huts for other women war-workers. Those of us who have known anything of Mrs Tennant's work in industrial affairs will feel confident that she will go forward both boldly and carefully, knowing the end in view, and planning all the details.

The training and knowledge acquired by women in all the fields of labour they are now entering can never be thrown away. But to say so much implies that there may be an endeavour later to annul their present gains. Surely such an endeavour would be very bad national policy. To look at it from only one point of view, it would mean the remaking of slums and the refilling of our workhouses. Looked at from another, it means the loss of many skilled trades and their output. Keeping such considerations as these before our mind, I hold that we ought to press for the further training of women as the essential preliminary to their employment. The lesson taught by all our Employment Exchanges, National Service registration schemes, and the like is that to make any of these undertakings as useful as they might be it is absolutely needful that the offering of facilities for proper training should be part—and, indeed, almost the main part—of the women's side of the business. An Employment Department has not merely to put the pegs into the holes; it must try to shape the pegs to fit the holes. The Employment Exchanges would not be encumbered with such an enormous "live register" of women if they were given more power to help in this shaping.

SCHOLARSHIPS AT OXFORD.—The following scholarships have been awarded at Lady Margaret Hall, Oxford: The Old Students' scholarship of £70 a year to C. M. Canning, Ladies' College, Cheltenham (history); the James Cropper scholarship of £50 a year to C. Anson, Manchester and Clapham High Schools (German); the Mary Talbot scholarship of £40 a year to H. M. Snelgrove, Croydon High School (French); the Anne Chalmers Bennet Clark exhibition of £20 a year to I. M. A. Naylor, Queen's School, Chester (history); an exhibition of £20 a year to G. R. Wood, Edgbaston High School (history). The following scholarships have been awarded at St. Hugh's College, Oxford: A college scholarship of £35 a year to G. R. Spurway, Ladies' College, Cheltenham (history); a college scholarship of £25 a year to N. P. Clark, Clapham High School (history).

WAR ECONOMY. Use Ryland's Light or Dark Oak SANITARY FLOOR VARNISH "FLOORYLINE," obtainable at Whiteley's, Shoolbred's, Barker's, and all chief stores. 12s. gallon, 6s. 6d. half gallon, 4s. quart, can and brush included. L. Ryland Ltd., Birmingham.—[ADVT.]

THE PRACTICAL WORK OF DRESSMAKING AND TAILORING. Fourth and Revised Edition, with numerous diagrams. By M. Prince Brown, Examiner in Dressmaking, Tailoring, and French Pattern Modelling, &c.; First-class Diploma for Tailoring; "Diploma of Honour" for Dressmaking; "Diploma of Merit of the Highest Order" for Teaching; Silver Medallist (London Exhibition), 1908. This New Edition has been brought up to date, and also contains a third part on Altering and Remodelling Garments. Price 3s. Postage 4d. FUNK & QUEEN (Honor Cox) Ltd., Windsor House, Bream's Buildings, London, E.C. 4. [ADVT.]

Daily Mail
25.6.17

WHERE TO FIND LAND WOMEN.

Girls are urgently wanted for the land, particularly for weeding and milking.—National Service Appeal.

The Government is still in a dilemma how to satisfy the claims made upon it by the War Office and the Ministry of Munitions and the Board of Agriculture. I wonder if Cabinet Ministers ever have time to walk through the streets of our big cities and to discover untapped labour reservoirs.

When I leave to catch my early morning train I find the advance parties from the grocer, the baker, and the butcher deploying in the street. They are young girls, about twenty years of age, and there are thousands of them wasting their time in booking orders. People ought to fetch what they need from the shops.

In the theatre I find girls selling programmes or iced drinks or carrying trays of chocolate.

When I go to lunch a "hefty," healthy man opens the door for me. Sometimes a pallid youth of about fourteen years of age seems anxious to hang up my hat. Like most other people I can hang up my hat, coat, and stick.

Could not all this superfluous labour be turned on to the production of food? The waste of energy and material is appalling. Nearly every important street is busy with superfluous traffic. Motor-vans, horse vans, and small carts of all descriptions are scurrying about to deliver small orders to suburban houses. Petrol is used up. Horses are used up. And the services of the army of employees necessary to sustain this business of delivery are dissipated uselessly.

• • • • •

The explanation is that people have yet to realise that victory will be deferred until, as Sir William Robertson has insisted, the whole energy of the State is directed to the prosecution of the war.

The Chief of the Imperial General Staff has told us that it is to the 75 per cent. of the population not in arms that we have to look for effort to defeat the Boche. What is that 75 per cent. doing? A large part is toiling laboriously in the workshops. But there are others.

Take a voyage of inquiry. Walk through the streets of London some afternoon. Observe the multitudes of women aimlessly wandering from shop to shop—and the call is for more and more women workers. Go into a theatre. It is crowded with women who afterwards surge into the restaurants.

It is the same with the picture theatres. Hundreds of thousands of women idle their time in this way. And the majority of them maintain one or two domestic servants who ought to be doing direct work for the State. I have read recently that more than 2,000,000 persons are normally engaged in domestic employments. If a quarter of this labour were put on to production of food the results would be marvellous at the end of a year's time.

The call to reduce staffs of servants has fallen on a number of very deaf ears. More and more curtailments of purely luxury employments must be made.

The War Cabinet might devote a day to walking around London. Their eyes would be opened. The bustle of the streets cannot conceal the dissipation of energy upon non-essentials. The spectacle is a sickening one. C.

Daily Mail
16.7.17

GRADES IN WOMEN'S CORPS.

Various badges are to be seen on the workmanlike uniforms of the Women's Army Auxiliary Corps. The N.C.O.s, or forewomen, wear a wreath on both arms; higher-grade N.C.O.s have a rose in the centre of the wreath.

Officers wear badges on their shoulder-straps instead of the "W.A.A.C." of the rank and file. The double rose indicates the Chief Controller at home, and a fleur-de-lys with two roses the Chief Controller overseas and Deputy Chief Controller at home. One fleur-de-lys and a rose is the badge of the Deputy Chief Controller abroad and of a Section Controller at home. A Clothing Controller sports three roses. So does a Unit Administrator, while a Technical Assistant Controller has to be content with only one.

682

The Queen 4. 8. 17.

68

NATIONAL EMPLOYMENT AND NATIONAL SERVICE.

By MRS MARGARET HEITLAND.

THE STRESS AND STRAIN OF THE WAR have caused some of our rulers and governors to act first and think afterwards. In the hurry of an urgent hour they create departments, a board, or a committee, only to discover afterwards, perhaps, that some existing body could have done the work better, and has been even hindered in its work by the establishment of the new organisation.

A glaring case of this (from the woman's point of view, at all events) was the establishment of the National Service Department.

Why was the National Service Department started as a vast piece of brand-new human machinery, wholly independent of that carefully prepared network of employment exchanges which had only been made within recent years? What was the reason for its existence?

On the face of things there was every reason for not starting a new department in this isolated, separate fashion. One powerful reason may be cited and is almost conclusive. To build a new organisation capable of drawing in all the potential workers, it would have been needful to open well-staffed offices as numerous and as widely distributed over Great Britain as the existing exchanges. Yet manifestly, with the shortage of labour occasioned by war time, this was impossible. At most it could only be hoped that outside London a few persons might be found willing to give a little spare time for unpaid office work of the kind. The manning of a complete, highly ramified National Service Department was in effect impossible, even supposing that it were desirable. But has it ever been desirable?

That is the point. And here let us distinguish between national service and the creation of an independent National Service Department, for they are wholly separate matters. I have been eager (who has not been?) that the call to national service should be addressed to everybody, and to women as much as to men.

But what is National Service? In answering this question we come to the root of the difficulty and to the root of our differences of opinion. I see no difference myself—or at most only a difference of degree—between national service and national employment. I take it that all of us who are not occupied in gambling, money-grabbing, trafficking in the lives and health of our neighbours, or persistently loafing, are to some extent in the National Service. National service is more or less splendid and heroic in proportion to the spirit of self-sacrifice displayed; and the unwritten rolls of honour include citizens of the Empire of each sex, of every station, and every calling. No line can be drawn on one side of which alone national service may be rendered.

In creating the National Service Department no attempt was made at the drawing of such a line. It was, for example, never asserted that national service meant unpaid work. Indeed, an attempt to draw the line there would lead us at once to some very odd conclusions.

If one persist in asking why the employment exchanges were not entrusted with the task of pressing the required additional workers into the nation's service, I suppose the answer would be that these exchanges had not been encouraged previously to find work for people of the best educated classes. If this is the explanation, the right step to take next would surely have been so to develop the employment exchanges as to make them suitable for the need of the present and immediate future—the need, that is, of well-educated workers to fill important posts. If the Women's Section of the National Service Department, with some of its able directors, can now be linked up with the whole employment exchange system under the Ministry of Labour, there will be this effective recognition of the unity of national service and national employment which ought to have been made from the beginning.

Too Many Departments.

We are suffering a good deal at the present time from lack of systematised and centralised organisation where employment is concerned. The national service is not the only extraneous employment department which has been created since the beginning of the war. For some unexplained reason agricultural and horticultural employment is also regarded as not coming within the control of the Ministry of Labour and the operations of the employment exchanges. Separate committees are set up to enlist and superintend women for agricultural labour during the war. No definite connection is established between these committees and the advisory committees on Women's War Employment which work in connection with the employment exchanges and are appointed by the Ministry of Labour. Consequently, the woman or girl who thinks of doing work on the land may register herself at her employment exchange and be referred to the Women's Agricultural Committee, or she may apply to the latter without passing her name through the employment exchange register. This want of centralisation prevents complete records of women's work from being kept. Munition workers on the other hand are supplied through the employment exchanges for the most part; but here again we find no clear demarcation at present between the functions of the Ministry of Labour and the Ministry of Munitions. In truth, the various organisations and committees set up to deal with national service, food production, agriculture, munitions, canteen work, welfare work, and war employment, find their boundaries continually crossing each other. From time to time attempts are made to remedy the ensuing confusion, and complaints are heard about "overlapping," and the cry goes forth that there must be "co-ordination." If "co-ordination" does not come when it is called for, a proposal is generally made that the next new committee shall be a "joint" committee comprising representatives of all the committees previously in existence.

Developing the Advisory Committees.

Personally I hold no brief for one committee or set of persons being better qualified than another to deal with women's employment. But I advocate simplicity and unification because trouble is saved thereby, and because with one organisation it is possible to register workers and employers on one system, and to make the records of lasting value. The employment exchanges are very far from being perfect. They are often quite inadequately housed, with insufficient space for the holding of interviews and the filing of documents. But they have in them the making of a national system of bureaux which might deal with employment generally, and help all but the most highly specialised workers to find suitable places. What they have needed also has been the help of committees who could deal with some of the fields of activity for which their own staff had not the time—such fields, for instance, as the technical training of workers, housing, and the safeguarding of health and character, &c. Help of this kind they are just beginning to receive from the Advisory Committees on Women's War Employment which are now at work in many localities. But why should not this beginning be carried further? Why should not the Women's War Agricultural Committees work similarly to committees of the employment exchanges? I am quite unable to see any reason for the present severance of their functions, but I do see that there would be a great gain if an agricultural employment committee worked in the same direct relation with the employment exchange as the advisory committees. Both are equally connected with the war. The advisory committees are chiefly occupied at present in finding women munition workers, but the provision of food and of munitions is dependent the one upon the other in the conditions of the present age.

My desire to see the employment exchanges better utilised for the whole domain of women's employment acquires an additional eagerness when I reflect that the demand is daily increasing for women of real capacity and education to fill many new and important public positions. There is at present no national institution which makes a serious business of putting forward the claims of first-rate women candidates for first-rate posts. The whole of this enterprise is left to private societies and private registries; and only by exception does a woman of the highest attainments obtain a suitable post through an employment exchange. This is only natural. To make suitable inquiries on behalf of a candidate, to test the candidate's intellectual and professional qualifications, to obtain, perhaps, a little extra training for her—all enterprises of this sort demand a great deal of trouble, and take more time than overworked employment exchange officials can give. But were small committees attached to the exchanges and charged with the duty of sifting out workers for public and professional appointments, employers would know that in applying to an exchange for a responsible, professional woman they would receive all possible help.

Anyhow, let us try to get rid of the notion that service and employment are not the same thing. Employment is service; and if service is so grand and so "voluntary" that it must not be called employment, then I am afraid it is the sort of service upon which I should be sorry to depend. I am sometimes rather repelled by the tremendous eulogies which are lavished on well-to-do persons who work without wages. The middle-aged, prosperous person who is too old to go to the war and not strong enough to do wage-paid work ought surely to be thankful for employment. When that employment takes the form, as it often does, of work on behalf of some great public or national cause, it seems to me that the worker is in luck.

Daily Mail
30 8-17

Warwick, Leamington & Warwickshire Times.
18-8-18.

68

THE WOMEN'S ARMY.

At an erstwhile residential club somewhere off the Marble Arch, five hundred women of every rank and condition are housed together, under the control of a woman administrator and women officers. These women make up a large part of what is known as the Women's Army Auxiliary Corps. The object of their training and preparation may be summed up in three words—Service in France.

Clerks, secretaries, shorthand-typists, accountants—these form a large proportion at the moment, while the rest of the "draft" consist chiefly of cooks, parlourmaids, and household workers generally.

The day's régime at the hostel begins with réveillé at seven, when the sleepy recruit is awakened not by bugles but by the distinctly "cracked" sound of an apparently ancient bell being carried along the corridors by an energetic member of staff. Roll-call is taken at 7.50, the girls and women—the "draft," as they are called—standing at attention outside their bedroom doors to answer as their names are called over by an officer upon each floor. Breakfast follows at eight, tables being laid with knife, fork, and spoons, which members at each table are bound to clear and return to their respective piles for washing up. The draft line up in queues, first finding plates and then being served with portions of porridge, fish, and the like, and a couple of slices of "marged" bread. Tea is supplied for each table, and is given out ready "milked." Sugar is allowed at the moment, and the draft heave a sigh of relief at the daily prospect of sweetened tea or porridge.

Beds made and bedrooms tidied, the "Orders for the Day" are studied on the notice-board, and various sections go off to drill in Hyde Park (except beginners, who are under instruction on the premises); others attend a lecture by the resident medical officer, or are free to go where they please until midday dinner. Special passes are granted for absence on business or (occasionally) for pleasure; and it is even possible to obtain a pass, where conditions justify it, which allows a member to be absent until 9.30 p.m., when the hostel door closes with inevitable punctuality. No member is allowed "out" after 5 o'clock without a pass, except on Sunday, when there is a special extension until 7.30 p.m.

• • • • •

One of the chief objects of residence in the hostel before drafting is, of course, that of being revaccinated and of being inoculated against both typhoid and paratyphoid A and B.

Getting into uniform and procuring kit follow these operations in due course, and then arrives the great moment when members' names appear on the board as "Drafted for France." Every day almost does this happen for somebody, every day almost does a draft assemble for kit inspection in the dining-hall and march off from the entrance amid cheers from their comrades, whose turn will come next.

It is probable that only those members who as private individuals emphatically have "things to do"—work to complete, business affairs to settle, homes to give up—will find in the life anything but a simple and straightforward preparation for their Great Adventure in the great war.

The big orderly room at this hostel of the Women's Army Auxiliary Corps, with its network of ceaseless activities pervaded and disciplined by the Army spirit, provides an answer to any who may still be sceptical of woman's powers of business and her capacity to carry on unhesitatingly to the end H. C.

Daily Mail
22-10-17.

WOMEN'S ARMY APPOINTMENTS.

Temporary appointments to the Women's Army Auxiliary Corps were gazetted on Saturday night as follows:

Controller.—Miss C. Ellis.
Assistant Controller.—Miss J. V. D. Learoyd.
Recruiting Controller.—Mrs. C. L. Dean.
Unit Administrators.—Mrs. A. E. B. Johnston, from an assistant administrator; Mrs. D. L. Esslemont.
Assistant Administrators.—Miss E. J. March, Miss A. F. Robertson, Miss E. M. Thring, Miss G. E. G. Watkins, Mrs. M. L. Caborne.

WOMEN AND WAR WORK.

Women's share in war work has been so valuable that the majority of critics, who shook their heads and prophesied all manner of failures and even catastrophes when the introduction of feminine aid into realms previously sacred to the other sex was brought about, have long since been silenced. It is true there are, even to-day, some mere males who tightly shut their eyes to the good work their sisters have done in the factories and even contend that "tea, tears and titters" have so interfered with the performance of ordinary duties as to seriously discount any service which had otherwise been rendered. But the great majority fully realise the enormous amount of energy the women have displayed, the remarkable aptitude shown in picking up work quite new to them, and how impossible it would have been to release so many men for the Army had they not come forward to fill places at desks, behind counters, and in many other capacities besides what is being done in work more directly associated with the actual carrying on of hostilities. That the Army Council rightly appraises the services of the women is to be found in the fact that a new corps has been formed to be composed entirely of the fair sex who are to be employed in such diverse occupations in connection with the Army as accountancy and shoemaking. The object is to effect substitution of women for soldiers in certain employments at home, at the bases, and on the lines of communication overseas. It is, however, stipulated that except in cases where the employment of a soldier would otherwise have been officially authorised, no woman of the corps will be employed unless a soldier is thereby relieved for other purposes. At home the women will gradually be introduced into command, garrison and regimental employments, the last including officers' and sergeants' mess clerks, tailors, cooks, librarians, company storemen, shoemakers, quartermasters' storemen, and orderlies. When circumstances permit women on certain duties may live at home, otherwise both in this country and abroad, they will live in billets and hostels. They will be provided with a serviceable outfit, shoulder straps, inset with colour, will denote the various sections, and the badge of the corps will be a laurel wreath, surrounding the initials W.A.A.C., which will be worn by all. Care is to be taken that they will not have to toil excessively. Indeed, when off duty, the women will have a good deal of liberty and the discipline will not be irksome, but it is stipulated that they must wear their uniform on all occasions. Needless to say there are certain restrictions regarding admission to cafes and estaminets in France. The progress of the experiment will no doubt be closely watched, but there is little reason to believe that the result will be other than satisfactory. Women are certainly having the opportunity they have long expressed a desire for, of working on equal terms with the men, and they are hardly likely to be backward in taking advantage of it. This is only one of the changes the war has brought about in social life.

Challenge 20. 9. 18. 1918 September. 682

682/31

Women's Work for Soldiers in India.

(FROM A CORRESPONDENT.)

THE most pressing Army problem in India at present is that of the furlough season. Hundreds of men, fresh from the heat, boredom and discomforts of Mesopotamia, which they have endured perhaps for three years without a break, come pouring into the big cosmopolitan cities of India, intent on amusement. Needless to say, that amusement will be by no means always of the innocent kind. An Indian city is no place at any time for relaxation of moral fibre—it is a breeding house of impurity; nor is it the healthiest place for furlough during the summer months. But the hill stations afford little in the way of amusements, and are less attractive to the men.

The problem has been bravely tackled by the Y.M.C.A., and they have gained the willing co-operation of many English ladies, who have been tireless in arranging tea parties, concerts and recreation of all kinds for the men. But it was felt by some that there was need for more organisation of these voluntary efforts, and a bold experiment has been made this year at Wellington, in the Nilgiri Hills. Here there is an organised service of trained lady workers, giving their full time to the running of a Recreation Institute for some 600 furlough men. The whole of one end of the great Barrack Square has been given up to the Institute. Here there is a skating rink, there a large dining room, at which any meal can be obtained, including the Army rations—a games room, a reading and a writing room, and a most popular "shop," at which anything may be procured, from "scissors" and afternoon tea to Indian curios, upon which the men love to spend their money, especially since there are also two or three ladies whose main business it is to pack up properly the purchases that are to be sent home. Sing-songs, whist drives, lectures and carnivals at the rink fill up the evenings, and there is a small room set apart for prayer, in which a meeting is held each night. In the square itself are badminton and tennis courts.

The ladies, some of whom are salaried full-time workers, known as "A's," and some voluntary helpers for a longer or shorter time, or "B's," live all together in the old Depot Mess, some in the house, some in tents. The "A" workers are picked women from all parts of India, some of them lent for the season by missionary societies and Y.W.C.A. Each of them is in charge of one department—indoor or outdoor games, canteen, picnics, etc. The last is no light job, and entails organising expeditions for an average of forty men every day—walking out with them perhaps ten miles, and generally being responsible for their enjoyment.

The credit for having originated this scheme belongs to Mrs. Whitehead, the wife of the Bishop of Madras, and all honour is due to the military authorities for having the courage and wisdom to perceive its value and adopt it, and for their readiness to co-operate for its success. It is a remarkable achievement in a time of remarkable achievements in the way of women's work. The Women's Service at Wellington is recognised by Government and the military authorities as an integral part of the Wellington furlough camp, and as such it is under the military organisation.

Experience shows abundantly that there is something which can be done for these men that women can best do. Testimony afte testimony comes from them showing how they appreciate the opportunity of constant friendly natural intercourse with ladies. "You don't see many ladies in Mespot., you know, Miss"; or, "I've not spoken to a woman for three years," are frequent comments. The workers are quickly adopted as "sisters," "mothers," or "aunts," and they have ample opportunity for being so in more than name. A good deal of quiet missionary work is being done, and lads who would not go wrong if it were not the thing to do are getting straight again because they are being made to feel that somebody cares about it and thinks it matters.

There is an opportunity, too, for opening the eyes of these men—who are, of course, just an average scoop of Englishman, gathered from every kind of pre-war occupation—to the interest and problems of the country in which they are [illegible] ing, and which they are supposed to govern. It is something to be able to teach them that all Indians are not "boys," whose sole reason for existing is to minister to the wants of the white man in return for backshish. The idea of many Indians being University graduates comes as quite a shock. Many of the soldiers are keen to pick up information on these matters, and much can be done even in the short furlough month to help them to the right attitude. They are peculiarly receptive, ready to do anything that is arranged for them, and with a quick chivalry which responds at once with gratitude, admiration and respect to the women, whom they realise are there simply for their sakes.

Week's Dispatch 22.9.18.

The women employees, to the number of several hundreds, in a big institution have sent a demand to the directorate for an increase of wages by October 1, and intimating that if it was not given there would be trouble. In presenting the ultimatum they announced that if any woman signing it was "victimised" the whole staff would strike. The directors were amazed at the tone of the communication, and have intimated that they will consider it when the language in which it is framed is of a more respectful character.

* * *

Bank clerks, among the worst paid and worst conditioned of clerical workers, are formulating a plan of campaign for extracting more money from the banks which are paying such high dividends. Meetings of the Guild of Bank Clerks are being held every night, and matters are reaching a crisis.

* * *

At a south-coast town the other evening several young airmen and women motor-drivers of the R.A.F. were seen dining together. No harm in that, of course; but if a party of young people start off dinner with cocktails, followed by champagne and liqueurs, then one wonders whether, apart from the expensiveness of such luxury, some restraint should not, even in their own interests, be put upon girls who are entrusted with the driving of motors. No aspersion need be cast on this particular section of the W.A.A.C.s, who are doing such excellent national work, but where stricter supervision is necessary the authorities should not hesitate to enforce it.

* * *

The Allied Shipping Commission has now before it a petition from the Australian and New Zealand Governments asking for the transference of shipping to deal with the colossal amount of foodstuffs in Australasia at present in storage. In New Zealand alone there are millions of carcases of lamb and mutton in cold store awaiting shipment. In Australia the amount of wheat stacked at the railway sides is worth many millions of pounds.

* * *

September 1918. October "

Glasgow Bulletin 28.9.18.

WOMEN'S ARMY WEEK

Round Glasgow With the Recruiting Tramcar

(SPECIAL TO "THE BULLETIN")

The women of the press who accompanied the Women's Recruiting Week party on their tramcar tour on Monday night experienced something of the feelings of a "Cuthbert" in the company of fighting men. This, although we were assured that our "civilian" presence was most important. But contact with so many military members of our sex made us feel that our path of duty lay in the direction of a recruiting office. The sight of women in uniform has this effect on other women, and the fact will have considerable influence during this week's recruiting effort.

Our tramcar—beflagged and manned, appropriately enough, by a woman driver—started in brave style, the way being prepared before us by an advance car-load of "Waacs" and pipers. Naturally our progress excited interest, and along the route much attention and many comments (mostly complimentary) were bestowed upon the "wummen sojers."

Women's Service Fashions

It was to women that we appealed, and women will be women still, even in relation to matters military. From the remarks of the feminine portion of the crowd at the several meeting places it was evident that there was a vast interest in the dress of the different branches of the Women's Army represented.

The khaki of the "Waac" rank and file is well known, but that of the officers of this corps, with their distinctive coloured shoulder straps and badges, is less familiar. So is the peaked uniform cap which distinguishes the members of the youngest of the women's services, the Women's Royal Air Force, or the "Wrafs." There is a large immobile force of these girls in Glasgow engaged on clerical work, and as motor cyclists, in connection with a Royal Air Force depot.

The navy blue uniform and blue velour tricorne hat of a young officer of the Women's Royal Naval Service also attracted attention, but what seemed to excite most curiosity was the resplendent pale blue, gold-braided kit of a "Wraf" official, which may be said to represent the last word in Women's Army fashions.

The Women Officers

A word about these women officers. Just as the Army moulds the man, so the Women's Army moulds the woman, and the type of officer produced is a splendid type of "war girl"—firm, kindly, capable, self-reliant—one to get the best out of girls placed in her charge. Only good material, of course, will produce such results, and the material is selected with care, for its officers will make or mar the Women's Army.

The crowd were interested and sympathetic, and the meetings passed off with few contretemps. One inebriated gentleman mistook us for a party of pacifists, but was speedily convinced of his mistake.

"Hey, gie this lassie a bill!" shouted one patriotic mother to the dispenser of leaflets, thrusting forward a retiring maiden of likely appearance.

"Keep my weans and I'll jine the 'Waacs.'" Thus another woman expressed her dilemma.

The Women's Army recruiting authorities, needless to say, do not ask any woman to leave her "weans" in order to join. Their appeal is to unemployed young women and those whose present employment is not of national importance. Many such women are known to be available. A "Waac" officer told the writer that in recruiting in various parts of the country she came across scores of girls who were engaged neither on war work or any other kind of work. The Women's Army can find a job for every one of these.

682/32 682

Glasgow Bulletin 3.10.18.

Women's Air Force

WORK OF THE "WRAFS" AT A SCOTTISH DEPOT

THE glamour which to the public surrounds the doings of the Royal Air Force has communicated itself in no small degree to the feminine arm of the service, the Women's Royal Air Force—the "Wrafs" for short—and there is much interest in this "infant" of the Women's Army, which in a short time has become an important corps.

At a Scottish air station on the East Coast a large force of "Wrafs" may be seen on duty. Their work seems to include everything connected with aeroplanes short of the actual flying of them, and there are plenty of intrepid spirits among the women who would undertake this last adventure did not the authorities forbid.

HANDLING THE AEROPLANES

The "Wrafs" have a connection with various stages in the career of an aeroplane. In the workshops they are found shaping frames, and in the fabric department they may be seen making sails and stitching canvas coverings. Another highly important duty entrusted to them is the charge of technical stores where the various mechanical parts of an aeroplane repose in classified order. When one of these is wanted the mechanic is told, "Go to Miss So-and-So," which he does, and the part is produced at a moment's notice.

When an aeroplane descends after a flight the "Wrafs" are there to clean it, and if any part of it is in need of repair, again woman-power is called into request. In the repair shops acetylene welding and other highly skilled work is done by women.

Practically the whole of the motor transport work of this air station is undertaken by the "Wrafs." Girls are to be seen driving everything in the way of an automobile, from a light Ford car containing officers to a heavy motor lorry loaded with stores.

The women also run the telephone system of the station, and are employed as shorthand typists and clerkesses in the administrative offices, and as cooks, cleaners, and waitresses at the living quarters.

HOSTEL LIFE

But life in the Women's Royal Air Force is by no means all work and no play. In the organisation of this typical Scottish "Wraf" colony living conditions and recreation facilities have received the most thorough attention.

The women are housed in a large hotel taken over for the purpose. Each bedroom is shared by three girls, individual camp bedsteads and washstands being provided. There are excellent heating arrangements and a plentiful supply of hot water.

Based on the belief that before a girl can do a good day's work she must be well nourished, the menu is generous. A two-course breakfast, a three-course dinner, afternoon tea, and a two-course supper are served daily, and the "Wraf" is among the few favoured mortals who in these days enjoy unlimited jam, and currants in their pudding.

The large and cheerful recreation hall is the scene of many entertainments—"sing-songs," whist drives, impromptu dances, and "guest nights." Amateur theatricals are popular—and reveal surprising talent—and a private cinema has been under consideration. There is also a circulating library for the benefit of the bookworms who are inevitable in a feminine community. Bathing, hockey, golf, and other sports are encouraged, and cases of illness—which are very few—receive the promptest medical attention.

THE "LIGHT BLUES"

With natural feminine vanity the Women's Royal Air Force delights in its picturesque uniform. All ranks wear light blue coats and skirts and close-fitting blue hats. The rank and file—who, by the way, are known as "members," not as "privates"—have blouses of natural shantung and black ties. Their hat badge is red on black, and on their sleeves are "wings" sewn in red silk. The non-commissioned officers are distinguished by their white silk blouses and white and black badges, and the commissioned officers by their gilt braid and buttons.

An excellent type of young womanhood has been attracted to the Women's Royal Air Force. If the "Who's Who" of the rank and file were known it would surprise some girls who are hanging back because they are not sure that to join the Women's Army is the right thing to do from the social point of view. At more than one Scottish air depot daughters of most highly placed officers of the Royal Air Force are working as plain "members" in the women's section. Many of the recruits are but a woman officer assured the writer that this type of girl has in almost every case made good. And her lack of experience is no handicap, as arrangements are made to train her where necessary.

Enquiries as to service in the Women's Royal Air Force—in which there are many immediate openings, especially in the mobile section—may be made at the headquarters, Adelphi Hotel, Glasgow.

ANSWER TO CORRESPONDENT

KIT (Paisley).—The head offices of the Scottish Branch British Red Cross Society are at 86 St Vincent Street, Glasgow.

---

n & Company, Limited, and Published at 65 Buch

Glasgow Bulletin 1918. October. 682.

4. 10. 18

682/33

EXPERT W.R.A.F.'s AT A SCOTTISH CAMP.—Members of the Women's Royal Air Force stitching and fixing a cover on the body of an aeroplane at Turnberry.

THE DAILY WORK DONE BY THE WOMEN OF THE ROYAL AIR FORCE TO HELP ON AERIAL WARFARE

Scenes of the "Wrafs," introduced, so to speak, by the sewing staff above, were secured at a Scottish aerodrome, where many and varied tasks are performed by these girls. Obviously it is interesting work, owing seem to be very pleasant. Transport (1) appears (most jovial; (2) shows how well off the officers' mess is in respect of waiting; (3) Miss Main, Acting Administrator, and Miss Pannier, Acting carbon; (4) the dope shop (the cloth of the wings, etc., is treated with a waterproofing substance); (5) doping again; girls at work on a fuselage; one is tracing with compasses the distinguishing mark to be painted on; (6) the method of fastening wings: sewing through and through in pairs.—"Bulletin" Photos.

EXPERT W.R.A.F.'s AT A SCOTTISH CAMP.—Members of the Women's Royal Air Force stitching and fixing a cover on the body of an aeroplane at Turnberry.

THE DAILY WORK DONE BY THE WOMEN OF THE ROYAL AIR FORCE TO HELP ON AERIAL WARFARE

Pictures of the "Wrafs," introduced, so to speak, by the sewing maid above, were secured at a Scottish aerodrome, where many and varied tasks are performed by these girls. Obviously it is interesting work, service seem to be very pleasant. Transport (1) appears almost jovial; (2) shows how well off the officers' mess is in respect of waiting; (3) Miss Main, Acting Administrator, and Miss Panniers, Acting Quarters; (4) the dope shop (the cloth of the wings, etc, is treated with a waterproofing substance); (5) doping again; girls at work on a fuselage; one is tracing with compasses the distinguishing mark to be painted on; (6) the method of tailoring wings; sewing through and through in pairs.—"Bulletin" Photos.

Daily Mail 15-1-18

WOMEN'S RECRUITING.

LADY MACKWORTH IN CONTROL.

"I am glad to be in a position to announce that Lady Mackworth has accepted the appointment of Chief Controller of Women's Recruiting," said Sir Auckland Geddes in the House of Commons yesterday, referring to the development of women's corps for work with the Navy, Army, Air Force, and on the land.

He contradicted emphatically rumours concerning the conditions alleged to exist in certain units of the W.A.A.C. reflecting adversely both upon the members and upon those who are responsible for their welfare, and gave figures for discharges overseas and at home:

	Overseas.	At Home.
Misconduct	2	4
Breach of conditions	0	2
Unsuitable & inefficient.	8	17
Medically unfit	31	67
Compassionate grounds	8	32

"These figures speak for themselves," said Sir Auckland Geddes.

Lady Mackworth, who is Lord Rhondda's daughter, began her business career by taking charge of some of her father's interests during his absence in America. She is now director of 27 companies.

Daily News 12.10.18.

WOMEN'S NATIONAL SERVICE.

Our Lobby Correspondent writes that Sir Auckland Geddes has decided to dispense with the Women's National Service Department. This department has been under the direction of Viscountess Rhondda, formerly Lady Mackworth. It is felt that the necessary work is being done by so many other organisations that the Women's National Service Department has now fulfilled its functions.

Daily Chronicle 12.10.18 12.10.18.

A "PENGUIN" AGITATOR.

TROUBLE IN A STORE OVER THE QUESTION OF PAY.

For some time there has been trouble among the 700 "Penguins" at a Royal Air Force store in outer London on the question of pay, and yesterday one of them, Dorcas Gallant, a storewoman, whose home is in Grange-road, Bermondsey, was charged with conduct likely to delay essential war work.

Defendant was a member of a deputation to the Air Ministry, and afterwards it was alleged that she stood on a form in the canteen and told the girls that their leader had "let them down," but if they would meet in the canteen on Saturday morning she would see they got what had been promised to them. She concluded: "Now, girls, will you stand by me?" and the girls shouted "Yes!"

All the witnesses said it was understood, from what had happened before, that a strike was intended, and one stated that subsequently she said to defendant, "It's very unfair to do this while our boys are at the front." Defendant replied, "It's not a living wage, and it's nothing to do with the boys at the front."

Defendant said that when she told the girls to meet her in the canteen she did not intend them to do so in Army time, but before starting work, and she had no intention of agitating for a strike.

In fining defendant £5 the magistrate gave a general warning that if any more girls from these stores were convicted of a similar offence they would be sent to prison.

82
4

October 1918.

Glasgow Bulletin 30.10.18.

682

682/35

W.R.A.F.'S AT A SCOTTISH AERODROME ON THE EAST COAST

The Women's Royal Air Force plays no small or unimportant part in maintaining our supremacy in the air, and apart from the patriotic grounds on which it should appeal to Scottish women, it offers favourable working conditions and good wages, and more recruits are still wanted. Our pictures, taken at a Scottish aerodrome, show:—1. In a W.R.A.F. hostel bedroom—getting ready to start the day's work. 2. Workers in the sail loft tacking and stitching canvas. 3. W.R.A.F.'s hockey teams. 4. Painting and "doping" plane wings. 5. A "hullo girl" in the aerodrome telephone exchange. 6. Tea-time in the hostel dining-room.—"Bulletin" Photos.

Daily News 27.1.19

682/36 682

37,000 "WOODEN HUTS."

Work of Women Carpenters in France.

From Our Own Correspondent.

BYFLEET, Saturday.

No fewer than 37,000 spacious huts—divided into 22,000 of the "Nessin" pattern and 15,000 of the "Tarrant" portable hut—were made by the women carpenters who arrived home a few days since after working for two years in the danger zone. These figures have been made public by Mr. W. G. Tarrant, of Byfleet, head of the firm of Government contractors which was responsible for the women taking up the work and crossing the water for their camp near Calais.

These 37,000 huts, if placed end to end, would reach over 300 miles. As an instance of the amount of material used in work of this nature it may be mentioned that one week, when the women were working in full swing, they used nails weighing 50,000lb.

Times. 30.8.19.

Hull Daily Mail 25.1.19

WOMEN WAR WORKERS' COMPLAINT.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—Allow me space regarding the letter of "Land Girl." I myself have been in France serving in the A.S.C. It is quite time something was done for munition girls. I got 24s a week; out of that I had to pay 1s 6d for washing and 12s for food. I received 10 francs a week, and had to pay for my own boots mending, and had to walk in France up to our ankles in mud. I had also to gather sticks to make a fire, or go to work with wet clothes. I myself am discharged "medically unfit," and also broken in health. I have been awarded the silver discharge medal by the War Office. I cannot get any pay, and it is high time someone took the matter up to give us fair play when we had to do our bit, not earning from £3 to £4 a week.—I am, sir, etc.,

ONE OF HIS MAJESTY'S Q.M.A.A.C.

Jan. 24th, 1919.

Times 6.9.19

THE CASE OF THE FORAGE CORPS.

The War Office, having had its attention drawn to our editorial article on Thursday on the treatment of certain members of the Forage Corps attached to the Army Service Corps, is anxious that its position in the matter should be made clear. We can appreciate this anxiety, and we accept the explanation offered to us that a good deal of what has occurred has happened through misunderstandings, and possibly through some mistakes on the part of subordinate officials. We are assured that had representations been addressed personally to Mrs. Athol Stewart at Whitehall-court—such representations should, however, always be sent by the recognised channels—they would have been fully investigated and the results of such investigations duly communicated to those concerned. We think this very likely, for we find it difficult to conceive of the War Office being anxious to victimise the women of so useful a body as the Forage Corps, and we are convinced that Mrs. Athol Stewart must take a pride in seeing that no injustice is done to her women and that they are kept contented and interested in their work.

There are one or two questions of fact that we are also asked to correct. In the first place, the forwarding supervisors now get 44s 6d, instead of 42s, and the assistant forwarding supervisors 37s 6d, instead of 35s, per week. These higher rates came into force a month or two ago, and if any supervisors are not now getting them they should at once make application in the proper quarter. When sick, the women get full pay for two months, subject to the usual deduction for National Insurance. The billeting has been left to the women themselves because on a balance of disadvantages, Mrs. Athol Stewart says, experience has shown that arrangements work out more satisfactorily for them than under any other method. The regulations for transfer and for moving into different grades are, we are informed, excellent, and involve no injustice to the women. We have never doubted it. It has only been when the rules have been overlooked or disregarded that scope for grievances has occurred.

From Mrs. Athol Stewart's own explanation of the re-enrolment scheme in March we are satisfied that a good deal of confusion took place through the way in which the matter was handled, and that while there was no intention of being unjust to any of the women, some have in point of fact been unfairly treated. The re-enrolment, though signed before the first term had expired, was a perfectly legal contract, and its conditions were binding on both parties unless dissolved by mutual agreement. Apparently a number of these re-enrolments were cancelled by due notice being given to members, but in others the notice evidently did not reach the women and they have proceeded on the supposition that the new contract was in force and incurred obligations under it, including the purchase of the new uniform, towards which the 70s grant was promised. That their services were retained shows that misconception of the position was not on their side alone. We are assured now that these cases of misunderstanding will be properly inquired into and that the women concerned will receive all they are entitled to by the conditions of their re-enrolment. We hope, therefore, that those who feel themselves aggrieved will afford the authorities the opportunity of fairly disposing of their claims without being under any apprehension that their position by virtue of these claims will be prejudiced when they are demobilised. It will give us much pleasure to hear that their legitimate demands have been satisfied.

Meanwhile we are glad to be able to make this explanation. In the administration of large bodies of either men or women it is impossible to avoid some mistakes, and injustices occasionally occur with the best will and the most energetic efforts to avoid them. When they happen what should be done is to rectify them as speedily and as cheerfully as possible, instead of trying to cover them up or gloss them over. We think the War Office will see that the members of the Forage Corps get the fullest consideration they deserve. We shall then not have to ask: Why does not Mrs. Athol Stewart look after her girls? On the contrary, we shall be able to assert that of all the directors of the auxiliary women's forces brought into being by the war none was keener for the rights of her girls than Mrs. Stewart.

THE WOMEN'S SERVICES.

A WORD BEFORE DISPERSAL.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TIMES.

Sir,—The article on the Women's Services in The Times, written by "a woman correspondent," is the sanest and most sympathetic which has appeared on the subject. The attacks generally have been aimed at uniformed women themselves, and have shown little appreciation of the manner in which these women desire to wind up their concerns.

But the article of to-day does attempt to show that, though these Service women feel keenly the disbandment of their own particular corps, because of the enjoyable communal life possible only in a Service, the question of demobilization does not rest with them. The terms of service—"one year or the duration of the war"—are elastic. It belongs to the highest authority, outside the Women's Organizations, to decide the date of that "duration."

Those who read papers beyond the mere, often worthless, letters which appear in print, could have gleaned for themselves that at least one of the Services was demobilizing soon. It was officially announced weeks ago that the W.R.N.S. would be disbanded by September 30. From the tone of the letters in various papers, it is quite evident that these civilians do not comprehend what it means to wind up a Service. Surely it would have been unwise to close any organization which did useful work before the Peace Treaty was ratified. And possibly, some of these organizations have spent their energies since that date was assured in perfecting their departure. Necessity caused a more hurried beginning than was desired; experience improved defective machinery; reasonable leisure may surely be granted for the end. Yet has any of the writers of these letters of complaint tried to ascertain himself the date of the disbandment of any one of the Services?

Looked at from an internal point of view, it is the fact that the public desires a hasty funeral for the Women's Services that hurts. We stepped into a breach, and however great our shortcomings have been, and we own that we have had them (mostly due to inexperience), even the public that now decries us has accorded to us unexpected success and often unstinted praise. Then why not give us, as a last token of good will and respect, a dignified departure, with our records complete and our plans so well laid that, should the need arise in the near or far future, we can respond to the call again, this time doubly useful because of our previous experience.

It is not easy, either, for the men and women to replace each other suddenly. As the women's work has finished or their places have been taken by men, the women have been and are returning to civilian life. The public ought to thank us that, instead of flooding the market suddenly with thousands of women requiring posts, events have caused them to be demobilized in sections. Let readers be assured that the stories of women in Services spending their days "joy-riding" and "jazzing" apply to the few isolated instances of the reverse which proves the rule.

I am, Sir,

A MEMBER OF ONE OF THE WOMEN'S SERVICES.

August 28.

682/37 682

Weekly Irish Times 15/2/19

Somerset Guardian 21. 3. 19.

DAILY JOURNAL, MON1

WOMEN WORKERS.

FIGHT AGAINST IGNORANCE AND POVERTY.

A mass meeting under the auspices of the National Federation of Women Workers was held on Saturday night in the Albert Hall, London.

Miss Mary Macarthur, w[illegible] resided, said the meeting was composed [illegible] resentatives of absolutely every wo[illegible] which women were engaged, skilled and unskilled, throughout the United Kingdom. They had been promised a new world, but they did not expect to find it worse than the old, and the distinctions between the wealthy and poor accentuated more than ever. They had been told that the women who had toiled so strenuously during the last four and a half years had become slackers and shirkers, and preferred to receive a dole of 25s a week rather than take up domestic and other work. There was no doubt that al arge number of women were receiving the allowance who were not entitled to it, just as the giving of it would never solve the question of unemployment amongst women who wanted to work, but refused to become the slaves of capitalism. They did not claim their rights without recognising their duties. Mr Lloyd George had said we must a land fit for heroes to live in, but what was wanted was not a new world but a new race. They wanted a new life and the privilege to enjoy it, and they were proclaiming their charter in the fight against ignorance and poverty. When those evils were overcome the land would be fit for heroes and everybody to live in.

Other speakers, including Mr Fred Bramley and Mr Harry Gosling, addressed the meeting, and resolutions in support of "The right to work, the right to live, and the right to leisure," were carried.

Daily News 5/2/19

WOMEN'S CHARTER MEETING.

On the occasion of the opening of Parliament yesterday afternoon a large number of women munition workers paraded the vicinity of the House of Commons, dressed in their overalls and carrying sandwich-boards bearing such inscriptions as "Women want work, not doles," "Domestic Slaves—Nothing Doing," "A 40-hour week." The object in view was to advertise a mass meeting of the National Federation of Women Workers at the Albert Hall on Feb. 15 at which a women's charter is to be submitted, demanding the right to work, a living wage, and a 40-hour week. Miss Mary Macarthur is to preside at the meeting.

HENDON AERODROME LICENCE

WOMEN'S CORPS—BENEFI[illegible] [illegible]ASE.

An Arm[illegible] Council ins[illegible] gives [illegible]ails as to the [illegible]bilisation [illegible] for enrolled Women's [illegible]s—Q.M.A.A.C., V.A.D. (G.S. Section), W[illegible]en's Legion (Motor Drivers), Women's Forage Corps. In a number of cases, it is pointed out, it may be some time before women can be released from their engagements. The following are the benefits which will be payable from Army funds to those whose discharge is dated November 11, 1918, or later, and who are discharged with a good character:

Officials.

(a) All grades of officials of Q.M.A.A.C.; (b) all grades of officials of the V.A.D. (G.S. Section); (c) all grades of commandants of the Women's Legion (Motor Drivers) and superintendents, First and Second Class; (d) all enrolled officials of the Women's Forage Corps, Grades I. and II., including superintendents of women labour: Two months' pay and allowances, to include any pay in lieu of notice.

Members.

(1.) All mobile members enrolled for the duration of the war and all mobile members enrolled for twelve months who have actually been transferred for duty away from their place of enrolment: Twenty-eight days' furlough on full pay and allowances. This amount will include or be taken in aid of any pay in lieu of notice.

(2) All mobile members enrolled for twelve months who have not actually been transferred for duty from their place of enrolment, and all enrolled immobile members: Seven days' furlough on full pay and allowances, to include any pay in lieu of notice.

With regard to out-of-work donation it is laid down that:

Officials will not be eligible for military or civil out-of-work donation benefit. Members enrolled on a mobile basis for the duration of the war will be entitled, if unemployed and unable to obtain suitable employment, to claim military out-of-work donation, payable at the rate of 25s. a week for a maximum period of twenty-six weeks, in the year following discharge. Other members will be entitled to claim out-of-work donation, if unemployed and unable to obtain suitable employment, on the ordinary civilian basis, viz., at the rate of 25s. a week for a maximum period of thirteen weeks during the period November 25, 1918, to May 24, 1919, if they were employed contributors under the National Health Insurance Act prior to August 25, 1918.

WOMEN'S WORK IN THE WAR.

PRESENTATION TO SISTER KATE WORGER.

On Tuesday the members of the Radstock Red Cross Working Party met in the Council Chamber, Victoria buildings, when Mrs. McMurtrie, on behalf of a few of the women of Radstock, presented Sister Kate Worger with a suit-case, containing ebony brush, comb, and mirror, in appreciation of valuable services rendered by her in the East during the great war.

In making the presentation, Mrs. McMurtrie stated that the special object of the meeting that day would be a fitting ending to the Workers' Party. Speaking of women's work during the war, Mrs. McMurtrie said that their latent powers had been brought out by necessity. The part they had taken during the last few years ought to sweep away the idea of women being the "weaker vessels," and give them the right to be considered at all events equal with men folk, and good comrades rather than those needing protection; a far more satisfactory position. When a few months ago affairs in France were looking so terrible, women came to the rescue, and without them and their work they hardly dare think what the result would have been. Munition and railway work, motor driving, agriculture, and last but certainly not least, hospital nursing, had called forth the best that was in women, and when they looked back upon the work done by them during the past four and a half years, the hardships they had endured, which to a large extent it was impossible for them to realise, they were filled with pride and admiration for their own sex. Mrs. McMurtrie then asked Sister Kate Worger to accept a suit-case, with ebony brush, comb, and hand-mirror, from a few women of Radstock, to whose names should be added those of the Countess Waldegrave and Mrs. Heppel, to show their appreciation and admiration of her work as a nurse in the East for the last three years. The names of the subscribers were handed to Sister Worger at the same time, and in asking her acceptance of the gifts, Mrs. McMurtrie expressed the hope that she may long be spared to use them, and that they might remind her of the pride felt by her fellow townswomen in the distinction (Royal Red Cross, 1st Class) conferred upon her for work of nursing in the Eastern theatre of war.

Miss Worger, to whom the presentation came as a great surprise, thanked the subscribers present for their beautiful and useful gifts, saying she was sorry to be unable to thank all personally as she was leaving Radstock at once to resume her duties.

It is hoped that later on a welcome will be given to the Radstock men who have done their share, but this presentation was essentially a women's affair, although to prove the rule of exception two men subscribed toward the present, one because he had met Miss Worger in Mesopotamia.

Miss Worger, Mrs. Worger, of the Hewletts, and several members of her family were then entertained to tea by the Working Party in the Urban Council Chamber which had been tastefully decorated for the occasion.

The suit case presented to Miss Worger, is being exhibited in the window of Mr. H. Hall, Wells hill, during the week-end.

Times · 24 · 9 · 19

Women's Military Corps.

We doubt whether Ministers have any comprehension of the intense indignation which prevails among the public because many thousands of women are still wearing uniform and are in military employ. If they were in any way in touch with popular sentiment, they would make the further discovery that feeling on the subject is strongest among women themselves, some millions of whom now possess the vote. For a long time to come issues of this kind, upon which most women hold strong views, may do much more to determine the way they vote than the fiercer political controversies. In this question of the prolonged retention of the women's military organizations the public instinct is entirely right, and the Government are wholly and very stupidly wrong. Of all the novel expedients produced by the war, that of the putting of women into military uniforms was the most abnormal. When the war ended, the women should have been demobilized first. There is no excuse for the existence of a single women's unit to-day, nearly a year after the Armistice. The public resent the continuance of the women's military units for a very natural reason. There is widespread anxiety about the failure of the Government to reduce expenditure, and—another thing the Government do not realize—anger at the waste visible in all directions is probably keenest among women voters. To male and female electors alike the spectacle of thousands of women still retained in the Army and the Air Force is a daily advertisement of the Government's extravagance. The very natural trend of popular thought is that if the War Office cannot even demobilize their female auxiliaries, it is hopeless to expect the beginning of an era of rigid economy. We know no more striking instance than this of the failure of the Government to maintain contact with the public mind.

The attitude of the public is not in the least inconsistent with the pride and gratitude felt regarding the work of the girls and women who responded to the unusual calls made upon them during the war. The memory of their services will always remain, though it might have been warmer if they had all reverted to civil life at the earliest possible moment. Unhappily resentment is being most unfairly turned against the women themselves. Because in some areas hundreds and even thousands of women in uniform are seen wandering about with little to do, they are occasionally being subjected to unmerited and regrettable insult. It cannot be too clearly understood that the fault does not lie with the members of the women's military corps, many of whom are eager to be demobilized. In large numbers of cases, especially in France, the women are being detained against their will. It is unjust that they should be blamed because they are compelled to abide by the terms of their enlistment. The blame rests entirely on the shoulders of the military authorities and the Government, and in a lesser degree with some of the heads of these corps. The conduct of the controllers of the Royal Air Force, who are detaining thousands of women who might have been released long ago, is conspicuously blameworthy, and is in keeping with the traditions of reckless expenditure already unfortunately created in a corps which in other respects has rendered such incomparable services. The Women's Royal Naval Service has already come to an end, because it was wisely and sensibly directed throughout. If the Government have any regard for their own position, they will see to it that the Women's Royal Air Force is now promptly disbanded. Total abolition is the only course open.

Portsmouth Evening News. 18 · 9.

WOMEN'S WORK.

PORTSMOUTH CONFERENCE ON DEMOBILISATION.

A well attended meeting of members of the W.R.N.S. and Q.M.A.A.C. was held in the Banqueting Room, at the Portsmouth Town Hall, under the auspices of the Portsmouth and District Employment Committee's Women's Sub-Committee.

Miss E. H. Kelly, O.B.E., who presided, referred briefly to the splendid assistance rendered by the women who had joined the Services, and urged them to display the same spirit of patriotism during the readjustment of industrial conditions, in order that the majority might be quickly absorbed into the avenues of employment awaiting them. She stated that the Mayor (Councillor John Timpson, J.P.) was extremely interested in the welfare of the women, and it was only owing to his having been called away on urgent business that he was not present at the conference.

Miss Deane, O.B.E. (Chief Woman Officer, South-Western Division, Ministry of Labour Employment Department) opened by making a forcible effort to direct the attention of the women to the necessity of carrying throughout life, and particularly whilst engaged in industrial work, the spirit of comradeship which had arisen during their tenure with the Services, and which was indispensable to the life of the country. She counselled her hearers not to delay in accepting employment, but to return to normal industrial life as early as possible after being demobilised. It was advisable, she said that they should consider an alternative vocation to that in which they had been employed in the Services, in order that employment may be found at the earliest possible moment. Continuing, Miss Deane emphasised the fact that better prospects and better conditions had been secured for women workers during the past few years, and, by virtue of the Trade Board Acts, minimum rates had been established. Whilst this was beneficial to the workers, a higher standard of efficiency was necessary, and it was therefore incumbent upon all workers to aim at acquiring the fullest knowledge of the trade or occupation in which they were engaged or which they desired to enter.

Domestic Employment.

Touching on domestic employment, Miss Deane appealed to those present to show no reluctance in returning to this field of duty, as without the highest form of home life it would be impossible for the State to progress. She assured the meeting that better wages and conditions and greater opportunities were now established for domestics, and in no sense could the work now be deemed to be drudgery.

Mr. Ernest Bassett, secretary to the committee, and manager of the Employment Exchange, pointed out the possibility of women securing training in lieu of out-of-work donation benefit, and urged them to consider their ability and relationship to the present industrial requirements. He said applications for training could be made at any time. Mr. Bassett further informed the meeting that the members of the Women's Sub-Committee and himself were anxious to assist in the re-settlement in civil life of those about to be demobilised, and they would be prepared, on application to the Employment and Exchange Women's Department, Lake-road, to interview anyone who desired to seek advice. They would also welcome any suggestions as to schemes of training.

Miss Wharton, Divisional Director of the W.R.N.S., moved a vote of thanks to Miss Deane, Miss Kelly as chairman, and the officers and members of the Portsmouth and District Employment Committee. The vote was carried.

682

Northampton Journal 17 · 10 · 19

ARMY PAY CLERKS.

PROBLEM OF FINDING WORK FOR DEMOBILISED GIRLS.

The problem of finding work for the Army Pay Corps girl clerks at present being demobilised is a pressing one, and the Women's Department at the Nottingham Employment Exchange is busily engaged in placing them in local industries. The task is the harder in that most of the girls are unskilled.

Most of the newly-demobilised girls are anxious for clerical work, but as Miss Macarthur, chief of the Women's Department, points out, the chances of clerical work are small, and as clerical experience in Government offices is not necessarily the experience needed in a business office, she advised the girls to take up other work.

Some have become shop assistants, others have gone into wholesale millinery, but the majority are going into the lace trade as pattern girls, jenniers, net folders, packers, &c.

While local employers were quite willing to experiment in the matter, some feared that the girls would leave after a short time. But as the girls are paid a set wage by the employer during the three or four weeks which elapse before they are efficient, this difficulty has been overcome. This set wage during the probation period covers in most cases the cost of the girl's maintenance.

682/38

Times - 23-9-19

WOMEN IN UNIFORM.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TIMES.

Sir,—As an organization which has come into very close touch with the women's services during the war, we should like to try to remove certain misunderstandings which seem to have arisen with regard to the position of "uniformed women." We are in utmost sympathy with those who are anxious for economy with efficiency in the public service, but we must confess we are at issue with your correspondents and others who reproach women for remaining on war service, and who state that "every uniformed woman is a waste."

We should like to point out that women often joined up during the war at considerable self-sacrifice, and we have plenty of evidence of their desire to return to civil life. It is not fair play, therefore, to blame the individual members of a corps for loyally remaining at their work as long as the Government considers their service essential, which will be until next spring at least. The Q.M.A.A.C. in France are largely engaged in cooking and clerical work in connexion with the great salvage operations of the battlefields. As long as recruiting does not produce men to replace them, it is obvious that their services must be retained, unless we are to waste the enormous stores still remaining in France and elsewhere. It must also be remembered that the employment of women in the Army as cooks has resulted in great economy. It would therefore seem unwise to revert to the old and extravagant methods.

In England also, although the process of demobilization can be, and is, much more rapid, there are certain duties which must still be carried out, and it is more expeditious to retain the services of those women whose experience makes them familiar with the work in hand than provide men as substitutes. It is therefore clear that for the present the retention of some women on war service is essential in the best interests of national economy, and the Y.W.C.A. Blue Triangle intends to maintain huts in France and elsewhere as long as there is a definite need for them.

Yours faithfully,
B. M. PORTSMOUTH, National President, Y.W.C.A.

26, George-street, Hanover-square, W.1, Sept. 22.

Times - 24. 9. 19

WOMEN IN UNIFORM.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TIMES.

Sir,—In a recent issue you drew attention to cases where Q.M.A.A.C. were being replaced by civilians at a higher rate of pay. Do you not overlook the fact that, although the civilians' pay may be higher, their cost to the public is considerably less? Civilians—or, as they are known in the Service "civil subordinates"—are paid by the unit or formation employing them, so that, with the payment of their wages, N.H.I. stamps, and an infinitesimal amount of work in the Pay Office the matter is ended. Not so, however, with Q.M.A.A.C. These are attached to camps or units, and are clothed and housed at the public expense. The pay, clothing, and housing necessitate the employment of a large number of officials and forewomen. Assuming that 40 Q.M.A.A.C. personnel are actually working with a unit, the forewomen, assistants, and domestic servants will bring the total to over 50, thereby necessitating the employment of two officials, one of whom could easily do the work. The higher formation usually has an official and clerk for passing on correspondence, &c., while at the Command Headquarters, are to be found a Controller, with six or seven officials to assist her, and innumerable clerks. All this is again multiplied in the branch of the War Office known as "A.G.11."

In addition to all this, there is a large number of Q.M.A.A.C. personnel supernumerary to requirements in various centres, and particularly at Connaught House. These girls are ostensibly on the waiting list for drafts. They have nothing to do. On any morning of the week they can be seen leaning out of the windows at Connaught House, and in the afternoons and evenings they perambulate Oxford-street and Edgware-road in comparatively large numbers, and this at a time when there is a considerable shortage of domestic servants. I am afraid that the higher officials of the Corps are not exactly expediting demobilization. Recently two officials applied to be allowed to resign their appointments, for very excellent reasons, these applications being submitted in writing through the usual channels. After considerable delay a reply was received by telephone, to the effect that on instructions from A.G.11 the two officials could be granted "unpaid indefinite leave." Their resignations could not be accepted, as "A.G.11" was anxious to maintain as many as possible on the strength of the Corps.

Every obstacle was placed in the way of members being demobilized; on a particular occasion a member applied for discharge on account of the serious illness of her mother, and the necessary certificates were produced; approval was delayed for over two months, with the result that the unfortunate girl only reached home in time to see her mother die. Large numbers of girls who are only too anxious to be demobilized are being retained in camps, doing at the most two hours' work per day.

Incidentally, each member on demobilization becomes eligible for out-of-work donation for six months. A suggestion has been made that the Q.M.A.A.C. should not be demobilized until April. This means that for six months beyond that date these women will be a charge on the country.

Yours faithfully,
LIEUT.-COLONEL.

London, W.1, Sept. 25.

Daily Telegraph 25. 10. 19

682

682/39

WOMEN'S KNOWLEDGE

CIVIL SERVICE QUESTIONS.

Our Civil Service Correspondent writes: "Either explain how to make a knitted jumper, or show how you would provide a hot supper for three people at a total cost (excluding cooking and service) of not more than 2s 9d." This was one of the questions set at the record examination—so far as numbers are concerned—held last week by the Civil Service Commissioners, when 5,000 W.A.A.C.'s, W.R.A.F.'s, W.R.N.S.'s, Government typists, and Whitehall flappers met in fierce strife for 200 vacancies as women clerks in the public departments. One irreverent and flippant flapper remarked: "If I have hit his favourite dish I shall appeal to his 'Little Mary' and be all right." But that knitted jumper, known now all over Whitehall! Of course, it has been said by a cruel Press that the Whitehall girl really did spend most of her time knitting, and the question is being asked, Was this a sly, underhand method of the Commissioners—nasty things—to find out?

But all the questions do not bear this domestic, feminine stamp. Indeed, as a matter of fact, very few are what might be called women questions. Listen, you men scoffers, to this: "What is the present relation between England and India? Outline the story of its development." This, indeed, is a terrible jump from the jumper, and it will be asked, Does there exist in modern England any one girl who would answer these two questions? There may be such many-sided girls, but it would be decidedly interesting to find one discussing the government of India to the click of her knitting-needle. But we had better give the rest of the questions on "general knowledge," twelve in all, the candidates being warned that accuracy and order in exposition will have weight in valuation, and that accuracy in fact will not be less important.

What do you know of any four of the following: Darwin, Socrates, George Washington, Marie Antoinette, Tolstoi, Beethoven, John Nicholson, Lister, Michelangelo, Martin Luther, St. Francis of Assisi?

What events led to England's declaration of war against Germany?

Describe the position and show the importance of the Suez and the Panama Canals.

What is the use of possessing a vote?

Sum up the advantages and drawbacks of communal kitchens.

What is the Civil Service, and what are its chief functions? How are its members appointed? What are your reasons for wishing to become a permanent Civil Servant?

Write a short sketch of any one of the more important characters in Shakespeare's plays.

Give some of the causes of the general rise of prices since 1915.

Write short notes on three of the following: (a) The Income-tax; (b) Free Trade; (c) the Coal Industry Commission; (d) Conscription; (e) the League of Nations; (f) the Ministry of Health; (g) Bolshevism.

What are the best means of checking the spread of consumption?

The subjects in English composition were (one of which was to be selected):

Discuss the causes of the high price of clothing at the present time.

Write a letter to a friend comparing life in a woman's hostel with life in lodgings. Sign the letter with a fictitious name.

What woman character in fiction do you admire most? Describe her and the part she plays.

TRAIN PUZZLES.

The arithmetic paper was comparatively easy. Perhaps the Civil Service Commissioners were indulgent to woman's well-known weakness on this subject. The first question was merely an addition of columns £ s d. In Section II. the questions were a little more difficult, of which the two following are typical examples:

In the time-table the 11.30 a.m. train from Paddington is timed to reach Exeter at 2.45 p.m., a non-stop journey of 174 miles. How many minutes would the journey take if the train was punctual? What would be the average speed of the train in miles an hour to the nearest tenth of a mile an hour? On a certain day the train started punctually, and travelled at this average speed as far as Taunton (143 miles from Paddington), where it was stopped for twenty minutes. It then completed the journey at an average speed of sixty miles an hour. How many minutes late was it at Exeter.

The volume of water in a tank, measured in cubic feet, is found by multiplying the area of the base of the tank measured in square feet by the depth of water measured in feet. Find, to the nearest tenth of an inch, how much the level of the water in a tank whose base measures 72 square feet will fall when 100 gallons are drawn off. [A cubic foot=6.23 gallons.]

In addition, there was a précis paper on a story from the French—"The Finding of Mademoiselle Perle"—in which it was requested that attention should be paid to neatness, handwriting, spelling, grammar, punctuation, and style.

Owing to the large number of candidates impossible for the Commissioners to acco them all on one day, so another examinatio be held on Friday, though the Albert Ha People's Palace, Mile-end-road; the Queen's Hall, Harrow-road; the Medical Examination and the Civil Service Commission were utilised. the examination on Friday the questions on gen knowledge were:

What do you know of any four of the following: Dant Wilberforce, Alexander the Great, Goethe, Newton, Joh Hampden, George Eliot, Machiavelli, Wiclif, General Botha, Voltaire?

Give, with explanations, five of the principal conditions of the Peace Treaty with Germany.

How and when did Canada and South Africa become parts of the British Empire?

What are our principal sources of supply of sugar, tea, and coffee? Could any of these be produced at home? Give reasons.

Write brief notes on the following: Parliament, Cabinet, Party System.

How do you account for the existing shortage of houses?

Describe the functions of the Government Departmen in which you have been employed, and point out an defects which you may have observed in its methods.

Write a short sketch of any one of the famous women either of the Old Testament or of English history.

Mention some of the ways in which the State might reduce its expenditure with advantage.

Write short notes on three of the following: (a) The Budget, (b) Profiteering, (c) the Ministry of Transport, (d) Liquor-trade Prohibition, (e) Co-operative Societies, (f) Unemployment Donations, (g) Home Rule.

What are the benefits of fresh air?

Either—(a) Sum up the advantages and drawbacks of uniforms for women; or (b) Suggest any labour-saving improvements which might be introduced into the houses of the future.

THE PEACE TREATY.

Some lucky hits were made. We have heard of one of the candidates, at the evening class which she attended, being specially coached on the principal conditions of the Peace Treaty with Germany, and naturally she selected this question. We wonder how many men—so fleeting is memory—could answer this question. I asked the editor of a well-known scholastic paper this week, and he confessed it was too much for him. The subjects of English composition, time allowed one and a half hour, were:

Give some account of the steps which have been taken, since the outbreak of the war, to keep down the cost of food to the consumer, and discuss their effect.

Write a letter to a friend giving your views as to the kinds of work (other than domestic work) for which women are best suited. Sign the letter with a fictitious name.

Give an account of some modern book of light fiction. Have you met counterparts of any of the characters in the book amongst your acquaintances?

The arithmetic questions were not more difficult than those set on Thursday. Two typical examples were:

To go from a place A to another place B a man can either walk the whole distance of 10 miles or go part of the way by train. In the latter case he has to walk ¾ mile to the station at one end and 1½ mile from the station at the other. If the train takes 12 minutes, and he walks 3½ miles an hour, find to the nearest minute how much time he can save by going by train.

If the train leaves A at 11.17 a.m., can he reach B by noon?

A field has four sides, which are 287, 255, 220, 250 yards long. What is the cost of putting a fence round the field at 3s 6d a yard?

The area of this field is equal to half the product of the lengths of the diagonals. If the diagonals are 388 and 326 yards long, find the area to the nearest tenth of an acre.

In the notice printed at the back of the time-table candidates were required, before proceeding to their seats, to lay aside "their hats, umbrellas, and any books, papers, or other appliances," obviously to prevent irregular and surreptitious assistance from outside sources. It would be hard on the girls if vanity bags were included in the term "appliances," though we have a suspicion that in these modern days that would be the most correct description of their primary use. The Civil Service Commission were reluctant to shed much light on this delicate subject, but replied that a large bag or satchel would not be permitted. And yet, if ever there was an occasion when a girl needed the refreshing assistance of the secrets of her vanity bag, it was in the fierce scrum of a competitive Civil Service examination.

FUTURE OF THE W.A.A.C.s.

A REPLY TO MR. JOHN MURRAY, M.P.

(BY ONE OF THEM).

Evening Standard 27.9.

68

After the many criticisms to which women who have not hastened out of uniform have been submitted, it is somewhat of a relief to know that we still have the sympathy of at least one member of Parliament, Mr. John Murray. He has seen and realised that just as the country has profited by women's work, so the women themselves have profited and have gained, as he says, a knowledge of discipline and a standard of their work, which only an organisation similar to the Q.M.A.A.C. could teach them.

In one point, however, we differ from him. The organisation of these girls could not have thriven as well under the auspices of some philanthropic institution. The only thing that produced the esprit de corps of the W.A.A.C.s the willingness to work, the steadiness, reliability, and voluntary submision to discipline was the fact that they were inspired by an ideal of helping their country when it was in danger—like everyone else. They were, no doubt, assisted by the stimulation of communal life and by the definite nature of their work—though I have known cases where W.A.A.C.s of the domestic category have worked all day and most of the night for a week on end—but the mainspring of their reliability and excellence was their ideal of "helping to win the War."

Not the Same Conditions.

Now I question very much if the girls are anxious to remain in organised bodies, living together with very little privacy and under any chance administration that is not, and cannot be, controlled by the War Office or any State body; for one must remember that there were not only twenties or thirties, but thousands of girls in the Q.M.A.A.C., all subject to precisely the same form of military discipline and all receiving the same pay and wearing the same uniform.

The suggestion that the Administrators of the Corps should try to carry out the same kind of organisation is a good one as far as it goes. But it cannot entirely meet the case because the conditions are bound to vary according to locality, amount of initial capital, etc. Therefore dissimilarity rather than similarity of conditions will be fostered and the W.A.A.C.s, perhaps, split up into small sections without cohesion. Moreover although the Administrators were undoubtedly in love with their work, it is not certain that they would enjoy similar work under very different conditions. Discipline would be much more difficult to maintain without the backbone and support of Army Council instructions! And again, the demand for such organisations is not indefinite.

Working for an Ideal.

Perhaps our study of psychology leads us astray. We are apt to think that, because the girls have been under discipline, lived a communal life worked hard and been happy, they therefore want to go on doing these things for the rest of their lives. A deeper insight will make us realise that these were merely external signs of the real reasons for their happiness, which were two: Firstly, they were working for an ideal; secondly they attained the status, almost unconsciously, but nevertheless entirely by their own efforts, of self-respecting individuals, able to control their own lives (within certain limits) at all events, subject only to rules and regulatons to which they chose to submit.

Many of these girls, before they joined up, had had no such opportunity. Sometimes they had only been one of a large family at home at the beck and call of their mother or their small brothers and sisters all day. Sometimes they had been in private service, perhaps on duty from 7 a.m. till late at night, perhaps only getting into the fresh air once or twice a week.

These girls, and thousands like them, were transformed in physique and in brain after their time in the corps. But the transformation was due, partly certainly to the fact that they were in the fresh air every day instead of twice a week, partly to the regularity of their lives, but mainly to the state of mind of being their own mistresses, responsiible for their own particular job, entirely free to dispose of their own time w' n off duty.

That is, surely, the key to the whole present position. Orgonisations of large numbers, similar to the W.A.A.C.s, will not solve it. There is no big demand in any sphere of work whatever except domestic service. Moeover, that is what the girls understand and can do. But we must realise that they have experienced the stimulating effect of being mentally free, and at the same time sensibly controlled—and there is nothing more stimulatng—and we must adapt ourselves to their new mental attitude.

Household Service.

A scheme has been on foot for the past six months, under the auspices of the Women's Legion, for assisting the "Service Women." The legion foresaw the organisation of the W.A.A.C.s when it provided the first batch of Army cooks as early as 1916. It has also foreseen the difficulties of the girls on demobilisation.

The scheme provides that every girl who goes into Household Service as a Legionary shall have definite conditions of service. These are very simple. She must have two hours off every day, a half-day once a week, a whole day once a month, and part of every alternate Sunday. During her time off, she is absolutely her own mistress. A minimum wage is fixed.

Realising that domestic service differs from factory work or other daily occupation, the Legion scheme is one for "living in," and the girls do realise that the certainty of being housed and fed is a great advantage nowadays. The main value of the Legion lies in the fact that its members may wear their uniform (W.A.A.C. or whatever it may be) when off duty, and they will be, in the near future provided with club rooms where they may meet their friends and spend their hours of recreation. The scheme has been running now for six months and the proof that it is efficacious lies in the fact that hundreds of letters of appreciation have been received from both employers and workers.

A Good Foundation.

We hardly think that more training is necessary for these girls. They have the mental foundation, as it were, on which everything else can be built up. Employers are quite willing to take them with the experience they have had, and they have proved themselves to be adaptable and quick learners.

They have been content in their work, because they still preserve the high standards they have learnt, and also because they feel the Legion is behind them. Many of them have said that they do not want to accept the unemployment pay because it is bad for the country, which shows a steady patriotism that might well be emulated by others. They are determined, and rightly, not to go back to domestic service under the old conditions. But, given good conditions and some organisation to support and assist them, they are quite content. That is our considered opinion, after six months of experience.

682

Morning Post
15.10.19

DISPLACED WOMEN LABOUR.

The Women's Industrial League, which has been investigating the conditions of women's employment throughout the country, states that in many large industrial centres, the question of women's unemployment is a serious problem, and is likely to become more acute in the near future.

"Thousands of women workers," a circular issued by the League remarks, "have been turned out of well-paid occupations at the dictation of reactionaries, and this action has preceded the Restoration of Pre-War Practices Act, which comes into force this week. The operation of this Act means that many more thousands of women may find themselves unemployed, while, added to these, will be the women from the disbanded State services, such as the W.A.A.C.S., W.R.E.N.S., W.R.A.F.S., and Land Army, as well as women from the much abused class of worker, known as the "temporary clerk," in Government offices.

"What is to become of all these women workers unless the Government shoulder their responsibility, and find them work. The method of displacing one class of worker to place another is illogical and absurd, while its effect must be to cause a considerable amount of discontent."

Spectator 22.11.19.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

[Letters of the length of one of our leading paragraphs are often more read, and therefore more effective, than those which fill treble the space.]

WOMEN'S WORK.

[To the Editor of the "Spectator."]

Sir,—I enclose herewith my cheque for £20 towards the fund you propose raising at Mrs. Kinnell's suggestion in aid of the London Society for Women's Service. I cannot imagine a more deserving cause than that of the women who, as men return from the war, are becoming unemployed after doing the nation's work in the days of our need and stress. As a small employer of labour it gives me pleasure to pay my tribute to the whole-hearted devotion that women gave to the work they were so unexpectedly called upon to do. In common with others, I have during the last few years watched and registered the relative value of male and female labour, and it occurs to me that it may be desirable to utilize the experience gained in this period in coming to an equitable agreement of the rate of their wages as compared with those given to men. My experience has shown me that exceptional women are equal to good men, but that the majority are less productive, and I have in my field gauged this productiveness as low as two to one, although three to two may be a fair average valuation. In suggesting the utilization of such experience I assume, of course, that the hope you express in your leading article will be realized, and that the Trade Unions will quickly remove the stigma resting on them in the suggestion that they are an unconditional bar to the employment of women in any of the trades they control. My experience teaches me that female labour is a most desirable alloy to male labou , and that, even if their capacity is at times inferior, their devot n to and love of their task can only act as a desirable stimulus to men and help towards efficiency.—I am, Sir, &c., W. Heinemann.

20-21 Bedford Street, W.C. 2.

[We have pleasure in acknowledging also the receipt of a cheque for £10 from Mr. G. G. Playfair, and a cheque for £1 from Mrs. Gertrude A. Traill, for the Women's Service Bureau, the objects of which were described by Mrs. Kinnell in last week's Spectator. Moreover, the London Society for Women's Service gratefully acknowledges the following donations to the fund:—Edward F. Balwin, Esq., £4 4s.; "Orielensis," £1; Miss E. M. Hall, £1; Miss L. Yates, £1 1s.; Miss Mackie, £2; Mrs. H. S. Gladstone, £1 1s.; Colonel C. V. Turner, £5 5s.; Miss D. Webb, £5; Messrs. Hillabys, Ltd., £5; Mr. and Mrs. H. H. Worthington, £50.—Ed. Spectator.]

Times Dec 17. '19.

682/41

WOMEN'S LEGION.

PLANS FOR PERMANENT STATUS.

The demobilization of the motor section of the Women's Legion and the first occasion on which its Reserve has been called up (during the railway strike) were celebrated by a gathering held at the invitation of the president, Lady Londonderry, at Londonderry House, Park-lane, yesterday. General Sir John Cowans (the former Q.M.G.) and his successor, Lieutenant-General Sir Travers Clarke, sat at tea with Lord Londonderry, Lady Londonderry, Lady Maureen Stewart, Miss Christobel Ellis (commandant of the motor section), and Lady Grey.

At the other tables were the members of the Legion in service dress. Those who had helped during the railway strike had been given silver match-boxes by the commandant of the section, with the inscription "W.L. reserve. Special Duty, Sept., 1919—Oct."

Lady Londonderry paid a tribute to the foresight and resolution of Sir John Cowans in deciding to give the women a chance to help in feeding the Army; to the help given by Sir Travers Clarke and the staff of the Q.M.G.'s Department; and to the services of Miss Ellis, Miss Ward and other members of the staff. They were, she said, busy with plans for the future of the Reserve, which it was hoped might come to have a definite status.

Lady Londonderry read the following message from Mr. Winston Churchill:—"I wish very much that the heavy pressure of my work had allowed me to be with you to-night and to meet in person the representatives of the Women's Legion, to whom the country owes so large a debt of gratitude for their work during the war. For many years the old-fashioned idea that the capabilities of women were limited to the domestic sphere had been losing ground; but, even so, there are few who would not have been incredulous if, at the outbreak of war, the picture of the part that women would come to play in it before the end had been suddenly unrolled before them. There is hardly a form of activity, short of actual fighting, in which women did not develop special gifts and energies; and the share which they took in the achievement of victory can scarcely be put too high. You will, I know, be anxious to hear something of the future, but here I am afraid that I cannot at present hold out any definite prospect. Until final decisions can be reached as to the numbers of the permanent Army and Territorial Force nothing can be settled. But I think I am safe in saying that it is generally agreed that the splendid spirit of patriotism and loyalty and the high standard of efficiency which the Women's Corps have displayed are an asset of national value, and that in some form or other the organization which has come into being should be perpetuated."

This message, Lady Londonderry added, was most encouraging. Whereas in the past they were an unknown quantity, now they were known as "Legion," and she felt confident that they would not be overlooked. Miss Ellis and she had not forgotten the need of a club, and she hoped to be able to do something for them in the near future. It might be perhaps a club not only for the Women's Legion, but a service club which would eventually be run by the members themselves.

Sir Travers Clarke thanked the motor drivers on behalf of the War Office, speaking of the efficient assistance given by the motor section of the Legion to a harassed Q.M.G. in maintaining the transport of a great Army.

Sir John Cowans said that in the early days of the war the greatest need of the Army was trained cooks. Lady Londonderry started the Women's Legion by providing 500 cooks in 1915 and later between 80,000 and 100,000 men were trained for the Army camp kitchens. These cooks were the first verse of the first chapter of the genesis of the Women's Legion and the women's services. The organization of cooks started the idea of the Q.M.A.A.C. They had a tremendous fight with the War Office over the cooks. They were such a success that the Adjutant-General wanted to control them, but he (then Q.M.G.) would not give them up.

Times. Nov 12. '19.

W.R.A.F. INQUIRY FINDINGS.

GRAVE ACCUSATIONS REFUTED.

NO EVIDENCE OF CAMP IMMORALITY.

The inquiry by a Select Committee of the House of Lords into the dismissal of Miss Violet Douglas-Pennant from the Women's Royal Air Force was ended yesterday, Lord Wrenbury presiding. The last sitting of the Committee was on October 31.

Miss Violet Douglas-Pennant was represented by Mr. J. A. Hawke, K.C., Mr. Stuart Bevan, K.C., and Mr. J. N. Buchanan (solicitors, Messrs. Coward and Hawksley, Sons, and Chance); the Air Ministry by the Attorney-General, Mr. Rigby Swift, K.C., and Mr. G. A. Branson (solicitor, the Treasury Solicitor); General Sir W. S. Brancker by Sir Charles Russell, solicitor; Lieutenant-Colonel Bersey by Mr. Patrick Hastings and Mr. Thomas Carthew (solicitors, Messrs. Simmons and Simmons); Mr. S. Janson by Mr. Curtis Bennett, K.C., and Mr. Tristram Beresford (solicitors, Messrs. Kenneth Brown and Co.); Miss Gwenda M. Glubb by Mr. Harold Morris (solicitors, Messrs. Hyde, Mahon, and Co.); and Mrs. Beatty by Mr. J. H. Evans-Jackson (solicitor, Mr. Ames). Mr. Leonard appeared in person. Mr. Tristram Beresford, on the instructions of Messrs. Ashley, Tee, and Sons, held a watching brief for Major D. G. Nairn, and Mr. Cockburn also watched the case. Mr. Barrington Ward, K.C., with Mr. Roland Thomas, appeared for Lady Rhondda.

Mr. Barrington Ward, upon the Committee entering the room, said that he desired at once to call Lady Rhondda as a witness on her own behalf.

Lady Rhondda then entered the witness chair, and said that in January, 1918, she accepted the position of Chief Controller of Women's Recruiting at the Ministry of National Service, which at that time had complete control of recruiting both of women and men. Lady Rhondda recalled two meetings with Miss Douglas-Pennant during the time Miss Douglas-Pennant was Commandant, and said that she had read the evidence given by Miss Douglas-Pennant. "My recollection does not exactly tally with Miss Douglas-Pennant's," added Lady Rhondda, who said that her recollection was that both interviews took place on her initiative.

On the first occasion they had lunch at Miss Douglas-Pennant's club and discussed general matters. She asked to see Miss Douglas-Pennant because she was anxiosu to discuss a scheme just being mooted in regard to a Common Selection Board for the Women's Corps.

On August 5, 1918, a question was asked by Sir Willoughby Dickinson and answered by the Chancellor of the Exchequer?—Yes. Sir Auckland Geddes asked me to prepare a report dealing with women in camps generally.

Lady Rhondda said that forthwith she began the compilation of her report. About August 13 Miss Strachie, the head of the Women's Service Bureau, a voluntary bureau which had done very good work placing women in various branches, came to see her. Miss Strachie came to the witness because she was very much upset and her Committee felt so worried that they did not feel justified in recruiting further officers. The witness knew before that that the position was bad, and she thought she would take some action, and went to see Sir Auckland Geddes. She saw Dame Katharine Furse before she went to see Lord Weir.

She tried to see Mrs. Leech, the head of another corps, but she was away, and she only saw Dame Katharine. Her report of August 22 dealt with about nine different corps, but rather specially with the affairs of the W.R.A.F. She said to Sir Auckland Geddes that she was worried about the position there. Her report was honestly prepared on facts in the course of her duty. She had no animus against Miss Douglas-Pennant, and no desire to hurt her feelings. When Lord Weir had received Sir Auckland Geddes's communication, the witness went on the Monday morning with Miss Strachie to Lord Weir, who said to them that he had already made up his mind to dismiss Miss Douglas-Pennant, and in the rest of the interview they did not discuss that at all.

They discussed, however, the best way to get the drafts in some state of organization. Miss Douglas-Pennant was dismissed on the 28th. The witness went to see General Brancker after she had seen Lord Weir with reference to the disorganization.

Have you ever been a party or privy to any intrigue or anything of that kind against Miss Douglas-Pennant?—No.

Either to out her from her office or do her any other injury?—No.

What has animated you throughout?—Simply that it was my business to get the thing right.

Have you ever engaged in any conspiracy?—No.

"Have you always acted in a perfectly straightforward manner towards Miss Douglas-Pennant?" asked counsel. "Yes, perfectly straightforward," replied Lady Rhondda, who added, with indignation, "I object to the insinuation."

LORD WRENBURY referred to one of counsel's questions, remarking. "The W.R.A.F. appears to have sprung into existence on the 1st of April." Lady Rhondda.—I really never could understand why they chose that date. (Laughter.)

Lady Rhondda, replying to questions by Mr. Hawke, said that she had not the least idea whether in her interview with him Lord Weir used the word "dismissal" in connexion with Miss Douglas-Pennant. Miss Douglas-Pennant told her she had been "shot out."

Asked whether she did not make inquiries of Miss Douglas-Pennant in reference to her report, Lady Rhondda said that she felt something must be done about the W.R.A.F., and she went to see Sir Auckland Geddes, who told her to see Lord Weir. "I could not have thought of going to see Miss Douglas-Pennant while I was waiting to see Lord Weir, so the possibility never occurred to me," replied Lady Rhondda.

In reply to Mr. Barrington-Ward, the witness described the qualifications of Miss Pratt and Miss Andrew, and said that she rightly attached importance to what those ladies reported.

The CHAIRMAN asked if anyone wanted to address the Committee. An ex-sergeant-major at the back of the hall got no farther than "My Lord."

LORD STANHOPE ON HURST PARK.

The Committee adjourned for a few minutes, and on their return the CHAIRMAN announced that before the matter was closed the Committee thought it right that he should read two letters received this morning. The first was from Lord Stanhope, as follows:—

"I intend fully to withdraw and to apologize in the House for my statement in regard to Wormwood-Scrubs, but I shall be unable to withdraw my statement in regard to the condition of affairs at Hurst Park. Had the Committee seen fit itself to call Mrs. Kitto she would have substantiated my statements. I have now seen Mrs. Kitto and also three other witnesses who worked at Hurst Park, who corroborate and amplify Mrs. Kitto's evidence. I think the Committee should know this before they conclude their last public sitting in case they should wish to call me. As you know, I gave an undertaking to the Committee to do nothing until its report had been made public. I understood this only to refer to my action in the House of Lords, and that it would not preclude me from sending a letter of apology, &c., to the solicitors representing Miss Glubb and Colonel Janson, but before doing so I shall be glad to know if the Committee has any objection."

The CHAIRMAN.—The Committee see no objection with regard to the latter part of that letter to Lord Stanhope sending such a letter if he thinks proper.

A second letter read by the CHAIRMAN was from Stanley Fuller, dated from 52, Recreation-grove, Holbeck, Leeds. It ran as follows:—

"I wish to make known to you some circumstances connected with the case under investigation which, after following the Press reports, I feel to be more important than any evidence already heard by you. My duties as sergeant-major in charge of the equipping of women's hostels at Hurst Park brought me nightly into touch with the W.R.A.F. I have many unique opportunities of examining for my own opinion what I shall call the perpetuation of administrative irregularity to the detriment of the good name of the depôt. I had never met the lady chiefly concerned in the case, but in order to assist in giving the Committee some information, and to get at the truth, I have offered myself as a matter of honour and duty to those who are at present unable to produce ample facts. I have carefully weighed the probable results of my action, but remain convinced of its necessity. I hold no personal animosity against my late officer commanding, and would as gladly meet his counsel as that of the opposite side. Trusting some opportunity may be accorded me."

The CHAIRMAN asked if any parties desired to take further action.

After lengthy consultation with Miss Douglas-Pennant, Mr. Hawke asked the Committee to call ex-Sergeant-Major Fuller.

The CHAIRMAN.—The Committee certainly shall not call him. It is for you to say.—I don't know whether he will support my case or not.

The CHAIRMAN.—Neither do I. (Laughter.) You have had weeks and weeks to prepare, and we have offered you great indulgences, and now we offer you a still greater indulgence.

Mr. Hawke requested leave to take proofs of evidence of ex-Sergeant-Major Fuller and Mrs. Kitto.

The CHAIRMAN assented, but only on condition that Miss Douglas-Pennant would personally bear the whole of the subsequent costs of the inquiry for all parties from that moment. This condition was refused.

IMMEDIATE CONCLUSIONS.

The CHAIRMAN.—In the circumstances I have simply to state that the Committee will report to the House. I desire, however, just to make this statement. The Committee will report in due course. We are going, however, to take the unusual step of announcing at once some of our conclusions. Grave accusations have been hanging for months over the heads of several persons. They are entitled to have our conclusions upon them at the earliest possible moment. We therefore state as follows:—

We find the accusation of immorality between Colonel Janson and Miss Glubb to be untrue.

We find the accusation of general immorality at Hurst Park Camp to be entirely unsupported by any evidence; further, there has come before us no evidence of immorality at other W.R.A.F. camps.

We find the accusation that Colonel Bersey desired that immorality should continue at Hurst Park Camp to be untrue.

We find the accusation that General Livingstone and Colonel Bersey desired by improper means to allow to continue a state of things under which night passes were given to young girls by, among other persons, Colonel Janson, under which they were taken to London in Government cars and brought back, often drunk, in the early hours of the morning, and the accusation that such a state of things ever existed, to be supported by no evidence whatever.

LORD WRENBURY added:—"All the above are the unanimous findings of every member of the Committee. We shall report not only upon the question as to whether Miss Douglas-Pennant was rightly suspended, but also upon all the accusations made when our conclusions and our reasons on the whole case are reported."

The Committee adjourned for report.

Times 8. 11. '19 682.

STILL NEARLY 400,000 CIVIL SERVANTS.

12,000 WOMEN GONE IN TWO MONTHS.

Official figures contained in two Parliamentary papers issued yesterday [Cmd. 379 and 380] show that since the Prime Minister wrote directing heads of Government Departments to reduce their staffs there has been an appreciable reduction in some offices, but the total saving does not amount to 10,000 in two months—a percentage of less than 2½.

As was recorded in The Times of September 22, few offices reduced their staffs during July, and in that month the number of Civil servants actually increased by 2,267 to a grand total of 409,561. The changes during the three months July, August, and September are shown in the following table:—

—	Men.	Women.	Total.	Change.
Aug. 1 ..	242,247	167,314	409,561	+ 2,267
Sept. 1 ..	244,872	163,162	408,034	— 1,527
Oct. 1 ..	244,741	155,211	399,952	— 8,082

It will be seen that, although during August and September there was a net reduction of 9,609 in the staff, the number of men employed increased by nearly 2,500. The female staff was reduced by more than 12,000.

The Labour Ministry contributes towards the reduction about 3,500 and the Ministry of Munitions nearly 4,000, but each of these Departments still retains a staff of nearly 22,000 persons. The War Office, which had a staff of 13,277 on August 1, succeeded in reducing it by only 420 during that month, but improved its record in September, when 1,359 employees were discharged. The Pensions Ministry, which added more than 1,000 to its staff during July, further increased it by 555 in August, making the total over 18,000. The explanation given is that the increase was due to additional work in connexion with the reassessment of pensions and to a general increase of work in the Department as a whole. In September, however, the staff was reduced by 283.

The Admiralty staff was brought down during the two months by over 1,100, but still numbered nearly 17,000 on October 1.

682/42

Morning Post 20. 12. 20.

THE CIVIL SERVICE.

Joint Committee's Report on Reorganisation.

STATUS AND PAY OF WOMEN.

The report of the Special Committee, appointed by the National Council for the Administrative and Legal Departments of the Home Civil Service, on the reorganisation of the Service was issued last evening. The Committee was composed of members nominated by the official and staff sides of the National Council, and the terms of reference were:

To consider the scope of the duties at present allotted to the clerical classes in the Civil Service; to report on the organisation most appropriate to secure the effective performance of these duties; and to make recommendations as to scales of salary and method of recruitment.

The Committee held its first meeting on November 25, and it is worthy of note that this is the first occasion on which a body composed entirely of present or past Civil Servants, possessing among them a wide and varied experience of the public service, have been given the opportunity of framing a scheme for its reconstruction.

All the scales of salary referred to in the report are assessed on a pre-war basis, i.e., exclusive of war bonus.

STATUS AND PAY OF WOMEN.

In dealing with the recruitment and status of women in the Civil Service, the report says Parliament has laid down the principle that a person shall not be disqualified on grounds of sex from the exercise of any public function. The Committee are agreed that within the parallel classes of the Civil Service women should be given a status and authority identical with that accorded to men; that promotion for men and for women should proceed separately as vacancies occur in the higher establishment reserved for either sex; that the principles of training and of promotion recommended for men should be applied equally to the parallel women classes; and that it should be the duty of Departments to see to it that women are regarded as available for employment on the same work as men within the several classes, and that women are given the widest opportunities of proving their administrative capacity.

Whether the interests of efficiency will best be served by segregation, or by the employment of women and men side by side, is, the Committee states, a matter on which experience varies, and they suggest that the requirements of Departments in this respect might appropriately be discussed at the Departmental Councils. It may fairly be argued that in order to obtain the full value of the experiment every opportunity should be given for men and women to work side by side.

As regards pay, the Committee are agreed that the minimum of the basic scale in each class should be the same for women and for men, and that the incremental rates should be identical up to a point.

With regard to the recruitment of the Administrative and Executive grades the official side of the Committee, while desiring to retain for men the method of open competition by written examination, advocates in the case of women, at the present stage, a system of selection by impartial and authoritative boards. The staff side attaches great importance to the principle of recruitment by open, competitive, written examination, and is prepared to assent to selection by boards only on the condition that the question of recruitment will be reviewed by the National Council within a period of five years.

ADMINISTRATIVE AND CLERICAL.

The administrative and clerical work of the Service may be said, broadly, to fall into two main categories. In one category may be placed all such work, as either is of a simple mechanical kind or consists in the application of well-defined regulations, decisions, and practice to particular cases; in the other category the work which is concerned with the formation of policy, with the revision of existing practice or current regulations and decisions, and with the organisation and direction of the business of Government.

After the most careful consideration the Committee agree that, in order properly to provide for the work falling within those two main categories, it will be necessary to employ not less than four different classes, namely:

(a) A writing assistant class for simple mechanical work.

(b) A clerical class for the better sort of work included in the first main category defined above;

(c) An executive class; and

(d) An administrative class, for the work included in the second main category.

The Committee recommend that the class of writing assistants should be recruited by local competitive examination of a simple character, and they consider that the scale of salary should start at 18s. a week, rising to 20s. a week, at the age of seventeen and 22s. at eighteen, and should proceed from that rate by annual increments of 2s. a week to a maximum of 36s. a week. Recommendations were also made on hours of duty and holidays.

For the clerical class recruitment is recommended by open, competitive, written examination, with age limits of 16-17 for boys and 16½ to 17½ for girls. The salaries recommended are: For males, £60 a year on entry, rising to £80 a year at the age of 18; thence by annual increments of £5 to £100 a year (at the age of 22); and thence by annual increments of £10 to £120 (age 24); and by £15 to £150 (age 26); and thence by £10 a year to a maximum salary of £250 a year (attainable at the age of 36). For women, £60 a year on entry, rising to £80 a year at the age of 18, thence by annual increments of £5 to £120 a year (at the age of 26); and thence by annual increments of £7 10s. to a maximum salary of £180 a year (attainable at the age of 34).

THE EXECUTIVE CLASS.

To this class the Committee would assign the higher work of Supply and Accounting Departments and of other executive or specialised branches of the Civil Service, work covering a wide field and requiring in different degrees qualities of judgment, initiative, and resource. They are of opinion that in so far as it may be desirable to appoint men from outside the Service to the staffs of these Departments and branches recruitment should be by open competitive written examination between the ages of 18 and 19, but they do not recommend the immediate extension of this mode of recruitment to women, and agree that women candidates for the staffs of these Departments and branches should, during the period of experiment, be recruited by means of authoritative and impartial Selection Boards, between the ages of 18 and 25. Entrants of both sexes so recruited should be regarded as members of a Training Grade, and they should be given the widest possible training in all branches of the work of the Department or branch to which they are assigned.

The following are the scales of pay set out: For men, £100 a year, rising by annual increments of £10 to £130 a year, and proceeding thence by annual increments of £15 to a maximum of £400 a year; and for women, £100 a year, rising by annual increments of £10 to a maximum of £300 a year.

THE ADMINISTRATIVE CLASS.

The duties appropriate to this class are those concerned with the formation of policy, with the co-ordination and improvement of Government machinery and with the general administration and control of the Departments of the Public Service. For the effective performance of these duties the Committee propose that officers should be obtained partly by selection from inside the Service and partly by recruitment from outside the Service.

Experience, they say, has shown that the higher administrative work of the Public Service requires for its discharge a proportion of men recruited at the University leaving age, and they recommend that provision should be made for the continuance of the present system by which men are selected for appointment by means of an open competitive examination in the subjects embraced by the various honours courses of University institutions. They agree that during the period of experiment this mode of recruitment should be limited to men—present age limit 22-24—and that women directly recruited to the Administrative Class should be chosen between the ages of 22 and 30 by an authoritative and impartial Selection Board—with or without qualifying examination. They hold the view that the class should be open to all men and women already employed in the Service who show early proof of real ability and promise of being able to discharge higher administrative functions.

For men cadets the scale of salary suggested is £200, by £20 to £240, and thence by £25 to £500 a year. Women cadets would be placed on a scale of £200 a year, rising by annual increments of £20 to a maximum of £400 a year.

The Committee recommend that artificial barriers to promotion should be removed, and that all those recruited for the Service at different ages and by different tests should be placed on an equality for the purpose of opportunity of promotion to higher posts. They condemn the employment of temporary clerical staffs on permanent work.

The report of the Committee is to be printed and should be on sale through his Majesty's Stationery Office in a few days.

Times . 24.2.20.

Reform of the Civil Service.

The Report issued yesterday by the Whitley Council of the Civil Service deserves respectful attention, both on the ground of the circumstances attending its preparation and on account of its intrinsic merits. The Civil Service has grown, is growing, and will continue to grow rapidly in size and importance. We hope that it will not grow quite so rapidly as is desired by some enthusiasts, who would like it to embrace the entire occupied civilian population of the country, or even so rapidly as it did in an emergency form under the stress of war. But continued growth of a less exuberant kind is quite certain ; and with its growth the efficiency of the Service becomes a matter of increasing national concern. There would, therefore, in any case be need to overhaul the system at the present time with a view to improving it. But the need is rendered urgent by the fact that the present organization is quite obsolete and the methods of recruiting and promotion not conducive to the highest efficiency, to put the case mildly. It is an open secret that the Service is honeycombed with discontent, very largely due to these obsolete methods. In such circumstances it was the plain duty of the Whitley Council to investigate the conditions and determine the reforms calculated to remove defects and increase efficiency. The Council accordingly at its second meeting appointed a special committee to consider the duties of the clerical branches of the Civil Service and report on the organization best fitted to secure the effective performance of these duties, with recommendations about salaries and recruitment. It was a joint committee of twenty-five, representing departmental heads and staff. The Whitley Council of the Civil Service, it should be remembered, differs from an ordinary industrial council, because there are no employers in the usual sense ; their place is taken by the chief officials. The present Report is the result of this joint committee's labours, and it is unanimous. It would be impossible to imagine a more weighty document of the kind, emanating as it does from the Service itself and representing all grades.

In our humble opinion, it demands attention no less for its intrinsic merits. The committee lay down clearly the principles that have guided them and the conclusions to which they have been led ; and unless we are much mistaken these will command general assent. They began their inquiry by analysing the different kinds of work required for the Service and defining the qualifications needed for each main class of duties. The work falls into two main categories—the first of a mechanical or routine character, the second involving questions of policy, organization, and direction. For the first kind of work the committee propose two classes of clerks, a higher and a lower, and for the superior work an executive and an administrative class. This reduces the number of grades from a score or more and simplifies the whole problem. It facilitates the adoption of a new principle in recruitment, which is to place the doors of entry opposite the educational grades of the country. For instance, the lowest class, or writing assistants, is intended for boys and girls of 16-17 years of age in the stage of half-completed secondary education. They would be recruited by local competitive examinations of a simple character. The next class would take boys and girls at the end of the intermediate stage of the secondary school course by open examination ; and the executive class would correspond with the end of a secondary school course. But it is proposed that provision should be made for promotion from the class below as well as by recruitment from outside ; and this is one of the essential features of the reformed organization. The objects are both to open the way to promotion by merit and at the same time to secure to the service the benefit of capacity in the ranks while it is still young and vigorous. A training [illegible] proposed to be open to men and wome[illegible] from the grade of clerks—the second [illegible]ndicated above—in an early stage of the [illegible]eer, and on account of proved ability. The highest grade, corresponding to a University degree, is also to be filled partly by selection from within the service and partly by recruitment from outside by examination. Candidates for promotion to this class would be selected by a special board and would form a "cadet corps." It is evident from these points, to mention no others, that the proposed reorganization is conceived in a new spirit and would have the effect of rejuvenating the whole service. It is to be presumed that the scales of pay and other conditions are satisfactory, since they have been drawn up with the assistance and approval of representatives of all grades. Altogether this is a very hopeful and inspiriting Report, and we have no doubt that effect will be given to it. Let it be done without undue delay.

Daily Mail 24-2.20

WOMEN'S BATTLE HALF WON

For the first time a body composed entirely of past and present members of the Civil Service have been given the opportunity of framing a scheme for its reconstruction. Whitehall's Whitley Council is neatly balanced by official and staff "sides," and its proposals, as might be supposed, are progressive without being revolutionary.

Women's position in the Civil Service is still hedged round with compromise Their admission into all branches is conceded—with safeguards. For instance, they are to be segregated from the men in "parallel" classes, although the report admits "it may fairly be argued that in order to obtain the full value of the experiment every opportunity should be given for men and women to work side by side." That sounds like a generous concession—to the future—from an official "side" that had got its own way.

In regard to pay, too, Civil Service women are to get less than men for the same work. If this recommendation is upheld it will distinguish Civil Service employment invidiously from the accepted practice in industry, commerce, and the professions. Women's exclusion from the highest grades of salary is doubtless a special recognition of man's status as bread-winner—an assumption which women are more and more disposed to contest.

Broadly, however, the report establishes women firmly in all branches o the Civil Service.

Daily Telegraph 3.3.20.

WOMAN CLERKSHIPS.

The Civil Service Commissioners announce that a competitive examination for not less than fifty higher grade woman clerkships in the Ministry of Labour will be held in July, commencing on the 6th of that month. The examination is open only to persons who have rendered two full years' approved service prior to March 1, 1920, in an established or temporary post in one or more of his Majesty's Civil departments, or as an enrolled member in the clerical sections of Queen Mary's Army Auxiliary Corps, the Women's Royal Naval Service, the Women's Royal Air Force, or the Voluntary Aid Detachments General Service; or in a temporary clerical post in the War Department establishments, or in national factories, stores, bonds, depôts, &c. Limits of age, 25 and 35 on March 1. Regulations and forms of application will be sent in response to requests by letter addressed to the Secretary, Civil Service Commission, Burlington gardens, W. 1, on or after Monday next.

Daily News 25.2.20 — 682

WOMEN IN THE CIVIL SERVICE.

Insufficient Opportunity for Higher-Grade Posts.

The scheme for throwing open all branches of the civil service to women, the most important feature of the report of the Sub-Committee of the Civil Service Whitley Council, found a good many critics among Government clerks yesterday. The women say that it marks a step in the right direction, but that the recommendations are not as far-reaching as they had hoped.

Miss Maguire, an organiser of the Women Clerks and Secretaries' Association, said: "The recommendations for the lower grades are excellent, but they offer few advantages to the higher-grade women.

"For the first time in the history of the employment of women in the Civil Service, they, if the recommendations are adopted, will have the chance of promotion from the lower to the higher branches. In the classes A and B, viz., writing assistants and clerks, I believe it is proposed to employ men and women in about equal proportion. The proposal to promote women who excel in the clerical branch to executive positions offers for the first time opportunities to the younger women who are qualified for better work than that of a purely routine character.

"Our chief objection to the report is that it does not propose to admit women by competitive examination to the executive and administrative positions. Favouritism is always bound to play a big part where promotion depends on selection."

One of the official reasons given for refusing to open the higher posts corresponding to the first class Civil Service to women, said Miss Maguire, was that University women were less broad-minded than University men, and must first show their capability in lower grade work.

At present a small number of women hold well-paid administrative positions in the offices of the Board of Education, Ministry of Health, Home Office, Public Trustee, and Ministry of Labour.

The Sub-Committee's report must be passed by the full National Whitley Council for the Civil Service, before it is submitted to the Cabinet.

682/44

Times Feb. 24. 20

682/45

682

CIVIL SERVICE REFORM.

WHITLEY COUNCIL PLAN.

REGRADING: PAY: STATUS OF WOMEN.

Important recommendations for the reorganization of the Civil Service are contained in a report presented to the Civil Service National Whitley Council by a Special Joint Committee representative of both the official and the staff sides of the Council. Sir Malcolm G. Ramsay (official side) was Chairman of the Committee, and Mr. G. H. Stuart-Bunning (staff side) was Vice-Chairman. The report, which proposes a regrading of the Civil Service, a revision of salary scales, and changes in methods of recruitment, is signed by all the members of the Committee. It will be discussed at the next meeting of the Council, provisionally fixed for March 19. The following is a summary of the main recommendations of the Committee:—

The administrative and clerical branches of the Civil Service should consist of four classes:—

(A) WRITING ASSISTANT CLASS, for simple mechanical work.

(B) CLERICAL CLASS, for the better sort of work of the semi-mechanical kind, or of the kind which consists in the application of well-defined regulations, decisions, and practice in particular cases.

(C) EXECUTIVE CLASS, for work which is concerned with the formation of policy, the revision of existing practice or current regulations and decisions, and the organization and direction of the business of Government.

(D) ADMINISTRATIVE CLASS, for work of the kind described under (C).

RECRUITMENT, GRADING, AND SALARIES.

Class "A" (Writing Assistants) should be recruited by local competitive examination, with age limits of 16-17. The scale of salary (exclusive of the present war bonus of 30 per cent. and £60) should start at 18s. a week and reach a maximum of 36s.

There should be recognized machinery for the selection of Writing Assistants who show potential capacity for better work, and for their promotion to the Clerical Class.

Class "B" (Clerical Class) should be recruited, in so far as it is recruited from outside the service, by open competitive examination, with age limits of 16-17 for boys and 16½-17½ for girls. For males the salary (exclusive of war bonus) should begin at £60 a year and rise to £250 a year at 36. For women the starting salary should be the same, but the increments smaller, and the maximum £180 at 34. There should be an "efficiency bar" in both scales, at £180 and £135 respectively, beyond which advance would be dependent on a special certificate of competency.

A higher grade, with a scale of salary ranging from £300 to £400 for men and £230 to £300 for women, should be created for supervisory or higher individual clerical work.

Class "C" (the Executive Class), should deal with the higher work of Supply and Accounting Departments and other executive or specialized branches of the Service. So far as this class is appointed from outside, recruitment should be by open competitive examination with age limits of 18-19, the syllabus of examination being framed with reference to the standard of development reached at the end of a secondary school course. Women should be allowed to enter this class only by process of selection, between the ages of 18 and 25.

It is contemplated that a considerable proportion of the Executive Class posts will be filled by promotion from the Clerical Class, by way of a special "Training Grade." The salary for this grade (exclusive of war bonus) would begin at £100 a year for men and women, and rise to £400 and £300 respectively. The salary for the first grade in the Executive Class would range from £400 to £500 for men and from £300 to £400 for women.

Class "D" (the Administrative Class) should deal with the formation of policy, the co-ordination and improvement of Government machinery, and the general administration and control of the Departments of the Public Service. It should be appointed partly by selection from inside the service and partly by recruitment from outside. The present system of open competitive examination in the subjects embraced by the various honours courses of University institutions should be continued, the age limits being 22-24. Women should be eligible for this class only by selection, between the ages of 22 and 30.

This class should be open to all men and women already in the Service who show early proof of real ability and promise of being able to discharge, in course of time, higher administrative functions. Heads of Departments should submit names of candidates to a central authority. Candidates so recounted should be regarded as a "Cadet Corps" from which selection should be made to substantive administrative rank. The salary (exclusive of war bonus) for men Cadets should range from £200 to £500, and for women from £200 to £400. The report does not deal with salary scales with maxima over £500 a year.

For all classes the Committee recommend that the normal hours of attendance should be seven a day, with a half-holiday each Saturday.

OPPORTUNITIES FOR WOMEN.

"NOVEL AND COMPLEX PROBLEMS."

Discussing the question of the employment of women in the Civil Service, the Committee report:—It must be noted that Parliament has laid down the principle that a person shall not be disqualified on grounds of sex from the exercise of any public function. We appreciate that it is not possible at this stage to attempt a final solution of the novel and complex problems involved in the employment of women, side by side with men, throughout the several classes of a graded Service of the Crown. We are by common consent breaking new ground. But it has been our earnest endeavour, while realizing that we are working in a field of strictly limited experience, to ensure that the opportunities afforded to women of proving their fitness to discharge the higher administrative duties of the Civil Service shall be full and liberal.

In the application of this principle we were met at the outset with the claim, which has the support of a number of members of your Committee, that in recruitment, status, pay, and general conditions of service there should be no differentiation between the sexes. In the direction of meeting this claim the Committee are agreed that within the parallel classes of the Civil service women should be given a status and authority identical with that accorded to men. Further, whilst we propose that during the experimental period there should be separate Establishment Lists for men and for women within each class of the Civil Service, and that promotion for men and for women should proceed separately as vacancies occur in the higher establishment reserved for either sex, we are of opinion that the principles of training and of promotion that we have recommended for men should be applied equally to the parallel women classes, and that it should be the duty of Departments, under the general guidance of the Establishments Department of the Treasury, to see to it that women are regarded as available for employment on the same work as men within the several classes, and that women are given the widest opportunities of proving their administrative capacity.

Whether the interests of efficiency will best be served by segregation, or by the employment of women and men side by side, is a matter on which experience varies, and we suggest that the requirements of Departments in this respect might appropriately be discussed at the Departmental Councils. It may fairly be argued that in order to obtain the full value of the experiment every opportunity should be given for men and women to work side by side.

As regards pay, we are agreed that the minimum of the basic scale in each class should be the same for women and for men, and that the incremental rates should be identical up to a point.

EXAMINATION AND SELECTION.

We are agreed that in the case of the clerical class we are no longer in the experimental sphere. Experience has established that women are fully capable of discharging the clerical work of the Civil Service, and we recommend that women should be recruited to the clerical class proposed by us by the method of open competition by written examination. The higher examination age-limit required for girls (16½-17½), as compared with boys, together with the need for a separate seniority list, makes it necessary that young women who are candidates for entry to this class should be recruited by a separate examination—though the subject-matter of the examination should be of the same standard as that prescribed for male candidates.

With regard, however, to the recruitment of the administrative and executive grades, hereafter proposed, the official side, while desiring to retain for men the method of open competition by written examination, advocates in the case of women, at the present stage, a system of selection by impartial and authoritative boards. The staff side attaches great importance to the principle of recruitment by open, competitive, written examination, and is prepared to assent to selection by boards only on the condition that the question of recruitment will be reviewed by the National Council within a period of five years.

On the question of recruitment for the higher administrative posts, the Committee report:—Experience has shown that this work requires for its discharge a proportion of men recruited at the university-leaving age, and we recommend therefore that provision should be made for the continuance of the present system by which men are selected for appointment to the public service by means of an open competitive examination in the subjects embraced by the various honours courses of university institutions. The present age-limits are 22-24. Some of us are of opinion that the lower age-limit should be reduced to 21, but as the information before us is not sufficient to enable us to make a recommendation, we suggest that this point should be further explored. We are agreed that during the period of experiment this mode of recruitment should be limited to men, and that women directly recruited to the administrative class should be chosen between the ages of 22 and 30 by an authoritative and impartial Selection Board—with or without qualifying examination.

A CENTRAL AUTHORITY.

The special requirements of the administrative work constitute a clear justification for bringing into the public service persons possessing the high educational qualifications described above. We do not, however, contemplate that recruitment to the Administrative Class should be solely from outside the Service. On the contrary, our view is that the class should be open to all men and women already employed in the Service who show early proof of real ability and promise of being able to discharge, in course of time, higher administrative functions. In order to meet such cases, we recommend that a central authority should be established to investigate and decide on the qualifications of candidates recommended by the heads of their respective departments, and that it should be an instruction to heads of departments to submit to this authority from time to time the names of young men and women having, in their judgment, the necessary qualifications for admission to the Administrative Class.

Men and women so recruited should be regarded as a cadet corps from which selection should be made to higher administrative posts, and members of this corps should be treated, so far as practicable, as a body available for service in any department in which the Administrative Class is employed.

THE IDEAL IN VIEW.

The Committee, in some general observations on their task, point out that it is only six months since the first meeting was held of the National Council which embodied the application of the Whitley method to the administrative and legal departments of the Civil Service. That a group of persons drawn from every part of a graded Service of the Crown should be able to present an agreed report upon the form and shape their Service should take is a notable and hopeful achievement. . . . But we desire to emphasize the truth that forms are lifeless things without the spirit that animates them, and that no rules or regulations have any value apart from the broad and sympathetic treatment with which they should be handled and interpreted. Administration is at least as much a matter of heart as of brain. Throughout our deliberations we have striven to promote what we conceive to be the best interests equally of the State and of the Civil Service; we have endeavoured to remedy what has appeared to us to be defective, while at the same time not impairing what experience has shown to be good; and in all that we have proposed we have kept steadily in view the ideal of an efficient and contented public service.

53 JOINT COUNCILS.

The third meeting of the National Council for the Administrative and Legal Departments of the Civil Service was held at Montagu House, Whitehall, last Friday. The CHAIRMAN (Sir Malcolm Ramsay) announced the following changes in the membership of the Council:—Sir Warren Fisher has withdrawn; Sir W. A. Robinson has succeeded Sir Edmund B. Phipps; Mr. A. Woodgate, C.B.E., will act as a member during the temporary absence of Mr. H. E. Dale; Mr. F. P. Robinson, who has succeeded Mr. F. W. Leith Ross, has been appointed Joint Secretary to the official side in the place of Mr. R. B. Howorth, who remains a member of the Council. On the staff side Mr. H. E. Shayler has succeeded Mr. F. H. Norman; Mr. W. E. McConnell has succeeded Mr. A. E. Killick; and Miss M. C. Bray has succeeded Miss E. H. Howse.

The report of the Committee set up to consider and approve individual constitutions for Departmental Councils was received. Fifty-three joint councils for Government Departments have been established. The report of the Reorganization Committee (dealt with above) was presented to the Council and its publication authorized. The printed report will be on sale to the public on Friday next. Discussion of the report was postponed until the next meeting of the Council, the date of which was provisionally fixed for Friday, March 19.

The Council agreed to the appointment of special committees with the following terms of reference respectively:—(a) To consider and report upon the principles and methods of promotion; and (b) to explore the question of the encouragement of the further education of Civil Servants and their training in higher administration and organization. It was announced that the temporary adjustment of subsistence rates, recently agreed with the Civil Service Alliance is being applied generally throughout the Civil Service.

Daily Telegraph 6.3.

THE CIVIL SERVICE.

STATUS OF WOMEN.

By A WOMAN.

Rather more than a week has passed since the report of the Civil Service National Whitley Council became generally available, and in that time it has been considered by two or three of the leading organisations of women. The resolutions that they have adopted concerning it have been frankly deprecatory. At the best, all that can be said is that the committee has provided its own best summary as to the equal opportunities that women have demanded. "Up to a point" there are concessions and amendments. And it is over a very important detail indeed that this phrase is employed. "As regards pay, we are agreed that the minimum of the basic scale should be the same for women as for men, and that the incremental rate should be identical up to a point." That "point" appears to be indicated in Class B (Clerical Class), where the official attitude on the subject may be judged. Here the rule is laid down that

For males the salary (exclusive of war bonus) should begin at £60 a year and rise to £250 a year at 36. For women the starting salary should be the same, but the increments smaller, and the maximum £180 at 34. There should be an "efficiency bar" in both scales, at £180 and £135 respectively, beyond which advance would be dependent on a special certificate of competency.

A higher grade, with a scale of salary ranging from £300 to £400 for men and £230 to £300 for women, should be created for supervisory or higher individual clerical work.

Again, as to the Executive Class, to which promotion will be made through a "Training Grade":

The salary for this grade would begin at £100 a year for men and women, and rise to £400 and £300 respectively. The salary for the first grade in the Executive Class would range from £400 to £500 for men and from £300 to £400 for women.

There is another rather inexplicable recommendation. While the age limit of examination for boys is to be 16 to 17 years, it is 16½ to 17½ years for girls. Now the average girl at 16 to 17 is usually more advanced; is, in fact, generally "older for her years" than the lad of that age. She has reached that stage in her development when she is assimilating most rapidly the instruction given to her. The argument may be that it is full young for a girl to enter upon her career much before she is 18, but it is quite possible later on that the loss of that six months might militate seriously against her in the matter of promotion. In any case, it puts off the possibility of beginning her wage-earning career until six months later than her brother commences his.

The committee admits that it is not possible at this stage to attempt a final solution of the novel and complex problems involved in the employment of women side by side with men throughout the several classes of a graded service of the Crown. But how far the university woman, the woman bringing some highly specialised qualifications into that service will consider that her claims have been met is another matter. Examination in itself may not be the ideal means of selection, and everyone at all cognisant of results due to it can point to instances where it was not entirely satisfactory. But it is at least a fair and open door, and it is certain that not one in a thousand of women would not prefer it to the method of selection suggested on their behalf. "We recommend," say the Committee, "that provision should be made for a continuance of the present system by which men are selected for appointment to the public service by means of an open competitive examination in the subjects embraced by the various honours courses of university institutions. We are agreed that during the period of experiment this mode of recruitment should be limited to men, and that women directly recruited to the administrative class should be chosen between the ages of 22 and 30 by an authoritative and impartial selection board—with or without qualifying examination." That way lies patronage and influence, which is wholly out of keeping with present ideas, and the question of the salaries in this matter are among those that the associations concerned with women's advancement condemn most unsparingly.

Men and women who thus enter through their separate doors are to be regarded primarily in the light of a kind of cadet corps, from which the higher administrative posts are to be filled. What is perhaps the most satisfactory statement as far as women are concerned, is that this class of appointments should also be open to those already in the service and giving signs of real ability. The proposal is put forward that there should be some central authority to whom heads of departments could send any member of their staff that they deemed worthy of promotion. Heads of departments, however, are but human, and imagination foresees cases where this dignitary might be loath to send on, even for advancement, the particularly efficient secretary who always had the right information to be given in reply to questions in the House of Commons. Probably there are further reports to follow. There is still that vexed question, raised more than once on this page as to the retirement of women upon marriage, which is not touched in these findings. But on the whole, the present report maintains the old angle of vision, and still says to women, "Thus far shalt thou go and no farther."

WAR SERVICE ASSOCIATION.

Since the Marchioness of Londonderry, in conjunction with the heads of the different War Services of Women, outlined the scheme earlier in the week for founding an association which should keep together these workers for their mutual benefit, there has been ample demonstration of approval of it. The offices of the Women's Legion, 115, Victoria-street, S.W. 1, have been made the headquarters of the enterprise, and Lady Londonderry, together with Dame Florence Burleigh Leach, was able yesterday afternoon to state that applications for membership have poured in from all parts of the kingdom. It is hoped to hold a meeting in London shortly to which former members of these organisations would be invited, while in the provinces similar gatherings are to be arranged. In the "Old Comrades' Associations" of Queen Mary's Army Auxiliary Corps, the Women's Royal Naval Service, and the motor-drivers of the Women's Legion, there exists already a strong nucleus, and there are indications that members of the Women's Land Army and of the Voluntary Aid Detachments will be glad to come in also.

The idea of providing more residential hostels for ex-Service women especially commends itself to them. It was mentioned yesterday that two ladies who had held good rank in Q.M.A.A.C. had secured on favourable terms from the Government two houses in Belgrave-road that during the war had been occupied by war workers, and no sooner were they ready for their new purpose than they were full to overflowing, girls even appealing to be allowed to make "shake-downs" for themselves on the corridor floors. The necessity for more hostels is fully recognised in the project, while other useful forms of help are promised in loans for special training, and a fund to assist overseas settlement. There is every reason to think that with such useful objects in view, the association may hope for the assistance and support of Lord Byng's United Services Fund. In the various women's services something like a quarter of a million were enrolled. Naturally, they are now widely scattered, but the prompt response they have begun to make to the suggestion of uniting for their own welfare shows that they feel it to be a desirable step.

682 682 682/47

A GREAT STEP FORWARD.

The women in the Civil Service have gained a great victory securing the rejection of the report of the Sub-Committee on the Organisation of the Civil Service as far as it regards women, and in inducing the main Whitley Council to reserve that part of it for further and, we believe, better consideration. To call this event a great step forward is no exaggeration, for upon the success of the women directly employed by the Government depends the position of all other classes of women workers in this country. If women civil servants cannot achieve equality of opportunity and equality of pay no other women can hope to do so. And the fact that they realise both the power and the importance of their position is of great encouragement.

The history of their effort, which has taken barely four weeks, is very instructive. It will be remembered that the Government took power under the Sex Disqualification (Removal) Act to regulate by Orders in Council the conditions of entry and employment of women in the Civil Service. This matter was delegated, not without astuteness, to the newly-formed National Whitley Council for the Civil Service, and it was understood that upon the report of that body the Orders in Council would be framed. The National Whitley Council referred the matter in its turn to a special Sub-Committee on the Organisation of the Service, and this Sub-Committee consisted of eleven representatives of the official side and fifteen representatives of the staff side, one official and three staff representatives being women. This body reported on February 17th, and their report, while a distinct advance on present conditions, fell very far short of actual equality.

Meetings both of Associations of Civil Service women and outside organisations immediately took place, and the objections to the Report increased from day to day. At first the obvious step forward indicated by the Report somewhat dazzled those who looked at it with a pre-war mind. The foolishness of compromise at the outset, however, soon became clear, and before ten days were over practically every Association of women inside the Civil Service had called for the amendment of the Report.

A somewhat difficult situation then arose, since the majority of the women's Associations formed part of the larger mixed Civil Service bodies whose representatives were responsible for the Report. The women's groups and societies attempted, but unsuccessfully, to influence the decision of the joint organisations, and finally it became clear that the women, though perfectly solid a d united themselves, formed a minority within Associations which approved the Report. It is the essence of Whitley Councils that the staff side and the official side should present unanimous reports, and it was therefore impossible for the staff side to give any indication of the large minority which it had, or rather had not, behind it.

In looking upon the two classes of Civil Servants, men and women, it is only right to remember that the apparent opposition between the men and the women arose not on the question of principle, but upon the expediency of pressing at the present time for the full demand for equality. This difference, while not so serious as one of principle, can nevertheless give rise to grave difficulties, and it is certain that by the time the Sub-Committee's Report reached the main Whitley Council the position of the staff side was almost impossible.

While this was going on within the Service, outside organisations were not idle, and the importance of the question, as it affects the whole problem of women's employment, was very widely discussed. Letters of protest and appeals for amendment reached not only the members of the Whitley Council, but also the Parliamentary heads of great Government Departments. From many quarters the women interested in University education, no less than the societies interested in equality, took active steps, and it is not surprising that the pressure of outside public opinion reached the official side of the National Whitley Council. There are some who say that outside opinion should not influence the decisions of the Whitley Council. That it did so on this question is but a proof that the Council is being called upon to perform a function that is not within its province; for the conditions of entry and status and position of women in the Civil Service is a matter of general public interest that should never have been referred to the Whitley Council at all. On Friday, March 19th, when the National Council met, the Report of the Sub-Committee as regards men was adopted and that concerning women was reserved for further consideration. We trust that in the further consideration that is given to this question the opinions of University women and others representing the outside public will be obtained.

In the course of the campaign the Federation of Women Civil Servants organised a great mass meeting in the Central Hall. Their case was there most ably argued, and the response given to each point as it was made by that large gathering of young women was a most interesting sign of the times. In the old days we can remember almost despairing of women civil servants. They, the teachers and the nurses, used to be more difficult (in the mass at any rate) than even the antis themselves, for though they cared they did not dare to express their opinions. Enfranchisement and the changes that the war have brought has made a great difference, and it is to the stand that the teachers and the civil servants are making that all women workers are looking to-day for their salvation. The nurses, too, are moving, and a very good thing it is; and when these professional women succeed industrial women cannot help but benefit. As one of the speakers at the meeting said, women's employment is like a long chain hung from a height. The top links are the doctors, the artists, and the independent professional women; next to this come teachers, civil servants, secretarial workers, and so on from link to link till at the bottom there are the sweated women workers dragging in the dirt and the dust. To raise the bottom links is difficult, and if done they do but fall back, and the only sure way is to raise the whole chain from the top. The simile is a true one. And we are glad indeed that the women civil servants should use it.

It is very strange to see the new spirit that is abroad amongst women wage-earners. We used in the old days to be thankful for anything. To-day perhaps we go to the other extreme, and we do certainly shock and pain many of our more gentle well-wishers. But, after all, we have votes to-day, and it is small wonder if we make the most of them. In the matter of the Sub-Committee's report we have certainly been victorious, and being so we can regret that we seemed ungenerous. We can admit now that the old report was not all bad; that it did much that would have been thought impossible even a few months ago, and that the men and women who prepared it fought hard and thought hard over a difficult problem. But the new spirit has held of us at last, and we cannot be content to compromise.

Evening News
5 3-17

WOMEN FOR FRANCE.

Arrangements for Them to Live in Hotel "Barracks."

Some of the women who are to be attached to the Army in France will live in hotels.

Colonel Leigh-Wood and Mrs. Chalmers-Watson, M.D., heads of the Women's Army Department, have returned from France, where they have been making arrangements for the reception of the women-soldiers.

They have seen some suitable hotels, which will be furnished and turned into comfortable "barracks." In some localities where hotels are not available the women will go into huts. These are to be built for the purpose.

It is hoped that the housing arrangements may be complete for the first battalion of women in a few weeks' time. They will go over as a complete unit.

An important section will be the cooks, who are to be supplied by the Women's Legion.

Daily Express
7 3-17

RUSH TO JOIN THE WOMEN'S ARMY.

OFFERS FAR IN EXCESS OF PRESENT NEEDS.

The number of offers for service in the Women's Army Auxiliary Corps—the pending formation of which was announced in the "Daily Express" on February 20—is, we are officially informed by the War Office, already far in excess of the probable immediate requirements.

The Director-General of National Service desires, in order that disappointment may be avoided, that no more applications should be made until further notice is given by the authorities.

The period of preparation in England will include elementary instruction in hygiene and discipline.

It has been decided, therefore, on grounds of expediency, that the first detachment of women shall be drawn from the London district, and applicants living in the London area only will be enrolled in the first instance. Applications from other areas will be dealt with later.

Evening News
7 3-17

5,000 WOMEN FOR FRANCE.

Others to have Similar Opportunities for Enrolment.

Only London women will be called up for the first unit to be sent to France to join the Army, but as soon as accommodation is ready for them other women will have the same opportunity of enrolment. At present sufficient applications have been received.

The Selection Board which Mrs. Tennant is setting up will probably consist of a representative of the War Office, Miss Wilson (Commissioner for the London district), and Miss Clapham (principal officer).

Five thousand women will form the first battalion and they will be sent over in units of 200. The majority will be trained clerks.

A training centre (for military drill) is to be established in London, where the recruits will spend two or three weeks.

Daily Mail
7 4-17

WOMEN ARMIES.

35,000 FOR WORK ABROAD AND 2,400 FOR THE LAND.

Mr. S. Walsh, as representing the Ministry of National Service, states that 35,000 women have registered at the National Service Department for the Women's Army Auxiliary Corps. The War Office authorities are selecting women for service abroad, for which at present they require 5,500, as rapidly as they can make arrangements for their accommodation, and at present 146 women have been selected. For the Women's Land Army 2,473 had enrolled up to last Tuesday.

Evening News
24 3-17

PETTICOAT ARMY.

First Battalions of Women in Khaki Ready for France.

The two first battalions of the Women's Auxiliary Army are awaiting orders to cross to France.

They are to be known as the Women's Auxiliary Aid Corps, and are made up of clerks, waitresses, and housemaids. The cooking for the first corps is to be done by the French people. Later it is hoped to send cooks over with each unit.

Girls who have been working with the Army at home as waitresses, under the Women's Legion, have been selected for the first corps, with the addition of trained women clerks.

Officers from the Women's Legion, Miss Atkinson and Miss Findlay, are in command. The two battalions are going to different places in France, and will live in hostels.

For the past fortnight most of the recruits have been staying at Ingram House, Stockwell-road. This house, which before the war was a hostel for men, was turned into a lady-workers' club to accommodate the overflow from Bedford House of young women workers in Government offices.

The members have all to be under 25 years of age, and many are only 17 years. Eighty rooms have now been taken over by the War Office for the use of women going to the Army in France until a special hostel is secured.

Hopkinson House, a large women-workers' club in Vauxhall Bridge-road, was one of those selected for a hostel by the Army authorities.

The women now ready for France have been vaccinated and inoculated while at Ingram House. They have also been undergoing military drill in the large gymnasium in the house in order to give them some idea of Army discipline. Women officers from the Women's Volunteer Reserve are the instructors.

The recruits are given squad drill. They are taught to march in fours and to move easily in large numbers.

Lectures are also given on First Aid and personal hygiene. The women have been supplied with khaki uniforms by the Women's Legion, the War Office making a grant of £4 for each recruit.

This covers an overcoat and hat, skirt and blouse and boots, overall and cap.

Daily Mail
26 3-17

WOMEN FOR FRANCE.

TWO BATTALIONS AWAITING ORDERS TO CROSS.

Two battalions of the Women's Army are awaiting orders to cross to France.

Known as the Women's Auxiliary Aid Corps, they are mainly clerks, waitresses, and housemaids. Officers from the Women's Legion, Miss Atkinson and Miss Findlay, are in command. In France they will live in hostels.

The members have all to be under 25 years of age, and many are only 17 years. Those now ready for France have been vaccinated and inoculated. They have also been undergoing military drill to give them some idea of Army discipline. They are given squad drill, taught to march in fours, and to move easily in large numbers. Lectures are also given on First Aid and personal hygiene.

The women have been supplied with khaki uniforms by the Women's Legion, the War Office making a grant of £4 for each recruit. This covers an overcoat and hat, skirt and blouse and boots, overall and cap.

The Gentlewoman
14. 4. 17

682a/2 682a

The SORT of WOMEN NEEDED

AN IDEA OF ST. ERMIN'S ACTIVITIES.

With the Army pushing forward in all directions, and every despatch from Sir Douglas Haig bringing news of further British victories, women are proud indeed that they are being asked to help their men folk near the field of battle. It is felt an honour to be thus called upon to work side by side with the gallant men who have, for all those long and weary months of war, been fighting to keep the women at home in safety and comfort. Now that the National Service Department (Women's Section) has undertaken to recruit for the War Office an army of women to release fit men who are now doing civilian work in the Army, there will be a continued response from women as further need arises for recruits.

The feeling of pride inspired by working under the War Office as an auxiliary corps may be a trifle sentimental, for, in the nature of things, women cannot expect for one moment to be able to join their husbands or sweethearts at or near the firing line! But sentiment, which is not a thing to be sneered at, goes hand in hand with enthusiasm and courage.

There are typists and clerks needed, cooks, waitresses and domestic staff, motor transport service, telephone and postal workers, checkers and unskilled workers. The pay will vary according to duties, the minimum wage being £1 weekly, for a week of forty-three working hours; beyond that, overtime will be paid for at the rate of 7d. per hour.

The general conditions have been most thoughtfully planned. No woman under twenty years of age is eligible for employment. A short form of agreement will be entered into, and a medical examination by a woman doctor will be necessary.

There will be a period of preparation in England, which will include elementary instruction in hygiene and discipline. Free conveyance to and from France on appointment and termination of engagement, and uniform will be provided.

A fortnight's leave will be given during each year's service.

An allowance of £4 will be paid to provide uniform at the beginning of service, with a further grant of £1 at the end of six months.

A grant of £5 will be made for the second year's service, and slightly different grants in the case of the motor transport section.

In all cases other than cooks, waitresses, domestic staff, storehouse women, unskilled labour, and miscellaneous services, a deduction not exceeding 14s. per week will be made to cover cost of board and lodging and washing.

In the case of storehouse women and unskilled labour and miscellaneous services, when the pay is less than 21s. per week, the deduction will not in any case exceed 13s. a week.

The above conditions and terms of pay apply only to service in France.

The women will be accommodated, while abroad, in hostels and hotels which are under the care of lady superintendents. Every possible provision has been made to safeguard the women and ensure their best welfare. No woman need hesitate to come forward because she fears the unusual conditions which must, of course, hold sway across the Channel, for no contingency has been overlooked by the capable women in charge of this matter, which so closely affects the wellbeing of our women war workers.

It is to be understood that those who enrol will be asked to hold themselves ready for service at home as well as abroad. Where a special desire to go abroad is expressed, every possible effort will be made to meet the wish, but women will realise that the really patriotic thing is to work wherever work is most urgently needed.

The response made, as a result of the War Office statement on February 28th of the proposed conditions and terms, has been so far in excess of the probable immediate requirements, that it was found necessary to give notice on March 7th that no more applications should be made for the present. For reasons of economy, the training of the first batch of recruits is to take place in London, and it follows that those nearest London will be called first. Mrs. Tennant is anxious that women who are not communicated with at once shall not think that they are left out, and disappointment will be avoided if it is realised that enrolment will follow in other areas as and when necessity arises.

No woman should leave her present employment at the time of making application, nor even when actually enrolled. She is, upon enrolment, exactly in the position of the man who is waiting to be called up, and who continues quietly in his civilian occupation until the latest possible moment. It is the aim of the authorities to dislocate employment as little as possible, and women offering for service either in France or at home are asked to make no hasty change, but remain at their ordinary work until the moment comes for them to be called up.

WOMEN ON THE LAND.

The authorities at St. Ermin's are at present making all arrangements to assist the Board of Agriculture by arranging to regulate supply to meet demand. Milkers, shepherdesses, plough-women, haymakers, horse-keepers, cow-keepers, market gardeners, harvesters, all must be forthcoming. The land calls—our own homeland, for whom our men are risking their lives hourly—and this call of the land is not to be denied. Within the next few days the scheme will be issued officially; application forms will be obtainable at every post office; enrolment will begin, and the work be put in hand with expedition.

Mrs. Tennant feels that it would be beneficial that all women in the provincial towns should know what excellent work has been done in certain villages to augment the autumn food supply. Under a scheme of the Board of Trade and the Board of Agriculture, a registrar was appointed in most village centres last year to keep a number of girls and women willing to work on the land. In the course of February, for instance, the registrar of one small village canvassed a hundred of the cottagers, urging them to plant as many potatoes as they could make room for, before April, in their gardens and allotments. The whole order for the village was sent to one grower, and the costs advanced by the registrar. There is now, then, a prospective supply of at least 670 pecks of home-grown potatoes for next winter in that one village. Given a simple plan like this in all villages, and a horse and cart for distribution in each district, and the addition to next winter's food supply would be a most important asset.

The need for women's work upon the land is now extremely urgent. Much can be done to help to win a victorious peace if women will put their energies into this National Service. The provincial towns of all sizes, and the outlying villages can help in this work. Any healthy willing woman can be taught. Milk for the babies, bread for the children, food for the soldiers and sailors and for all, must be ensured, and only by the patriotic and whole-hearted service of Great Britain's women can this result be guaranteed and the harvest saved for us.

WOMEN IN INDUSTRY.

Women Commissioners have been appointed whose duty will be to assist with measures for increasing the supply of labour within their respective areas, and to consider questions of substituting women for men in various trades, closely co-operating with the men commissioners for inducing both employers and employees to facilitate substitution, and facilitating and maintaining good relations between the two.

One important work undertaken by the Woman Commissioners will be to see that proper steps are taken for the welfare of the workers in each centre of employment, and also to see that the women workers in National Service are properly paid and housed.

Miss Mona Wilson is the Commissioner for London, and is well known all over the country as one who has devoted her career to the investigation of the problems of industrial life, especially as touching women. She is a daughter of Canon Wilson, formerly Archdeacon of Manchester, and has been associated in her public work with such widely known people as Mr. Charles Booth, Mr. Seebohm Rowntree, Miss Gertrude Tuckwell, Lady Dilke and Miss Mary Macarthur.

Miss Mary Paterson is the Commissioner for Scotland, and has transferred her energies from the National Health Insurance for Scotland to the wider field of National Service. She has a very thorough knowledge of the conditions under which women work, and her knowledge of procedure and her organising ability qualify her for work of distinction in the post she has now undertaken.

Lady Mackworth, the Commissioner for Wales, is the daughter of Lord Rhondda, and wife of Sir Humphrey Mackworth, of Caerleon, Monmouth, President of the Local Government Board. She is a woman of remarkable ability, and a director of many influential companies, chiefly connected with coal and shipping. Recently Lord Rhondda took over the assets of a business formerly in the hands of enemy aliens, and Lady Mackworth was elected to the chairmanship.

Daily Mail
9.5.17

WOMEN'S ARMY CORPS.

LIFE IN BARRACKS FOR RECRUITS.

A detachment of the Women's Army Auxiliary Corps left yesterday for France, trim, soldierly young women in khaki, carrying suit-cases and ready to serve behind the lines in the capacity of clerks, typists, postal sorters, housemaids, cooks, store women, and motor-drivers. Yesterday's batch were cooks, as the red insertion on their shoulder straps indicated—red for cooks, brown for clerks, claret for motor-drivers.

The headquarters of the corps are at the Connaught Club, near the Marble Arch. At present about 350 women are quartered there undergoing the three weeks' training, which is all they are given before proceeding abroad.

Bedrooms contain from one to four beds, but just now the supply of bedsteads is not sufficient and bedboards are being used, of the same pattern as those furnished to the British Army. It is hoped to keep an establishment of 500 always in training at the barracks, sending out from 150 to 180 per week.

Many of the recruits are from the Women's Legion, and have already two years' experience of Army work. The clerks are all new to the Women's Army Auxiliary Corps, and more are needed. Selection boards sit at the National Service Department, St. Ermins Hotel, S.W. 1, three times a week and at various centres all over the country.

The Christian
1.5.17

Our Warrior Girls.—2.

THE formation of the Women's Auxiliary Army, drafts of which proceed to France week by week, is not the first call that has come to girls to be "behind the gun," for all over the country there have sprung up "Women's Colonies" and Hutments of Girls' Hostels near the munition factories which have been erected in many quiet districts, in order that the danger zone of munition-making may be far removed from the crowded cities where most of our factories exist. Miss V. Tritton, with her band of Y.W.C.A. fellow-workers, have been leaders in this enterprise, and our readers would be thankful to enter with them daily into the little chapel. Here the girls turn in sometimes, in their munition clothes, after a twelve-hour shift, to commit to God their brother-workers at the Front.

The Guild of Helpers has sent its girls, who feel that call of the War to spiritual as well as material work, to live amongst munition-workers and help them to meet the dangers to which they are exposed. When Government or an employer confides to the Y.W.C.A. the running of a hostel, or the management of a canteen, it gladly accepts it because of the opportunity it gives to add a club-room and a quiet room where the girls can turn in for solitary or united intercession. Six Huts have been recently opened in Scotland, the outcome of the appeal-effort made last summer and autumn, when munition works were being started with great rapidity over the Border. "We shall not feel so homesick if you stay with us," was the remark made by a young girl who was feeling lonely amid the 120 girls in her hostel, instead of in her native village.

Many problems arise in this sudden herding together of thousands of women, and the Y.W.C.A. is ready to enrol any number of voluntary workers as week by week new centres have to be opened.

Miss Campbell, Secretary of the Munition Workers' Welfare Department, will be glad of help at 24, Park-lane, W.; and the Hon. E. Kinnaird to receive letters with reference to voluntary help at 26, George-st., Hanover-sq., W.

Daily Mail
14.5.17

THE GIRLS' ARMY.

OFF TO THE FRONT.

WOUNDED SOLDIERS' SALUTE.

Tramp, tramp with even steps; heads erect, shoulders back, and joyous bearing, a detachment of khaki-clad troops with haversacks slung on their backs swung round from Seymour-street into Edgware-road on Saturday morning and marched away to entrain for France. But they were women. All of them, including the smart subaltern who led them, were bright faced, lithe limbed, athletic-looking girls.

To the passers-by in Edgware-road it might have seemed merely some spring day pleasure jaunt upon which they were engaged. But there was a glow of enthusiasm in their cheerful faces and an air of purpose in their brisk steps, to tell the onlookers that the girls were doing the country's work, and that there was a thrill of pride in the pleasant spectacle of their enjoyment. It was one of the first detachments of the Women's Army Auxiliary Corps, which is gradually taking over the vast office work of the Army in France that hitherto has occupied the energies of thousands of men who are needed at the fighting front.

Already some hundreds of girl clerks have been enlisted, trained, and sent over to release men who have had to be kept at the bases to do the clerical work of the Army Pay Department. Almost daily now fresh detachments are marching away en route for France.

THE SPIRIT OF THE GIRLS.

Most of the girls in Saturday's detachment that marched gaily away from the Connaught Club, which is the training centre and hostel of the amazon corps, were London girl clerks. They had received a little elementary drill for mobility and discipline, but required very little training for the work they are to do. That is all in the nature of their accustomed clerical employment. They have been instructed in household economy and among them is one section which is specially trained for the conduct of the hostels in which they are to be housed in France.

There is as keen and fine a spirit of service among these girls as in any branch of the nation's war organisation. They have given up their employments and joined the Women's Corps because they are as keen as their brothers in "doing their bit." One of the girls before the detachment paraded for the march expressed the spirit in a few sentences:

"We are going to be the finest corps in the British Army," she said, "and that means the finest corps in the whole world. The 'old man' at my office didn't want me to go, but I told him I was going because I wasn't going to stand by doing nothing particular when all the boys were giving up everything. Why, the work I was doing in the office wasn't doing any good and any fool of a man could do it. So here I am and to-night I shall be in France. Just think of it; every one of us women in the corps is as good as two men because every one of us makes two men of some use who were doing no good before.

SMARTEST OF SMART OFFICERS.

"First there is the man at the base who has only been doing the work we are going to do and now will be able to go and fight, and next there is the man at home who has been doing nothing at all and will now have a chance to do the work we have been doing."

The detachment was paraded in the Lecture Hall at the Connaught Club by their draft-conducting officer, Miss Monica Harcourt-Browne, the smartest of young subalterns, who, if she does not hold the rank of lieutenant, ought to. When their kits had been found in order there came into the hall with quick, athletic stride as fine a figure of an inspecting officer as any regimental parade ground could show. She was Miss Blanche Ireland, their drill instructor. She was taller than the rest and a leather belt of the Sam Browne colour girdled her khaki tunic.

Command was in her eye, confidence and competence in her quick movements and easy bearing. She had the "snap" of the Brigade of Guards, and if she has not the rank of captain there is still red tape in Whitehall. She did not keep them waiting while she talked about the weather. She had them formed up in double line, numbered them, and put them at the "'shun" in no time, turned them half-right into boarding-school formation, and then with a smart "By y'r left! Quick! March!" had them out of the place and half-way down the street before they knew they were starting. They marched to the Marble Arch tube station on the way to Waterloo and the port of embarkation.

ABASHED SLACKERS.

Wounded soldiers stood at the salute as they marched down the Edgware-road, boys cheered, and young civilians and "flappers" stood abashed. They looked so eager and so fit, and their short-skirted khaki uniforms with felt hats were so neat and becoming that the "flapper" smartness of the shopping women on the pavements seemed dowdy by comparison.

And their enjoyment of the great adventure upon which they were embarking was the cheerful spirit of their soldier brothers. It was a sight to set off against the gloom of the stay-at-home slackers. The girls love the life, love the drilling and the khaki and the discipline. Like the boys, they

682a/3 682
Financial Times
[illegible] 17

THE WOMEN'S ARMY.

RECRUITING OFFICE FOR THE CITY

By permission of the Lord Mayor an office was opened at the Mansion House yesterday for enlistment in the Women's Army Auxiliary Corps, under the auspices of the National Service Department. The office is in charge of Mrs. Grew, who has a number of lady assistants, including Mrs. Curnock, Press manager. Women ranging in age from 20 to 40 years commenced to apply as early as eight o'clock in the morning, and there was a constant stream of applicants throughout the day. Printed particulars of service were handed to the volunteers and other information was verbally imparted. It was explained that the women were required as clerks, typists, shorthand writers, etc., in France, and as domestic workers in England. Each accepted applicant will receive a khaki uniform, differentiated by shoulder colours, brown for clerks, red for cooks, purple for motor drivers and green for domestic workers. The office will remain open from day to day so long as recruits continue to come in.

Evening News 22.5.17

GIRLS FOR FOREIGN SERVICE.

Recruiting for women clerks for the Women's Army Auxiliary Corps proceeded briskly at the Mansion House yesterday.

A steady stream of bright, intelligent, trained girl clerks applied at the office opened by the Women's Section of National Service from nine in the morning till seven at night.

The girls, mostly City workers, came with a very firm idea of the work they wanted to do, and each seemed to know the limit of her own capabilities.

The age limit is 20-30, and many girls of 18 expressed regret that they would not get to France now because the war would be over before they reached the mature age of 20!

Department, St. Ermins Hotel, S.W. 1, three times a week and at various centres all over the country.

The Christian

Our Warrior Girls.—2.

THE formation of the Women's Auxiliary Army, drafts of which proceed to France week by week, is not the first call that has come to girls to be "behind the gun," for all over the country there have sprung up "Women's Colonies" and Hutments of Girls' Hostels near the munition factories which have been erected in many quiet districts, in order that the danger zone of munition-making may be far removed from the crowded cities where most of our factories exist. Miss V. Tritton, with her band of Y.W.C.A. fellow-workers, have been leaders in this enterprise, and our readers would be thankful to enter with them daily into the little chapel. Here the girls turn in sometimes, in their munition clothes, after a twelve-hour shift, to commit to God their brother-workers at the Front.

The Guild of Helpers has sent its girls, who feel that call of the War to spiritual as well as material work, to live amongst munition-workers and help them to meet the dangers to which they are exposed. When Government or an employer confides to the Y.W.C.A. the running of a hostel, or the management of a canteen, it gladly accepts it because of the opportunity it gives to add a club-room and a quiet room where the girls can turn in for solitary or united intercession. Six Huts have been recently opened in Scotland, the outcome of the appeal-effort made last summer and autumn, when munition works were being started with great rapidity over the Border. "We shall not feel so homesick if you stay with us," was the remark made by a young girl who was feeling lonely amid the 120 girls in her hostel, instead of in her native village.

Many problems arise in this sudden herding together of thousands of women, and the Y.W.C.A. is ready to enrol any number of voluntary workers as week by week new centres have to be opened.

Miss Campbell, Secretary of the Munition Workers' Welfare Department, will be glad of help at 24, Park-lane, W.; and the Hon. E. Kinnaird to receive letters with reference to voluntary help at 26, George-st., Hanover-sq., W.

have been enlisted, trained, [illegible] release men who have had to be kept at the bases to do the clerical work of the Army Pay Department. Almost daily now fresh detachments are marching away en route for France.

THE SPIRIT OF THE GIRLS.

Most of the girls in Saturday's detachment that marched gaily away from the Connaught Club, which is the training centre and hostel of the amazon corps, were London girl clerks. They had received a little elementary drill for mobility and discipline, but required very little training for the work they are to do. That is all in the nature of their accustomed clerical employment. They have been instructed in household economy and among them is one section which is specially trained for the conduct of the hostels in which they are to be housed in France.

There is as keen and fine a spirit of service among these girls as in any branch of the nation's war organisation. They have given up their employments and joined the Women's Corps because they are as keen as their brothers in "doing their bit." One of the girls before the detachment paraded for the march expressed the spirit in a few sentences:

"We are going to be the finest corps in the British Army," she said, "and that means the finest corps in the whole world. The 'old man' at my office didn't want me to go, but I told him I was going because I wasn't going to stand by doing nothing particular when all the boys were giving up everything. Why, the work I was doing in the office wasn't doing any good and any fool of a man could do it. So here I am and to-night I shall be in France. Just think of it; every one of us women in the corps is as good as two men because every one of us makes two men of some use who were doing no good before.

SMARTEST OF SMART OFFICERS.

"First there is the man at the base who has only been doing the work we are going to do and now will be able to go and fight, and next there is the man at home who has been doing nothing at all and will now have a chance to do the work we have been doing."

The detachment was paraded in the Lecture Hall at the Connaught Club by their draft-conducting officer, Miss Monica Harcourt-Browne, the smartest of young subalterns, who, if she does not hold the rank of lieutenant, ought to. When their kits had been found in order there came into the hall with quick, athletic stride as fine a figure of an inspecting officer as any regimental parade ground could show. She was Miss Blanche Ireland, their drill instructor. She was taller than the rest and a leather belt of the Sam Browne colour girdled her khaki tunic.

Command was in her eye, confidence and competence in her quick movements and easy bearing. She had the "snap" of the Brigade of Guards, and if she has not the rank of captain there is still red tape in Whitehall. She did not keep them waiting while she talked about the weather. She had them formed up in double line, numbered them, and put them at the "'shun" in no time, turned them half-right into boarding-school formation, and then with a smart "By y'r left! Quick! March!" had them out of the place and half-way down the street before they knew they were starting. They marched to the Marble Arch tube station on the way to Waterloo and the port of embarkation.

ABASHED SLACKERS.

Wounded soldiers stood at the salute as they marched down the Edgware-road, boys cheered, and young civilians and "flappers" stood abashed. They looked so eager and so fit, and their short-skirted khaki uniforms with felt hats were so neat and becoming that the "flapper" smartness of the shopping women on the pavements seemed dowdy by comparison.

And their enjoyment of the great adventure upon which they were embarking was the cheerful spirit of their soldier brothers. It was a sight to set off against the gloom of the stay-at-home skirkers. The girls love the life, love the drilling and the khaki and the discipline. Like the boys, they find themselves growing and putting on weight, and they accept the authority of their officers even more readily than the men do. Those who have reached France have taken most kindly to their life and work there, and write happy, grateful letters to their training officers at the depot.

GIRLS FOR FOREIGN SERVICE.

Recruiting for women clerks for the Women's Army Auxiliary Corps proceeded briskly at the Mansion House yesterday.

A steady stream of bright, intelligent, trained girl clerks applied at the office opened by the Women's Section of National Service from nine in the morning till seven at night.

The girls, mostly City workers, came with a very firm idea of the work they wanted to do, and each seemed to know the limit of her own capabilities.

The age limit is 20-30, and many girls of 18 expressed regret that they would not get to France now because the war would be over before they reached the mature age of 20!

Daily Express
-.-1

SPECIAL LAWS FOR WOMEN ONLY.

CODE FOR WORKERS IN FRANCE.

By Our Parliamentary Representative.

Women serving in the Army Auxiliary Corps in France are being recruited on a military basis, but are not to be liable to court-martial. Special arrangements which have been made for maintaining discipline were explained in the House of Commons yesterday by Mr. J. I. Macpherson, Under-Secretary for War.

"The women are normally subject to the Army Act," he stated. "It is clear that it would be undesirable to maintain discipline in such organisations by enforcing he penalties which the Army Act provides, and in consequence a code has been introduced under Defence of the Realm Regulation 42c, which is intended to secure the discipline of women's organisations.

"This regulation provides for the appearance of an offender before a court of summary jurisdiction. A court-martial would only be competent to award a sentence of imprisonment as a minimum, whereas a court of summary jurisdiction can impose a fine.

"Owing to the fact that the members of the Women's Army Auxiliary Corps are neither commissioned nor enlisted, the power of requiring obedience to command within their own organisation does not exist under the Army Act, and it is, therefore, necessary to secure obedience by a code of another description."

Christian
7-7-17

Our Warrior Women.—4.

THEY are in France now setting free men who have been tied doing women's work in offices and kitchens. The spirit of these girls who have gone out from the Y.W.C.A. is shown in these words: "We are proud to have been sent out in the first unit in order that we may try and set the example to those who will follow; you may be sure we are doing our best. . . . The English boys are glad to have us; they have not had English girls for so long: they treat us as sisters." The ideal of the Y.W.C.A. War-time Clubs since they were started is to carry out the Divine plan when God placed man and woman in the first garden; and now away in the destroyed gardens of France we may hope that Y.W.C.A. Huts will stand for this Christian comradeship between our warrior men and women. "My window looks out on the Y.M.C.A. When will our hut be here, and will you come out and open it?" writes a girl to her camp-mother of the Y.W.C.A. "I always think of our Club on Monday evenings." These huts are urgently needed and there is no time to be lost, as the women's Army in France is growing every week. One Hut is already open, and a Club is being opened in the town; others will follow as soon as Club-leaders and money to erect them come in.

If the Y.M.C.A. has been necessary for our soldiers in camp in out-of-the way places, there can be no doubt that the Y.W.C.A. Hut is needed when women go to the lonely moors, vast camps, or crowded towns to take their share of a nation's burdens at this time of anxiety.

During the summer months it will be possible to hold Evangelistic meetings in many centres if we can have the further help of those willing to go into the out-of-the-way places where girls will be found this season.

The Hon. E. Kinnaird, 26, George-street, Hanover Square, London, W., will be glad to receive offers of service.

Daily Mail
19-7-17

THE QUEEN WITH THE WOMEN'S ARMY.

CURTSEYS IN UNIFORM.

DRIVERS' PARADE.

From W. BEACH THOMAS.

FRANCE.

The Queen's visit to France had many golden moments, as when she received from the French people an almost ecstatic welcome in Rouen, where she was visiting hospitals and where under the guidance of the cardinal she spent a happy hour in the glorious cathedral. One day she visited the field of Agincourt and of Crecy with the Prince of Wales, who stood on the spot where the Black Prince first received his feathers. She made an exhaustive tour of the bases, and at intervals saw something of the terror and mechanism of war.

She enjoyed every moment of her 12 days in France, where she lived in some of the most comely of old French châteaus, and no visit could have been more popular. Her journey also had the highest historic importance. It gave a date and a ceremonial sanction to the arrival of women in new domains of work and influence.

One forgot even the war in watching the Queen's successive reviews of these ranks of strong, happy, capable women workers who have streamed over to France to release soldiers and assuage their suffering. We have in France many thousands of women, mostly in uniform—some blue, some grey, some khaki—engaged in a score of different works. They drive cars, ambulances, even lorries. They act the mechanic to their own cars. They are an ordnance department in themselves and prove as good with the plane and chisel as with the sewing machine and needle. They practise every kind of clerkly work and every kind of domestic work.

WOMAN CHEMIST AS DRIVER.

The scene that more than any other appealed to me as marking a stage in social history was her Majesty's inspection of a woman's motor-ambulance convoy on July 6. The convoy contains just over a hundred women drivers alone. As many of them as could be spared from their proper work stood to attention before their cars drawn up in a long avenue. The simple, dark blue uniform became the company singularly well, and looking along the line one saw how many classes and many accomplishments were represented. One I knew as a skilled chemist. Three down the rank was a runner-up for the ladies' golf championship. Nearly opposite was a lady famous here for her skill as a driver, famous everywhere just for her name and family.

The presentation of the head of the group to her Majesty offered a pretty little sign and symbol of—what shall I say?—the integrity of feminine grace. She was in uniform, a little more conspicuous than others by reason of the mauve tabs that indicate staff, and she stood at attention. We watched almost anxiously to see whether she would salute or curtsey. She did curtsey and all was well!

From the ambulance the Queen went to visit two of the most perfect of our new hospitals, the Liverpool Merchants' and St. John Ambulance, both built for the war on almost desert land but now surrounded and intersected with brilliant gardens containing standard roses, herbaceous borders, and the rest, and with their long loggias and sunny wards as pretty and gay as Italy. The Queen spoke with every soldier in one of the fullest wards; and it was interesting to note her continuous interest in the women workers. For example, she asked one of the nurse cooks whether she and the others liked the work, whether they could stand it, whether they kept good health throughout it.

VISIT TO U.S. HOSPITAL.

One incident not included in the original programme was a visit to an American hospital, where her Majesty

"Owing to the fact that the members of the Women's Army Auxiliary Corps are neither commissioned nor enlisted, the power of requiring obedience to command within their own organisation does not exist under the Army Act, and it is, therefore, necessary to secure obedience by a code of another description."

Our Warrior Women.—4.

THEY are in France now setting free men who have been tied doing women's work in offices and kitchens. The spirit of these girls who have gone out from the Y.W.C.A. is shown in these words: "We are proud to have been sent out in the first unit in order that we may try and set the example to those who will follow; you may be sure we are doing our best. . .'. The English boys are glad to have us; they have not had English girls for so long: they treat us as sisters." The ideal of the Y.W.C.A. War-time Clubs since they were started is to carry out the Divine plan when God placed man and woman in the first garden; and now away in the destroyed gardens of France we may hope that Y.W.C.A. Huts will stand for this Christian comradeship between our warrior men and women. "My window looks out on the Y.M.C.A. When will our hut be here, and will you come out and open it?" writes a girl to her camp-mother of the Y.W.C.A. "I always think of our Club on Monday evenings." These huts are urgently needed and there is no time to be lost, as the women's Army in France is growing every week. One Hut is already open, and a Club is being opened in the town; others will follow as soon as Club-leaders and money to erect them come in.

If the Y.M.C.A. has been necessary for our soldiers in camp in out-of-the way places, there can be no doubt that the Y.W.C.A. Hut is needed when women go to the lonely moors, vast camps, or crowded towns to take their share of a nation's burdens at this time of anxiety.

During the summer months it will be possible to hold Evangelistic meetings in many centres if we can have the further help of those willing to go into the out-of-the-way places where girls will be found this season.

The Hon. E. Kinnaird, 26, George-street, Hanover Square, London, W., will be glad to receive offers of service.

---

lar. Her journey also had the highest historic importance. It gave a date and a ceremonial sanction to the arrival of women in new domains of work and influence.

One forgot even the war in watching the Queen's successive reviews of these ranks of strong, happy, capable women workers who have streamed over to France to release soldiers and assuage their suffering. We have in France many thousands of women, mostly in uniform—some blue, some grey, some khaki—engaged in a score of different works. They drive cars, ambulances, even lorries. They act the mechanic to their own cars. They are an ordnance department in themselves and prove as good with the plane and chisel as with the sewing machine and needle. They practise every kind of clerkly work and every kind of domestic work.

WOMAN CHEMIST AS DRIVER.

The scene that more than any other appealed to me as marking a stage in social history was her Majesty's inspection of a woman's motor-ambulance convoy on July 6. The convoy contains just over a hundred women drivers alone. As many of them as could be spared from their proper work stood to attention before their cars drawn up in a long avenue. The simple, dark blue uniform became the company singularly well, and looking along the line one saw how many classes and many accomplishments were represented. One I knew as a skilled chemist. Three down the rank was a runner-up for the ladies' golf championship. Nearly opposite was a lady famous here for her skill as a driver, famous everywhere just for her name and family.

The presentation of the head of the group to her Majesty offered a pretty little sign and symbol of—what shall I say?—the integrity of feminine grace. She was in uniform, a little more conspicuous than others by reason of the mauve tabs that indicate staff, and she stood at attention. We watched almost anxiously to see whether she would salute or curtsey. She did curtsey and all was well!

From the ambulance the Queen went to visit two of the most perfect of our new hospitals, the Liverpool Merchants' and St. John Ambulance, both built for the war on almost desert land but now surrounded and intersected with brilliant gardens containing standard roses, herbaceous borders, and the rest, and with their long loggias and sunny wards as pretty and gay as Italy. The Queen spoke with every soldier in one of the fullest wards; and it was interesting to note her continuous interest in the women workers. For example, she asked one of the nurse cooks whether she and the others liked the work, whether they could stand it, whether they kept good health throughout it.

VISIT TO U.S. HOSPITAL.

One incident not included in the original programme was a visit to an American hospital, where her Majesty received a most enthusiastic welcome. She shook hands with all the medical staff, complimented the nursing staff, went through the wards, and said how deeply the British Army appreciated the noble work the United States' Medical Corps was doing in its midst. The Queen everywhere had a great personal success. The general admiration was quaintly expressed by an American of the best Republican views: "She is too good a woman to be a Queen," she said.

During the morning of July 7 the Queen visited a large casualty clearing station and inspected a motor-ambulance convoy, afterwards lunching with the Deputy-Director of Medical Services. In the afternoon her Majesty saw a collection of tanks, some new, some battered. A variety of manœuvres were carried out, and the Queen saw these queer-looking monsters march past in procession at quite a respectable speed and climb and descend apparently insuperable obstacles.

Throughout her tour the Queen was chiefly occupied with the inspection of the hospitals and in visiting women workers, but she saw, too, something of war. On the very day of her arrival she met by accident a battalion about to en-

Daily News
16.1.19

WOMEN CARPENTERS FROM FRANCE.

Lighter Side of Their Life in Camp.

From Our Own Correspondent.

WEYBRIDGE, Wednesday.

A number of girl carpenters home from France were hard at work when I called to interview them. They were cheery damsels, and were not in any way loth to tell of their experiences abroad. One of the "originals," who crossed the Channel exactly two years ago, acted as chief spokesman.

"The first few months were the worst," she said. "Our billet on the hill above Calais was a quagmire, but we didn't expect all honey, so we stuck there, and by the time the second batch arrived we had put up huts suitably named, 'Ritz,' 'Better 'Ole,' 'Kiora,' and so on.

"Our works were situated on the canal banks. We were on one side, and the men who worked the saws on the other. The men simply cut lengths of wood which we trimmed and made into sections of Tarrant portable huts, which were taken forward.

"The work was monotonous, but we had ample recreation and concerts. We were allowed out each evening until nine o'clock. Some of us found this time limit irksome, and often was the wire fence surrounding our encampment snipped through by our gallant escorts to let us in when we were late.

"We had more than a taste of warfare. For a long time we were bombed by enemy planes night after night, but after the first visitation we built a 'dug-out,' and there we adjourned when our parties were interrupted. Now we're demobilised quite a lot of us want to carry on."

I saw some of their work, and considering they have not served a long apprenticeship the doors and frames they have made are excellent. Their assistance will certainly be utilised in the housebuilding era which is about to commence.

Daily Express
..1-

Daily
19 7

SPECIAL LAWS FOR WOMEN ONLY.

CODE FOR WORKERS IN FRANCE.

By Our Parliamentary Representative.

Women serving in the Army Auxiliary Corps in France are being recruited on a military basis, but are not to be liable to court-martial. Special arrangements which have been made for maintaining discipline were explained in the House of Commons yesterday by Mr. J. I. Macpherson, Under-Secretary for War.

"The women are normally subject to the Army Act," he stated. "It is clear that it would be undesirable to maintain discipline in such organisations by enforcing the penalties which the Army Act provides, and in consequence a code has been introduced under Defence of the Realm Regulation 42c, which is intended to secure the discipline of women's organisations.

"This regulation provides for the appearance of an offender before a court of summary jurisdiction. A court-martial would only be competent to award a sentence of imprisonment as a minimum, whereas a court of summary jurisdiction can impose a fine.

"Owing to the fact that the members of the Women's Army Auxiliary Corps are neither commissioned nor enlisted, the power of requiring obedience to command within their own organisation does not exist under the Army Act, and it is, therefore, necessary to secure obedience by a code of another description."

Christian
7.17.17

Our Warrior Women.—4.

THEY are in France now setting free men who have been tied doing women's work in offices and kitchens. The spirit of these girls who have gone out from the Y.W.C.A. is shown in these words: "We are proud to have been sent out in the first unit in order that we may try and set the example to those who will follow; you may be sure we are doing our best. . . . The English boys are glad to have us; they have not had English girls for so long: they treat us as sisters." The ideal of the Y.W.C.A. War-time Clubs since they were started is to carry out the Divine plan when God placed man and woman in the first garden; and now away in the destroyed gardens of France we may hope that Y.W.C.A. Huts will stand for this Christian comradeship between our warrior men and women. "My window looks out on the Y.M.C.A. When will our hut be here, and will you come out and open it?" writes a girl to her camp-mother of the Y.W.C.A. "I always think of our Club on Monday evenings." These huts are urgently needed and there is no time to be lost, as the women's Army in France is growing every week. One Hut is already open, and a Club is being opened in the town; others will follow as soon as Club-leaders and money to erect them come in.

If the Y.M.C.A. has been necessary for our soldiers in camp in out-of-the way places, there can be no doubt that the Y.W.C.A. Hut is needed when women go to the lonely moors, vast camps, or crowded towns to take their share of a nation's burdens at this time of anxiety.

During the summer months it will be possible to hold Evangelistic meetings in many centres if we can have the further help of those willing to go into the out-of-the-way places where girls will be found this season.

The Hon. E. Kinnaird, 26, George-street, Hanover Square, London, W., will be glad to receive offers of service.

682

things that matter, she asked them first about the weight of their packs and accoutrements and herself lifted the haversacks to test their burden.

And the Queen saw pictures of war almost realistic enough to appear real. She saw in epitome all the mechanical frightfulness that this war has bred. With a very small group of officers she watched it all for an hour at close quarters and saw more of one side of war than many soldiers, though away from the battlefield nothing designed by Brock was ever more picturesque than flame and boiling oil and gas and smoke as used in modern war.

The Queen had scarcely stepped out of her car or had time to glimpse at a country view singularly rich and spacious even for France when just in front of her a gush of the reddest flame wreathed in the blackest smoke hissed out from an ambushed machine. The jet had breadth and volume and speed and reached a great distance, and nothing within its touch could have lived a moment, however well protected. The machine was a trench flame-thrower, a variety of the infernal machine specially recommended by General von Armin, who commanded the enemy on the Somme. This spectacle was no more than the beginning of the mechanical and chemical terrors presented before the Queen. She saw a bombardment with gas; she saw a projection of flame more vivid than the flame-thrower; and most spectacular—perhaps most useful of all—was a full-dress smoke "barrage."

AIR GYMNASTICS.

Half an hour later the Queen, who had already inspected with great interest the repairing and building of the machines, was standing in front of a great rank of aeroplanes, watching the antics of two which had left the ground. It was a stormy day, with some clouds not more than 1,000 feet high. One young pilot shot into the ambush of the storm-cloud and was lost to view for perhaps half a minute, when he reappeared in a spinning nose-dive so like a genuine fall as thoroughly to frighten more than one member of the party. He spun round and round, checked and reversed his spin, tumbling continuously till he was quite close to the ground, when he straightened, lifted, and shot upwards again. Presently both machines tore past a hundred feet or so off the ground, while the general of the Royal Flying Corps explained to the Queen what speed these machines could attain.

All the later part of the Queen's stay was spent, as I have said, in Rouen or in Army depots or bases. That part of the tour which coincided with the King's has already been described. It was fitting that when the royal party left a group of the first women's unit to work by themselves in France was drawn up on the quay to join in the parting cheer.

CAPTURED HUN SHIPS.

COMICAL GERMAN ADVICE TO HOLLAND.

From CHARLES TOWER.

THE HAGUE, Monday.

One of the crew of the German steamship Renata Leonhardt, which formed part of the German convoy from Rotterdam, has given the following account of the capture of the ships to-day:—

"We left Rotterdam at 11 p.m. last evening (Sunday), and at 6.30 were sailing off Egmond (on the Dutch coast just on the edge of the British danger zone), when we sighted 19 British vessels. We were sailing in two groups, four ahead and three astern.

"The British destroyers ran past the four leading ships, cut them off from the shore, and probably captured the lot.

"We were warned by shots to heave to, but refused. The crews were ordered on deck and we ran at full speed for the shore.

"The Heinz Blumberg ran ashore some distance from us, but the British towed her off and took her away. The Lavinia was set on fire by shells. The Renata Leonhardt was hit amidships by a shell which killed 3 and wounded 1 man.

AMSTERDAM, Wednesday.

The Alkmaar Courant, as quoted by the New Rotterdam Courant, states that a large quantity of foods was found in the cabins of the two German steamers which stranded off Bergen.—Reuter.

AMSTERDAM, Monday.

According to the Telegraaf, two of the British destroyers, while firing on the German convoy this morning, were within territorial waters. A Hague message states that the Government is opening an inquiry.—Exchange.

COPENHAGEN, Wednesday.

Commenting on the capture by British warships of German steamers and the report that shells fell on Dutch territory, Voss's Gazette, of Berlin, writes: "The whole issue now depends on the attitude of the Dutch Government in the face of such a violation. The usual protest is not sufficient and would only prove that England can treat Holland have been made for maintaining discipline were explained in the House of Commons yesterday by Mr. J. I. Macpherson, Under-Secretary for War.

"The women are normally subject to the Army Act," he stated. "It is clear that it would be undesirable to maintain discipline in such organisations by enforcing he penalties which the Army Act provides, and in consequence a code has been introduced under Defence of the Realm Regulation 42c, which is intended to secure the discipline of women's organisations.

"This regulation provides for the appearance of an offender before a court of summary jurisdiction. A court-martial would only be competent to award a sentence of imprisonment as a minimum, whereas a court of summary jurisdiction can impose a fine.

"Owing to the fact that the members of the Women's Army Auxiliary Corps are neither commissioned nor enlisted, the power of requiring obedience to command within their own organisation does not exist under the Army Act, and it is, therefore, necessary to secure obedience by a code of another description."

Christian
7.6.17

Our Warrior Women.—4.

THEY are in France now setting free men who have been tied doing women's work in offices and kitchens. The spirit of these girls who have gone out from the Y.W.C.A. is shown in these words: "We are proud to have been sent out in the first unit in order that we may try and set the example to those who will follow; you may be sure we are doing our best. . . . The English boys are glad to have us; they have not had English girls for so long: they treat us as sisters." The ideal of the Y.W.C.A. War-time Clubs since they were started is to carry out the Divine plan when God placed man and woman in the first garden; and now away in the destroyed gardens of France we may hope that Y.W.C.A. Huts will stand for this Christian comradeship between our warrior men and women. "My window looks out on the Y.M.C.A. When will our hut be here, and will you come out and open it?" writes a girl to her camp-mother of the Y.W.C.A. "I always think of our Club on Monday evenings." These huts are urgently needed and there is no time to be lost, as the women's Army in France is growing every week. One Hut is already open, and a Club is being opened in the town; others will follow as soon as Club-leaders and money to erect them come in.

If the Y.M.C.A. has been necessary for our soldiers in camp in out-of-the way places, there can be no doubt that the Y.W.C.A. Hut is needed when women go to the lonely moors, vast camps, or crowded towns to take their share of a nation's burdens at this time of anxiety.

During the summer months it will be possible to hold Evangelistic meetings in many centres if we can have the further help of those willing to go into the out-of-the-way places where girls will be found this season.

The Hon. E. Kinnaird, 26, George-street, Hanover Square, London, W., will be glad to receive offers of service.

a gush of the reddest flame wreathed in the blackest smoke hissed out from an ambushed machine. The jet had breadth and volume and speed and reached a great distance, and nothing within its touch could have lived a moment, however well protected. The machine was a trench flame-thrower, a variety of the infernal machine specially recommended by General von Armin, who commanded the enemy on the Somme. This spectacle was no more than the beginning of the mechanical and chemical terrors presented before the Queen. She saw a bombardment with gas; she saw a projection of flame more vivid than the flame-thrower; and most spectacular—perhaps most useful of all—was a full-dress smoke "barrage."

AIR GYMNASTICS.

Half an hour later the Queen, who had already inspected with great interest the repairing and building of the machines, was standing in front of a great rank of aeroplanes, watching the antics of two which had left the ground. It was a stormy day, with some clouds not more than 1,000 feet high. One young pilot shot into the ambush of the storm-cloud and was lost to view for perhaps half a minute, when he reappeared in a spinning nose-dive so like a genuine fall as thoroughly to frighten more than one member of the party. He spun round and round, checked and reversed his spin, tumbling continuously till he was quite close to the ground, when he straightened, lifted, and shot upwards again. Presently both machines tore past a hundred feet or so off the ground, while the general of the Royal Flying Corps explained to the Queen what speed these machines could attain.

All the later part of the Queen's stay was spent, as I have said, in Rouen or in Army depots or bases. That part of the tour which coincided with the King's has already been described. It was fitting that when the royal party left a group of the first women's unit to work by themselves in France was drawn up on the quay to join in the parting cheer.

CAPTURED HUN SHIPS.

COMICAL GERMAN ADVICE TO HOLLAND.

From CHARLES TOWER.

THE HAGUE, Monday.

One of the crew of the German steamship Renata Leonhardt, which formed part of the German convoy from Rotterdam, has given the following account of the capture of the ships to-day:—

"We left Rotterdam at 11 p.m. last evening (Sunday), and at 6.30 were sailing off Egmond (on the Dutch coast just on the edge of the British danger zone), when we sighted 19 British vessels. We were sailing in two groups, four ahead and three astern.

"The British destroyers ran past the four leading ships, cut them off from the shore, and probably captured the lot.

"We were warned by shots to heave to, but refused. The crews were ordered on deck and we ran at full speed for the shore.

"The Heinz Blumberg ran ashore some distance from us, but the British towed her off and took her away. The Lavinia was set on fire by shells. The Renata Leonhardt was hit amidships by a shell which killed 3 and wounded 1 man.

AMSTERDAM, Wednesday.

The Alkmaar Courant, as quoted by the New Rotterdam Courant, states that a large quantity of foods was found in the cabins of the two German steamers which stranded off Bergen.—Reuter.

AMSTERDAM, Monday.

According to the Telegraaf, two of the British destroyers, while firing on the German convoy this morning, were within territorial waters. A Hague message states that the Government is opening an inquiry. —Exchange.

COPENHAGEN, Wednesday.

Commenting on the capture by British warships of German steamers and the report that shells fell on Dutch territory, Voss's Gazette, of Berlin, writes: "The whole issue now depends on the attitude of the Dutch Government in the face of such a violation. The usual protest is not sufficient and would only prove that England can treat Holland as it wants to. The Dutch Government, however, must understand that we demand positive measures and not mere words. If it wishes that we shall continue to regard Holland as really neutral, if Holland does not show firmness and inflexibility now, it must resign itself to its fate."—Exchange.

(Voss's Gazette finds it convenient to forget the innumerable occasions on which German warships have been in action in neutral waters.)

COUNTESS'S SOAP.

ATTEMPT TO SMUGGLE GOODS INTO GERMANY.

The Lausanne Gazette quotes the following from the Echo of the Rhine Falls:—

"Countess Khevenhüller, née von Fürstenberg, who arrived at Schaffhausen from Zürich, presented a letter to the customs authorities signed 'U. Wille, Commander of the Swiss Army,' requesting them to deal gently with her luggage. Two of her five trunks were, notwithstanding, opened, and there was found a quantity of articles, such as cloth, chocolate, and soap, which it is against the law to export. The lady was going to the German town of Konstanz Bechingen, 17 miles from Constance, and she [illegible]

Daily News
16.1.19

WOMEN CARPENTERS FROM FRANCE.

Lighter Side of Their Life in Camp.

From Our Own Correspondent.

WEYBRIDGE, Wednesday.

A number of girl carpenters home from France were hard at work when I called to interview them. They were cheery damsels, and were not in any way loth to tell of their experiences abroad. One of the "originals," who crossed the Channel exactly two years ago, acted as chief spokesman.

"The first few months were the worst," she said. "Our billet on the hill above Calais was a quagmire, but we didn't expect all honey, so we stuck there, and by the time the second batch arrived we had put up huts suitably named, 'Ritz,' 'Better 'Ole,' 'Kiora,' and so on.

"Our works were situated on the canal banks. We were on one side, and the men who worked the saws on the other. The men simply cut lengths of wood which we trimmed and made into sections of Tarrant portable huts, which were taken forward.

"The work was monotonous, but we had ample recreation and concerts. We were allowed out each evening until nine o'clock. Some of us found this time limit irksome, and often was the wire fence surrounding our encampment snipped through by our gallant escorts to let us in when we were late.

"We had more than a taste of warfare. For a long time we were bombed by enemy planes night after night, but after the first visitation we built a 'dug-out,' and there we adjourned when our parties were interrupted. Now we're demobilised quite a lot of us want to carry on."

I saw some of their work, and considering they have not served a long apprenticeship the doors and frames they have made are excellent. Their assistance will certainly be utilised in the housebuilding era which is about to commence.

Daily Telegraph 24.2.20

682 A

THE CIVIL SERVICE.

SUGGESTED REFORMS.

PAY AND STATUS OF WOMEN.

The secretaries of the National Council for the Civil Service (Administrative and Legal Departments) issued yesterday the report of the special committee on the reorganisation of the service. The terms of reference to the committee were "to consider the scope of the duties at present allotted to the clerical classes in the Civil Services, to report on the organisation most appropriate to secure the effective performance of these duties, and to make recommendations as to scales of salary and method of recruitment."

In the general observations the Committee mention that the five years of war have left their mark upon the Civil Service. They add: "Perhaps the most important feature that distinguishes our inquiry from any that have gone before it is its recognition of a new principle of co-operation in the public service. It is only six months since the first meeting was held of the National Council, which embodied the application of the Whitley method to the administrative and legal departments of the Civil Service. That a group of persons drawn from every part of a graded service of the Crown should be able to present an agreed report upon the form and shape their service should take is a notable and hopeful achievement."

With regard to the employment and status of women in the Civil Service, the report states: "We appreciate that it is not possible at this stage to attempt a final solution of the novel and complex problems involved in the employment of women side by side with men throughout the several classes of a graded service of the Crown. We are by common consent breaking new ground. But it has been our earnest endeavour, while realising that we are working in a field of strictly limited experience, to ensure that the opportunities afforded to women of proving their fitness to discharge the higher administrative duties of the Civil Service shall be full and liberal. In the application of this principle we were met at the outset with the claim, which has the support of a number of members of your Committee, that in recruitment, status, pay, and general conditions of service, there should be no differentiation between the sexes. In the direction of meeting this claim the Committee are agreed that within the parallel classes of the Civil Service women should be given a status and authority identical with that accorded to men. Further, whilst we propose that during the experimental period there should be separate establishment lists for men and for women within each class of the Civil Service, and that promotion for men and for women should proceed separately as vacancies occur in the higher establishment reserved for either sex, we are of opinion that the principles of training and of promotion that we have recommended for men should be applied equally to the parallel women classes, and that it should be the duty of departments, under the general guidance of the Establishments Department of the Treasury, to see to it that women are regarded as available for employment on the same work as men within the several classes, and that women are given the widest opportunities of proving their administrative capacity. Whether the interests of efficiency will best be served by segregation, or by the employment of women and men side by side, is a matter on which experience varies, and we suggest that the requirements of departments in this respect might appropriately be discussed at the Departmental Councils. It may fairly be argued that in order to obtain the full value of the experiment every oportunity should be given for men and women to work side by side. As regards pay, we are agreed that the minimum of the basic scale in each class should be the same for women and for men, and that the incremental rates should be identical up to a point."

With regard to the clerical class, it is agreed that experience has established that women are fully capable of discharging the clerical work of the Civil Service, and it is recommended that women should be recruited to the clerical class by the method of open competition by written examination. As to the recruitment of the administrative and executive grades, the official side of the committee, while desiring to retain for men the method of open competition by written examination, advocates in the case of women at the present stage a system of selection by impartial and authoritative boards.

FOUR CLASSES.

As to the manner in which persons recruited to the administrative and clerical branches should be classified and graded, and at what rates of remuneration and under what conditions of service they should be employed, the committee state: "The administrative and clerical work of the Civil Service may be said broadly to fall into two main categories. In one category may be placed all such work as either is of a simple mechanical kind or consists in the application of well-defined regulations, decisions, and practices to particular cases; in the other category the work which is concerned with the formation of policy, with the revision of existing practice or current regulations and decisions, and with the organisation and direction of the business of Government. For work so different in kind it is clearly necessary to secure more than one type of agent. Qualifications adapted to the performance of the simplest kind of work would be unequal to the discharge of the highest kind of work; and it would be impossible to justify the employment on simple mechanical duties of persons capable of performing the highest duties. After the most careful consideration we have agreed that in order properly to provide for the work falling within those two main categories, it will be necessary to employ not less than four different classes, namely:

(a) A writing class for simple mechanical work;
(b) A clerical class for the better sort of work included in the first main category defined above;
(c) An executive class; and
(d) An administrative class for the work included in the second main category defined above."

"Our anticipation is that the total number of writing assistants employed in the service as a whole will not be more than one-fourth of the total number of the staff employed in the clerical class, hereafter proposed (i.e., one-fifth of the total number of the two classes combined), and we propose that if at any time a material increase in this proportion appears likely, the whole question of the employment of writing assistants should be reviewed as a matter of principal by the National Council."

To the clerical class the committee would entrust all the simpler clerical duties in public departments in so far as these are not assigned to writing assistants. It is recommended that direct recruitment to this class should be by open, competitive, written examination, with age limits of 16-17 for boys and 16½ to 17½ for girls.

To the executive class the committee would assign the higher work of supply and accounting departments and of other executive or specialised branches of the Civil Service. "We are of opinion that in so far as it may be desirable to appoint men from outside the service to the staffs of these departments and branches, recruitment should be by open competitive written examination between the ages of 18 and 19. The sylabus of examination should be framed with reference to the standard of development reached at the end of a secondary school course. We have not been able to recommend the immediate extension of this mode of recruitment to women, and have agreed that women candidates for the staffs of these departments and branches should during the period of experiment be recruited by means of authoritative and impartial selection boards, between the ages of 18 and 25. Entrants of both sexes so recruited should be regarded as members of a training grade, and during the term of their employment in this grade they should be given the widest possible training in all branches of the work of the department or branch to which they are assigned.

TRAINING GRADE.

"Whilst we consider it necessary that provision should be made for the recruitment to those departments and branches of persons from outside the Service, we contemplate that a considerable proportion of executive class posts will be filled by promotion from the clerical class. Undoubtedly many members of this class will be found to possess qualifications for higher than clerical work. We recommend accordingly that the training grade should be open to men and women selected from the clerical class in the early stages of their career on account of proved ability, and potential capacity for the discharge in due course of higher work. A selection board should be established in each Government office to investigate and decide on the qualifications of members of the clerical class recommended by the heads of their respective branches as having the necessary qualifications for admission to the grade, and a central pooling arrangement should be provided to meet the case of those members of the clerical class who, though fit for admission to the grade, have no opening within their own office. We do not contemplate that all offices will contain members of both the clerical and the executive classes. In departments when the executive class is not employed, there should be posts corresponding in grading and pay to those of the higher grade of the executive class."

Dealing at length with the work of the administrative class, the report states that the duties appropriate to this class are those concerned with the formation of policy, with the co-ordination and improvement of Government machinery, and with the general administration and control of the Departments of the Public Service. "For the effective performance of these duties, officers of the highest standard of qualification are needed," continues the report. "We propose that such officers should be obtained partly by selection from inside the Service and partly by recruitment from outside the Service. Experience has shown that the higher administrative work of the Public Service requires for its discharge a proportion of men recruited at the University leaving age, and we recommend therefore that provision should be made for the continuance of the present system by which men are selected for appointment to the Public Service by means of an open competitive examination in the subjects embraced by the various honours courses of University institutions. We are agreed that, during the period of experiment this mode of recruitment should be limited to men, and that women directly recruited to the administrative class should be chosen between the ages of 22 and 30 by an authoritative and impartial selection board—with or without qualifying examination.

"The special requirements of the administrative work constitute a clear justification for bringing into the public service persons possessing the high educational qualifications described above. We do not, however, contemplate that recruitment to the administrative class should be solely from outside the Service. On the contrary, our view is that the class should be open to all men and women already employed in the Service who show early proof of real ability and promise of being able to discharge, in course of time, higher administrative functions. In order to [illegible] such cases, we recommend that a central authority should be established to investigate and decide on the qualifications of candidates recommended by the heads of their respective departments.

"Men and women so recruited should be regarded as a cadet corps, from which selection should be made to higher administrative posts, and members of this corps should be treated, so far as practicable, as a body available for service in any department in which the administrative class is employed. It is, in our view, important that the number of persons recruited to the cadet corps of the administrative class should be limited to the strict minimum required to provide adequately for the work of the higher administrative positions in the public service, and that the recruits so obtained should have assigned to them the responsible duties for the performance of which they have been engaged as soon as they have passed through the necessary period of preliminary training.

"We consider, therefore, that the ratio of the number of cadets to that of the higher administrative posts should be so adjusted as to secure that in practice cadets will be able to count upon promotion to substantive administrative rank as soon as they become fully qualified to discharge the duties and responsibilities attaching thereto. We believe that if departments, in co-operation with the Treasury, carefully regulate their establishments at the outset, and from time to time, so as to conform to this conception of the junior grade as a training corps, they will be enabled to give effect to the anticipations expressed above. We are of opinion that well-qualified officers of other classes who have not been chosen for admission to the Cadet corps in the early stages of their career, should be eligible for employment on work of the same kind as is entrusted to officers in the course of their service in the cadet corps.'

In concluding this section of the report the Committee state: "We have found ourselves in entire agreement with the views expressed by the Royal Commission on the Civil Service regarding the evil effects of employing temporary clerical staff on permanent work. Our intention is that all the classes proposed by us should be employed on a permanent and pensionable footing. Secondly, it will be observed that in drawing up our scheme we have been careful to propose age limits for recruitment, so as to correspond as closely as possible with the completion of well-defined stages in the educational system of the country. Thirdly, we have endeavoured throughout our whole scheme to secure that as far as possible persons recruited to the Service at different ages and by different tests should be placed on an equality for the purpose of opportunity of promotion to higher posts. We feel strongly that artificial barriers to promotion, where now they exist, should be removed, and that material hindrances must not be allowed to block merit and ability."

There is a separate section of the report dealing with typists and shorthand-typists, two grades which are intimately related to the work of the clerical and administrative classes. The Committee propose that the two grades—women typists and shorthand-typists—shall in future form two separate classes, the numbers in each class being settled on the basis of the requirements of each department. The remainder of the report treats of the principles of assimilation during a period of reconstruction, and the Committee say they are not yet in a position to make definite recommendations as to the basis on which existing rates of salary should be adjusted in consequence of transfer.

682a/6

Manchester Guardian 5 May 1917

683/1

Daily Express May 8th

683 ~~901~~ The Telegraph 24.5.

ENGINEERS' STRIKE NOT SETTLED.

PARTIAL RESUMPTION.

TO-DAY'S IMPORTANT CONFERENCE.

There was no great change in the situation yesterday in regard to the strike of engineers. ThTe decisions which were taken on SaSturday to resume work appear to have been translated into action yesterday, but on the other hand men came out on strike at Liverpool and Birkenhead in accordance with resolutions previously passed, and at Preston.

In Manchester there was no general resumption of work; in fact the proportion of men who turned up at the shops is estimated as a small one. At a meeting of the strikers held yesterday their willingness to work provided the dilution clause was dropped from the bill was again repeated, and it was decided to meet again to-morrow to hear the report of the delegates who are attending to-day's conference of the Strike Committees in London. After hearing the report a ballot will be taken, and it is expected that as a result of the vote work will be resumed on Thursday morning. Similar proceedings will take place to-morrow at Oldham, Leigh, Ashton-under-Lyne, and Bolton.

Thus the situation appears to hinge on to-day's conference in London, and until the result is known the men are marking time. The object of the London conference, it is said, is to decide on a common line of action, and the delegates are hoping to meet representatives of the Ministry of Munitions, where the points at issue will be discussed.

In the course of an interview yesterday Dr. Addison, the Minister of MMunitions, pointed out that the strike was delaying the production of very essential work, and said that the proposals for the protection of industries in the amended bill had grossly misrepresented. The Government, he intimated, would not withdraw the dilution clause.

Women and the Strike.

A statement as to the position of women in relation to the strike was issued yesterday by the Manchester, Salford, and District Women's War Interests Committee, under the signatures of Mrs. Annot E. Robinson and Mrs. J. R. Tomlinson. It draws attention to difficulties which have arisen through the introduction of women to the engineering industry and because of the liberty given to employers to pay what rates they liked to unskilled workers; and to the unrest and suspicion engendered by the introduction of women on as many processes as possible, and the wide discussion at employers' conferences of the permanent employment of women in engineering after the war. The result, the statement points out, has been a refusal by the men to allow women to be employed on permanent commercial work as distinguished from the emergency labour of the production of munitions. It continues:—

The withdrawal of the trade card scheme, by removing more men, renders dilution on private work still more necessary, so that the present dispute really centres round the further employment of women in the engineering trade. The present crisis is but an indication of what is likely to come after the war. Ill-feeling is being created between the men and the women, which cannot be good for trade unionism or for industry as a whole. So far all the dilution agreements in the engineering trade have been drawn up to safeguard the interests of men. It cannot be too strongly emphasised that any settlement which is to bring national and lasting satisfaction can be arrived at only if the women's interests are fully recognised during the emergency period, and the extension of industrial openings for women be recognised as the problem that perhaps requires the most sympathetic and skilful handling of all the many issues arising from the war.'

The Munitions of War Bill.

The Ministry of Munitions desire to point out that the Munitions of War Bill is intro-

TOO MUCH SECRECY.

On Saturday afternoon the Prime Minister personally intervened in the engineers' dispute, with the result that a settlement was speedily arrived at. The trouble is not yet quite over. The Manchester men threaten to strike again unless the arrested men are unconditionally released. These arrests have brought the Barrow men, who had not struck before, out of the shops. The muddle-headed blundering that fomented the strike and prevented an arrangement continues when terms have been settled. Very plain speaking is an evident public duty. The Ministry of Munitions, instead of taking prompt measures to bring the dispute to an end, contrived to keep the whole affair a secret, while Dr. Addison stood on his dignity and refused to meet the strikers' spokesmen. When the matter could be no longer hushed up, the refusal to listen to grievances was maintained. On Friday some of the spokesmen were arrested, and within a few hours their colleagues were in consultation with the Prime Minister. Inconsistency followed inconsistency, and but for Mr. Lloyd George the country might have been plunged into industrial chaos. It is now commonly understood that the Government has no intention of proceeding with the prosecution of the men under arrest. That at least is the opinion of the delegates. Why not say so? Secrecy is holding back the output of munitions so necessary for the troops at the front. Further, one of the delegates said yesterday that the Government has promised amendment of the Munitions of War Amendment Bill. If this is true, why not officially announce it and remove the rock of offence? What does a Minister's dignity matter at a time like this? The conference that took place on Saturday could have taken place a fortnight ago, and all the trouble would have been prevented. The conciliation effected by Mr. Lloyd George should have been effected by Mr. Hodge. We have nothing but condemnation for strikes in war time. We have equal condemnation for the want of tact and foresight that encourages strikes.

STRIKE LEADERS FREE.

CHARGES WITHDRAWN.

SIR F. SMITH'S GRAVE WARNING.

A long queue of sympathisers with the engineer strike leaders who were arrested last week in several parts of the country in connection with the strike movement waited outside Bow-street Police-court yesterday in anticipation of the adjourned proceedings before Sir John Dickinson, for charges under the Defence of the Realm Regulations. The defendants were: Thomas Walter Dingley, mechanic, Marlborough-road, Stoke; Neal Cassidy, mechanic, Oliver-street, Coventry; Stanley Burgess, turner, Empire-road, Sheffield; Walter Hill, mechanic, Coupe-road, Pitsmoor, Sheffield; Arthur M. Manns, engineer, Oak Leigh, Quebrook, Liverpool; Percy Henry Kealey, metal turner, Gorton, Manchester; Walter Foster Watson, 35, engineer, Priory-road, Acton-green; and George Peet, fitter, Abbey Hey-lane, Gorton, Manchester.

It was understood that the case would be heard at two o'clock, and the defendants were brought into court before eleven o'clock, and were told of this arrangement. When the hearing was resumed in the afternoon a large crowd was present in court, many of the men wearing badges. Mr. W. C. Anderson, M.P., and Miss Mary Macarthur occupied seats in the body of the court. There was a private conversation between the Attorney-General (Sir F. E. Smith, K.C.) and Mr. Ellis Griffith, K.C., and Mr. Slesser (for the defence), before the magistrate, Sir John Dickinson, took his seat.

After the defendants had been ushered into court the Attorney-General said the charges which it had been intended to prefer were under the Defence of the Realm Regulations (with which the magistrate would be familiar), which made it an offence to impede the supply of munitions. It had been intended to treat the offence as an indictable offence, and to prefer the charge before a jury. That course had, under the circumstances—which the magistrate would probably think would require some explanation—become unnecessary. The men had signed an undertaking which he would read, as it would be relevant to the position which the magistrate would adopt. The statement read:

"I undertake to adhere to the agreement arrived at on Saturday, May 19, 1917, between the Ministry of Munitions and the Executive Council of the Amalgamated Society of Engineers, acting at the request of the Unofficial Strike Committee and on their behalf."

UNDERTAKING SIGNED.

That undertaking had been signed by every one of the defendants who appeared yesterday, and it was proper that he should state in the plainest possible language that had not that undertaking, couched in these terms, been unreservedly accepted by the defendants, the proceedings would have been prosecuted by the Government until they had reached a conclusion before a jury at the Sessions. The magistrate had justly observed that the matter was a most grave one, and if every one of these defendants was indicted he might have been subjected to a maximum penalty of penal servitude for life. In those circumstances, it would probably require on his part some explanation of the circumstances in which he undertook the responsibility for the grave course which had been adopted that day. It was well known amongst certain sections of the population that, in the main, the engineers, and those who worked with them, had been carrying on the work for the manufacture of munitions and other implements of war, and that they had laboured in the common cause of this country with our soldiers in the field, though under conditions which were safer and easier than was possible for the soldiers in the field.

There never had been any mistake in the minds of the Government of this country that the overwhelming majority of the men had been doing a great national work during the war, and doing it as loyally as the soldiers in the field. It was no doubt true, and it would be strange if it were not true, that these men, working constantly long hours and at high pressure, from time to time laboured under some grievance needing adjustment. The Attorney-General went on to say that there had never been a moment when the Government of the country were not prepared and anxious to listen with the greatest sympathy to the expression of just and reasonable demands, but it was essential that the Government should deal with the executives of the trade unions, and not with unofficial bodies of the men. Otherwise, there would be chaos. He concluded by saying that the agreement signed by the defendants on Saturday made it possible for him to withdraw the prosecution.

PROMOTING STRIKES.

The Attorney-General said if the defendants could induce their fellow members to elect them to the responsible positions in the trade union, the matter assumed a totally different aspect, and in those circumstances they would find the Government as loyal to them as the Government had been loyal during the negotiations to those who at this moment alone stood in the position of constituted authority in the trade union. Proceeding, he said he did not wish to say a single word which might breed bitterness in the future. He would address his few remaining words, not necessarily at all to the defendants; he said quite plainly that there were men who had been forward in promoting the recent strike whose motives, in the judgment of the executive, were not primarily [illegible] period, and the extension of industrial openings for women be recognised as the problem that perhaps requires the most sympathetic and skilful handling of all the many issues arising from the war.[4]

The Munitions of War Bill.

The Ministry of Munitions desire to point out that the Munitions of War Bill is introduced merely as a war measure, and an amendment is now being put down by the Government to make it clear that dilution on private work shall cease to operate as from the termination of the war.

Since War Service badges and trade cards no longer give protection from military service, the Ministry of Munitions have arranged to give protection certificates to those who are engaged on munitions in an occupation which is scheduled as essential.

Protection certificates are now being issued by the new munition area recruiting officers to all munition workers entitled to them under the schedule of protected operations. A large number of these certificates have already been sent out by Lieutenant A. Lowe, the munition area recruiting officer for Manchester, and it is hoped to complete the issue at no distant date. Captain B. Copley is the responsible authority for the issue of the protection certificates in the Ashton-under-Lyne area.

Those who do not receive certificates, and think they are entitled to them, should lodge claims with the Enlistment Complaints Committee on forms which may be obtained at any Employment Exchange.

responsible positions in the trade union, the matter assumed a totally different aspect, and in those circumstances they would find the Government as loyal to them as the Government had been loyal during the negotiations to those who at this moment alone stood in the position of constituted authority in the trade union. Proceeding, he said he did not wish to say a single word which might breed bitterness in the future. He would address his few remaining words, not necessarily at all to the defendants; he said quite plainly that there were men who had been forward in promoting the recent strike whose motives, in the judgment of the executive, were not primarily motives of calling the attention of the authorities to grievances or hardships. He was speaking to really educated and extremely able men who could very well understand what he said, and very well understand the indications of that which he left unsaid.

"I tell them, and I tell them plainly," said the Attorney-General, "that their comings and goings, the ramifications of their society, the terms in which they have communicated with one another, the objects which they have expounded in their correspondence, I tell them they are as well known to authority as they are known to themselves. (At this point there was a laugh from among the crowd in court.) This Government cannot, if this issue be raised again, avoid the issue, however dark and perilous it may be, if that issue be again challenged during the conduct of this war. I wish to make it as plain as any words of mine can make it, that if there be a recurrence of a deliberate attempt to incite strikes with the object of impeding the supply of munitions, there will be no line drawn.

"If there be any who leave these proceedings with their hearts unpurged of bitterness I most solemnly warn them that the next breach of the law will be dealt with at the sessions by a jury of their countrymen. The decision upon that will be taken by no Government, but by that jury, and I have no doubt that those to whom these words are addressed will ask their own consciences what the result of such a trial will be. I will tell them this, that they can ask for no mercy if a verdict is given against them." The Attorney-General then formally applied for leave to withdraw the charges.

LOYAL ACCEPTANCE.

Mr. Ellis Griffith, representing five of the defendants, said his clients did not sign the undertaking as a matter of form, but intended loyally to abide by it. The defendants in what they did were not actuated by any sinister motive. They had been loyal throughout in the true sense of the word. The difficulty all through this strike had been a conflict within the ranks of the trade unions as to the best trade union organisation. That was the real substance and significance of the whole thing. It was urged, rightly or wrongly, that a grievance in the shop was a matter which could be better dealt with by the shop stewards. On behalf of his clients he said he was glad the Attorney-General had felt it his duty to take the step he had done, and he was sure it would produce a better atmosphere. He was sure that it was recognised that all stoppages and all unrest imperilled the safety of the Empire.

Mr. Slesser, who represented the defendant Kealey, spoke in a similar strain.

Mr. Arthur Neal, solicitor for Burgess and Hill, expressed thanks to the Government for the course they had taken, and said that there was no part of his Majesty's dominions more loyal than Sheffield. His client would not thank the Attorney-General and the Government for withdrawing the proceedings if they left the court under suspicion that they had been acting with the desire to interfere with the output of munitions. What they desired was the establishment of machinery for the speedy settlement of their differences. Mr. Neal pointed out that the engineers had been working at high pressure day and night, weekdays and Sundays, and something must be allowed for the psychology of the moment. The undertaking had not been given at a price. The Attorney-General had not asked a price. The signing had been a willing act of the men, who desired that their differences and that their grievances, large and small, might be speedily adjusted, so that the work of the nation might be resumed. It must not be taken that the men had admitted a moral guilt in any sense. They were not humiliated men, or condemned men, and they were not men who had purchased their liberty by the sacrifice of principle.

The Attorney-General said that the tone of the speeches of defending counsel was the best justification of the course taken by the prosecution. He accepted the tone and spirit of the speeches as representing the defendants, and he drew more comfort and more hope from them than from any circumstances of the industrial dispute.

The magistrate said, after the speeches of defending counsel and the application made by the Attorney-General, with a deep sense of responsibility, he thought he could allow the charges to be withdrawn. He then discharged the defendants.

There were outbursts of clapping in court, and an attempt by a man to whistle the tune of "The Red Flag," and the demonstration was kept up until the court was cleared.

With the withdrawal of the prosecutions against the strike leaders, the men at Sheffield and Barrow last evening decided by overwhelming majorities to start work to-day at six a.m. It is expected that the strikers at Liverpool will adopt a similar course.

Common Cause
18. 5. 17.

683/2

WOMEN'S WORK IN RELATION TO THE ENGINEERS' STRIKE.

A statement signed by Mrs. Annot Robinson and Mrs. J. R. Tomlinson, on behalf of the Manchester, Salford, and District Women's War Interests Committee, was issued on Monday, and has already been published in The Manchester Guardian, with reference to the position of women in relation to the strike of engineers. It draws attention to various difficulties that have arisen through the introduction of women into the engineering industry. The rates of pay of unskilled workers have not been sufficiently guarded, and suspicion and unrest have been caused by the wide discussion at employers' conferences of the permanent employment of women in many processes of engineering after the war. The result, the statement points out, has been a refusal by the men to allow women to be employed on permanent commercial work, as distinguished from the emergency labour of the production of munitions.

The statement continues :—

"The withdrawal of the trade card scheme, by removing more men, renders dilution on private work still more necessary, so that the present dispute really centres round the further employment of women in the engineering trade. The present crisis is but an indication of what is likely to come after the war. Ill-feeling is being created between the men and the women, which cannot be good for trade unionism or for industry as a whole. So far all the dilution agreements in the engineering trade have been drawn up to safeguard the interests of men. It cannot be too strongly emphasised that any settlement which is to bring national and lasting satisfaction can be arrived at only if the women's interests are fully recognised during the emergency period, and the extension of industrial openings for women be recognised as the problem that perhaps requires the most sympathetic and skilful handling of all the many issues arising from the war."

Daily Express. 6

24-6-17.

STRIKE LEADERS DISCHARGED.

PROMISE ON WHICH THE CHARGES WERE WITHDRAWN.

A WARNING.

The charge against the eight shop stewards who were arrested in connection with the engineering strike was withdrawn yesterday at Bow-street Police Court by Sir Frederick Smith, Attorney-General, each of the men having signed the following declaration:—

I undertake to adhere to the agreement arrived at on Saturday, May 19, 1917, between the Minister of Munitions and the executive council of the Amalgamated Society of Engineers acting at the request of the unofficial strike committee and on their behalf.

The defendants were:—

Thomas Dingley and Neal Cassidy, of Coventry.
Stanley Burgess and Walter Hill, of Sheffield.
Arthur McManus, of Liverpool.
George E. Peet and Percival H. Kealey, of Manchester.
William Foster Watson, of London.

The eight men stood in front of the dock. At the back of the court was a small crowd of their supporters—mainly men of military age—and among those present in court was Miss Mary Macarthur, the woman trade union leader.

ALL THE OBSERVATION POINTS.

When Sir John Bickinson gave his consent to the withdrawal of the charge—which was that of impeding the supply of war munitions—the young men at the back of the court clapped their hands joyfully, and a few of them began whistling the Socialist song, "We'll keep the Red Flag flying here."

Sir Frederick Smith, in asking that the charge might be withdrawn, gave a warning to mischief makers that any attempt to foment strikes for the purpose of stopping the supply of war munitions will land the conspirators in the dock at the Old Bailey and probably in a convict prison.

"There are men," he said, "who have been forward in promoting the recent strike, whose motives, in the judgment of the Executive, were not primarily motives of calling attention to grievances or hardships.

"I tell them plainly that their comings and goings, the ramifications of their societies, the terms in which they have communicated with one another, the objects which they have avowed in their correspondence, are as well known to authority as they are known to themselves.

"I wish to make it as plain as words can make it. If there should be a recurrence of deliberate attempts to incite strikes with the object of impeding the supply of munitions, there will be no further withdrawal. The next breach of the law will be dealt with at the Old Bailey by a jury."

The Attorney-General paid a warm tribute to the work which the engineers throughout the country have done since the beginning of the war in the production of munitions.

MEN RETURN TO WORK.

Engineers on strike at Sheffield and Barrow held meetings yesterday, and after hearing the news of the withdrawal of the charges against the eight shop stewards decided to return to work this morning.

As the Sheffield men were dispersing their leaders, Burgess and Hill, who had been liberated at Bow-street in the afternoon, arrived in a taxicab. Burgess said that the action of the men in Sheffield and other centres had determined the action of the Government. It had meant to them the difference between penal servitude and being at free. He was glad to be back and ready to return to work.

Hill said he [illegible] termined the action of the Government. It had meant to them the difference between penal servitude and being set free. He was glad to be back and ready to return to work.

Hill said he hoped all the men in Sheffield would go back to-day.

"Whatever you may think of the result of the strike," he said, "I am perfectly sure that to go on with it at the present moment would be madness. We are not the only people concerned in the war. Whatever we think about the war it is being fought now, and our men are out yonder, and the men in the fight have to be considered. I am certain we ought to go back to work at once and reconsider the whole position. There have been mistakes all the way round, but I am sure the greatest blame is not on us, but on the men at the top."

The Liverpool strikers meet to-day to consider the position.

TRADE UNION REFORM.

LABOUR M.P. ON THE NEED FOR CHANGES.

The leading article in yesterday's "Daily Express," entitled "What is wrong with the trade unions?" has aroused interest, criticism, and support in labour circles everywhere.

Strong support for the overhauling of the trade union machine advocated in the "Daily Express" came from Mr. W. C. Anderson, M.P., an ex-chairman of the Labour party.

"The leading article in the 'Daily Express' undoubtedly touches one cause of labour's troubles," he said to a "Daily Express" representative. "There has been in various directions a growing divorce between the trade union officials and the members. Many leaders are not richly dowered with imagination, and they are often in danger of removing themselves from the life and outlook of their members.

"Trade unionism will have to be reorganised—power and responsibility more widely diffused. The national leaders will be ill-advised if they have merely a policy of blind opposition to offer to what is be. in the new forces that are at work and the new ferment.

"That would only mean years of chaos and anarchy, with disastrous consequences to labour, and to the national life."

Daily Express May 21st 17

683/3

683
401

STRIKES SETTLED ON CONDITIONS.

ABSOLUTE IMMUNITY DEMANDED FOR ALL MEN ARRESTED.

OFFICIAL CONCESSIONS.

INEXPERT HANDLING OF A GRAVE INDUSTRIAL CRISIS.

An agreement to settle the munitions strike was reached on Saturday after the Prime Minister had personally intervened, and the executive of the Amalgamated Society of Engineers had at last been induced to accompany delegates from the Shop Stewards' Committee to the Ministry of Munitions. The settlement was achieved only just in time to avert grave consequences of the arrest of the strike leaders.

Most of the facts of importance are omitted from the official statements which have been issued, but it is announced by the men that—

The Munitions Bill will be postponed until June 4, and then revised.

An inquiry is to be held into the whole working of the Munitions Act.

The "Daily Express" understands that the prosecutions are to be completely dropped. This has not been officially announced. In consequence of the omission a strike has restarted at Barrow, and other districts are preparing to act.

The delay in the transmission and delivery of telegrams in connection with the strike is extraordinarily suspicious. The censorship was established for the control of naval and military information, and not for interference with domestic affairs.

MUNITIONS BILL POSTPONED.

PROSECUTIONS TO BE DROPPED.

There were two conferences before the agreement was announced.

The first took place at the Ministry of Munitions, and was attended by Dr. Addison, Mr. Henderson, delegates from the shop stewards, and the executive of the Engineers' Society. After the shop stewards' delegates had put the strikers' case they withdrew and left the executive to consult with the Government representatives.

The second conference was held at four o'clock at No. 10, Downing-street. Mr. Lloyd George and Mr. Hodge, Minister of Labour, were present in addition to those who attended the first conference. It was announced at 6.45 that the following terms had been settled:—

The shop stewards' delegates to return to their districts and advise an immediate resumption of work. The executive of the society to issue an instruction to this effect.

Negotiations with the Government regarding existing difficulties to be left to the executive. The shop stewards to use their best endeavours to secure the continuance of this practice.

The arrested men to be released on their own recognisances. No further arrests to be made or victimisation to be practised.

The only reference in the official statements issued to the immediate causes of the strike—the withdrawal of the trade card scheme and the dilution of labour on private work—is to the effect that the shop stewards' delegates "stated the grievances of the men." It is evident, however, that important concessions were foreshadowed. Mr. J. Mills, who explained the agreement to a meeting of 3,000 men at Plumstead Baths yesterday, said:—

The Munitions Amendment Bill has been withdrawn until June 4. If the clauses we object to are left out the other clauses may be embodied.

The Shop Stewards' Committee, after a lengthy meeting, endorsed the agreement, and immediate steps were taken by the committee and the executive of the society

STRIKE RE-STARTED IN BARROW.

TROUBLE CAUSED BY CONTINUED MUDDLE.

There is no doubt that if a quick settlement had not been reached there would have been developments of the gravest character.

Everywhere public opinion was heated to fever point by the arrests. Responsible leaders who had worked against the strike at once changed their attitude, and trade unionists of all kinds expressed their intention of supporting the strikers.

What might have happened is indicated by what has actually occurred, despite the settlement, in consequence of the unfortunate omission to announce that the prosecutions would be completely dropped.

Barrow engineers, who were at work on Friday, went on strike on Saturday as a protest against the arrests. They decided yesterday, by 1,783 votes to 218, to continue the strike until the arrested men were unconditionally released.

The Sheffield strike committee advised the men yesterday morning not to go back to the shops, but later passed the following resolution:—

Having heard the conference report, we feel we must advise the men to return to work on Monday morning at 6 a.m. on the understanding that all the men now under arrest are unconditionally released, and that we receive a definite assurance on the trade card scheme and dilution on private work, a national ballot to be taken on the above at an early date.

No doubt, the remaining troubles will be overcome by announcements which might just as easily have been made in the first instance.

COVENTRY THREAT.

What happened in Coventry was typical. The strikers there had returned to work, but when the arrests were known two mass meetings were called for yesterday to decide on action. It was feared that all the many thousands of skilled and unskilled workers in the district would "down tools."

Mr. A. Doherty, president of the Coventry District Committee of the A.S.E., stated to a "Daily Express" representative on Saturday morning:—

"The Coventry District Committee con-

INSIDE THE CONFERENCE.

PREMIER'S PROMISE OF A MUNITIONS INQUIRY.

"Daily Express" Special Correspondent.

MANCHESTER, Sunday Night.

Manchester engineers will return to work at nine o'clock to-morrow morning. This was the decision of a large mass meeting of the men held at Audenshaw this afternoon.

They passed a resolution protesting against the "vindictive action of the Government" in arresting the leaders, but the net result is that the agreement reached in London on Saturday was confirmed, and work begins at once.

There is one proviso. It was agreed, although no formal resolution was passed, that the Shop Stewards' Committee which has been running the strike shall hold a meeting on Wednesday night, when the decision of the magistrate at Bow-street regarding the arrested men will be known. It was plainly intimated that if that decision involves a remand or any kind of punishment a new "down tools" demand will be made, and, judging from the demeanour of the meeting to-day, the demand will meet an immediate response.

The facts which stood out prominently at the meeting were:—

The youth of the men. Fully 80 per cent. must have been under thirty years of age.

The antagonism to the official leaders, who, as one speaker said, "Have treated us worst than the Government."

The indignation at the arrests. "We are as bad as they are," said a speaker, "and if they punish them, they must punish us all."

Interesting details were given of the proceedings in London on Saturday.

THREE DAYS' DELAY.

It was only after three days' delay on the part of the Executive Council of the A.S.E that the unofficial delegates, numbering ten, who had been appointed by the 120 delegates of the Shop Stewards' Committee, were admitted to a conference with the Ministry of Munitions. The Strike Conference at the Socialist Hall, Walworth-road, London, had on Wednesday induced Dr. Addison to consent to receive them provided they were accompanied by the Executive Council of the A.S.E., but the Executive Council boggled over the matter, and the meeting was not fixed till late on Friday night.

When the agreement had been reached on Saturday it was taken round by the

Mr. J. Mills, who explained the agreement to a meeting of 3,000 men at Plumstead Baths yesterday, said:—

The Munitions Amendment Bill has been withdrawn until June 4. If the clauses we object to are left out the other clauses may be embodied.

The Shop Stewards' Committee, after a lengthy meeting, endorsed the agreement, and immediate steps were taken by the committee and the executive of the society to get the men back to work. The executive issued a notice to members, and the stewards returned to their districts, where they addressed a number of meetings yesterday.

LEADERS RELEASED.

Five of the arrested leaders, who had been unable to obtain bail, were released from Brixton Prison on Saturday night.

Official communications state that of the ten warrants issued only two had not been executed, whereas the number of strike leaders brought up at Bow-street on Friday was seven. The apparent discrepancy is due to the fact that an eighth man, a shop steward named Watson, of London, was not arrested until Saturday morning, when he was apprehended by the police at Glasgow. He arrived in London in custody early yesterday morning, and will be brought up at Bow-street to-day.

The "Daily Express" understands that no evidence will be offered when the men appear again at Bow-street on Wednesday, and that the charges against them will be withdrawn.

"We are satisfied with the course of events," said Mr Edwards, chairman of the stewards' committee, "and with the agreement, which shows how far our action was justified."

Mr. Robert Young, secretary of the Amalgamated Society of Engineers, said he thought the situation was extremely promising, and that under the agreement there was hardly any likelihood of future trouble. He added that perhaps it would be a few days before the situation became entirely clear It was not possible, he explained, for the delegates who left London on Saturday night to call meetings of their district committees for yesterday in all cases.

ELECTRICIANS RETURN.

The subsidiary trouble among the London electrical engineers was also ended on Saturday, when a meeting of the men affected decided to withdraw their strike call and resume work.

The strikers there had returned to work, but when the arrests were known two mass meetings were called for yesterday to decide on action. It was feared that all the many thousands of skilled and unskilled workers in the district would "down tools."

Mr. A. Doherty, president of the Coventry District Committee of the A.S.E., stated to a "Daily Express" representative on Saturday morning:—

"The Coventry District Committee considered all the points raised during last week in regard to the strike. We could not find among ourselves any plank on which we should be justified in ceasing work. Dingley and Cassidy were repudiated by the committee. All the skilled men of this city repudiated them. The whole of the skilled men of Coventry, by their decision of Sunday last, agreed to resume work.

"Things went well; there was nothing to justify us in thinking there would be a cessation of work by the skilled men of Coventry. Then the Government come along and arrest two individuals from Coventry who are absolutely dissociated from the skilled men of the city—men who could not do any harm.

"We now find ourselves faced with this position—that a vital principle is at stake; free speech is endangered and individual liberty is swept away by the action the Government have taken without consultation with the local people. For myself, and on behalf of the district committee of the A.S.E., I repudiate the action of the Government We think it is most unwise and inopportune."

BITTER FEELING.

Feeling among the 8,000 Coventry men and women members of the Workers' Union was exceedingly bitter.

"Dingley is the chairman and Cassidy the secretary of the local amalgamation committee," said an official of the union, "and they merely carried out the instructions given them by the rank and file. When the mass meeting of the men decided on a resumption of work Dingley returned to his shop. When we had been working four days he was arrested."

When the meetings were held yesterday the engineers decided to demand the unconditional release of the arrested men. The Workers' Union adopted the same attitude, and resolved to prepare to strike if the men were convicted.

Reports from other districts include the following:—

Bolton.—A speedy resumption of work is looked for. A mass meeting will be held this morning.

Bury.—The engineers meet to-day, but have not resumed work.

Lea Valley.—Members of the A.S.E. employed at Enfield and Waltham decided to return to work at once. Several hundreds of the men returned on the night shift. At one factory they were heartily cheered at the factory gates by a large body of the general public, including several wounded soldiers.

Liverpool.—The engineers decided yesterday to postpone accepting the strike settlement until the return of their delegates from London, from whom they expect a report. Consequently, there is no prospect of the men resuming work to-day.

ITALY'S MOUNTAIN

Executive Council to Mr. Lloyd George who had not previously taken part in the deliberations. He approved of the settlement, and declared that he realised something was wrong, and was prepared to appoint either a Select Committee of the House of Commons or a travelling commission to inquire into the whole working of the Munitions Act as it affects labour. This proposal will probably be dealt with in Parliament during the coming week.

Bitter complaints were made at to-day's mass meeting of "broken pledges" on the part of the Government. It was alleged that a pledge had been given that no arrests should be made while the unofficial strike conference was sitting in London. It was not clear, however, by whom the pledge was given.

The net result of the whole business seems to be the necessity for some form of closer co-operation between the trade union officials and their "rank and file." Apparently there is more red tape in trade-union organisation than in Government offices. A link appears to be missing, which makes possible the lack of discipline and common working that is the foundation of trade unionism, both from the trade and the national point of view.

WOOLWICH AT WORK.

The Woolwich strikers decided at meetings held yesterday at the Plumstead Baths to return to work this morning. There were only a few dissentients.

Mr. J. Mills, speaking at one of the meetings, said that the men's conference had decided by resolution to reserve power to call the members together again in the event of certain eventualities, such as a breach of faith.

"The statement that the arrested men should be released on their own recognisances was put in at the request of the Prime Minister," said Mr. Mills. "Mr. Lloyd George agreed that there should be no victimisation whatever.

"Although the agreement, on the face of it, does not look any very great achievement, I want you to realise that in the circumstances we have achieved much more than we had hoped for. We have achieved a moral victory, and have forced on the Government the fact that, unauthorised and unofficial though we may be, we represent a body of men who have demonstrated the solidarity of labour, and have proved that they are strong enough to resist these broken pledges of the Government."

Manchester Dispatch
29-5-17

THE LABOUR UNREST COMMISSIONS.

Men Who Ought to be On Them.

AND MEN WHO OUGHT NOT!

Mr. Lloyd George is to sing a Seven-Fold Amen to all industrial strife.

With the Prime Minister as "lead," seven choirs of experts are to harmonise the situation.

It is to be hoped that in this way the instrumentalists who play upon the lathe and the anvil and the cartridge-filler will be induced to "accompany" in perfect time and tune. Thus shall the performance become worthy of the theme—a grand, swelling anthem, flooding the wakened land with the music of a new enthusiasm and striking terror into the hearts of all the German bands.

It is an excellent scheme, this appointment of seven commissions to inquire into and report upon the causes of, and remedies for, labour unrest.

There are just two things I would like to know about these commissions. I would like to know what exactly are to be their terms of reference and who are to be the inquirers and reporters. Their mission will be delicate and important. To settle the quarrels, open or veiled, of two other people is one of the most difficult tasks in the world.

The Man from Whitehall.

What I am anxious about regarding those terms of reference is that they shall include the power of investigating all sides of the question. It will be no use to begin with the idea that employers and employed are plaintiff and defendant—or defendant and plaintiff either—and that all that has to be done is to give a verdict for one or the other. The dullest judge in the High Court could tell you that there is apt to be a third party, who "intervenes," or "co-responds," or does some other thing equally reprehensible.

In this case there most certainly is a third party. He is generally called "the man from Whitehall," or "the Inspector from the Department," and he has merrily intervened in matters respecting which he pretends to be an expert, but of which he knows less than the average shop-foreman.

So it has come to pass sometimes that, while the "boss" and the "hands" are trying hard to keep tempers cool and nerves steady in the most difficult circumstances, the one thing that has come along to turn the scale and tip its contents into the fire has been the petty inquisition of some smart exponent of a glorious bureaucracy and a nasty Nosey Parkerism.

When he isn't down at the works getting in the way of people who really are doing things he is busy in London fettering the activities of men who want to get on with the nation's work. If he can run them into Schedule X, Y, Z, and block up the exit with Forms No. 007 to 9999, or tie them up in red tape until one part of the works has to stand idle because another part can't feed it, he feels that life is one round of joy.

Mr. Lloyd George's seven commissions will do well to start on this gentleman pretty early in the proceedings.

Men to Trust!

But, after all, the personnel of the commissions will be the main thing. I hold strongly that when you want to settle differences you must give the job over to somebody whom the disputants trust. That sounds a fairly reasonable and rather obvious proposition. And yet it is just the thing we don't do.

We want to control coal, or tea, or sugar, and we try to do it by putting in charge men who get their living by selling coal, or tea, or sugar—and then raise our hands in holy horror when somebody begs to remark that the price has gone up again.

So when we want to control trouble and keep it from rising I am very much afraid we shall follow a similar plan. We shall put on the commissions a few iron and steel magnates, shipowners, railway managers, Government officials, the most prominent of the Labour M.P.'s, with a sprinkling of what the Americans call corner-grocery politicians to make up the balance.

If we let it go at that it will be all wrong. That anthem will be just the worst case of syncopated discord that ever happened.

Keep out the armchair economists! Warn off the excess profits man! Let the "superior person" go on twiddling his thumbs! And shoo away everybody who wants to solve a "75" problem with a pea-shooter mind. This is a case of dealing with men. You want people who understand men.

Some Suggestions.

Suppose it is a matter of miners. These commissions will have to hear a good deal about miners. The commission may have Stephen Walsh on it; it would sound rather absurd not to. But there should be with him at least four other men—Robert Smillie, John Robertson, ex-Baillie M'Kerrell, and Vernon Hartshorn.

You are dealing with munitions factories. It may scarcely be credited, but there are names which are more highly honoured by the workers in the factories than that of any personage in the Hotel Metropole. J. T. Brownlie, chairman of the Engineers; John Hill, of the Boilermakers; and the present chairman of the Trades Union Congress Parliamentary Committee, W. J. Davies, of the Brassworkers; and as unskilled and semi-skilled labour plays so big a part I would include such men as Tom Fox, of Manchester; Jack Beard, who knows the tube and steel men intimately; and Tom Macnamara, who could take you over Woolwich Arsenal blindfold.

These and half a dozen others know the problem, are dealing with some phase of it every day of their lives, and the men know and trust them.

That is the great point. There must be confidence engendered by the very composition of the commission.

What about dockers and transport? The official mind turns to Ben Tillett and Sexton, of Liverpool, and I don't blame it. But it would be fatal to ignore Harry Gosling, Robert Williams, and Albert Bellamy. And so deeply bound up with the railway section of the transport business is the clerical department that A. G. Walkden, of the railway clerks, would be most valuable.

Cameron and the Carpenters.

Nobody seems to have been noticing how important a part is played by the workers in wood during a war. They are fashioning a thousand things without which we could not go on. I want to see that Alec Cameron has a hand in their affairs. Throughout the London building strike I watched him closely, and what Cameron can't do with carpenters wouldn't hurt if you got it under the thumb nail.

I am not giving an exhaustive list of the men who could preserve industrial peace if the chance were given them. For one thing, Mr. Lloyd George hasn't told me how many commissions he proposes. I have just indicated the type of man I would appoint.

Add W. A. Appleton, J. R. Clynes, Sir George Askwith, C. W. Bowerman, Will Thorne, and a couple of the men who already have big work in hand if they can be spared, and you will have the right kind of chairmen.

Sprinkle with women representatives like Miss Mary Macarthur, Miss Susan Lawrence, and Miss Gertrude Tuckwell, and there will be a chance of getting something done.

E. P.

Glasgow Record
11-6-17

683/5

WAY OF THE WORLD

HOW THE WOMEN ARE CHANGING IT.

By ALICE J. WHITMORE.

One of the most marked, if purely incidental, results of the present ghastly struggle is the benefit resulting from the mutual intercourse of the Allied nations. All of us since 1914 have been interested in France, in Russia, and in Belgium as we never were before, and as probably we never should have been except for the war.

This interest is now extended to America. We now regard American history, the character of its people, the struggle of its women for liberty, and everything American in a new light. Especially in this juncture of our political history we women are interested in a country whose President is called Wilson, and not by some other name because the votes of women in doubtful areas carried the day in his favour. At any time the story of Mrs. Belva Lockwood whose death was announced recently, would have excited interest; but it is particularly stimulating at this moment.

Few of us knew perhaps that this great pioneer of the woman's movement was twice nominated by the Equal Rights Party in the States for the Presidency, and in several parts of the country obtained a substantial vote.

Mrs. Lockwood was eighty-seven when she died, and it is noteworthy that many of these pioneer women lived to a remarkable age. Mrs. Julia Ward Howe was nearly ninety when she died, and Dr. Elizabeth Blackwell was, I believe, over eighty. These women were Trojans for work, and it all points to the fact that healthy activity never kills. It is the stultifying, deadening atmosphere of narrowed vision which destroys youth—it is the lack of wide sympathies which poisons life and health.

MRS. LOCKWOOD'S WORK.

Mrs. Lockwood's story is of unique interest at this time, because it hinges upon that which is the crux of the present situation—the inequalities of men's and women's economic position. It was this which started this remarkable woman on her great career, and which was her guiding impulse. It is this which is now stirring the women of to-day who had never previously given the subject a moment's consideration. The woman who has recently been thrown out of work not of her own choice, but because the continuance of work depended entirely upon the choice of men, has been led to think about these things, and her thought is often tinged with bitterness.

Mrs. Lockwood was a pioneer from girlhood. At fourteen she "taught school"; at eighteen she was married; and at twenty-two was a widow with one child. Thrust upon the world and her own resources and going back to her teaching she saw things in a different light. She realised with acute poignancy the discrepancies between the salaries of men and women, and it was this which led to her championship of women's rights.

She tells how she first of all "kicked" at the injustice and endeavoured to get it remedied. But the officials to whom she applied merely laughed at her. Then she proceeded to the manse, where she evidently expected to receive light and guidance. The minister's wife told her that she was helpless and that it was foolish to attempt to alter the unalterable. "It is the way of the world," she concluded, strong in her conviction that the only thing to done was to bow to the inevitable.

But Mrs. Lockwood was not the sort of person to accept things as inevitable without a challenge. It is not in the nature of the normal American with the blood of the pioneer in his veins to do this. Especially is this true of the American farmer's wife (and Mrs. Lockwood had married a farmer—in the fifties—when farm life still savoured of the pioneer element), the woman who finds that if she hasn't a pepper box a tin with holes in the top does quite as well, and if she hasn't a cradle for her baby a clothes basket or an empty box does even better because she can stand it anywhere and is not tempted to resort to the foolish expedient of rocking.

Mrs. Lockwood's reply was an index to her character and a prophecy as to her future. "Then let us change the way of the world," was her answer. To this she proceeded with that "courage, sweet temper, pugnacity, shrewdness and alertness" which she is said to have been characterised, and until the day of her death her life was devoted to the task of its accomplishment.

ADMITTED TO THE BAR.

She continued teaching until the seventies, when she married again and gave herself assiduously to the study of law even although women were then disqualified from practice at the Court. It was part of the great business of her life to "change the way of the world" in this respect.

She succeeded in getting a Bill introduced admitting women to the Bar of the United States Supreme Court, and she herself was the first woman admitted under that Act. This and the business of securing equal salaries for men and women were the outstanding features of her work and even in her latest years she was engaged on several important cases at the Bar.

To-day the call comes to all women with startling appropriateness and insistence to carry on the great work so nobly begun and to "change the way of the world." At present the "way of the world" is still in the main the "way" ordained of men exclusively. Perhaps few of us even yet scarcely realise how entirely so this is, and unless we do realise it we shall not be stirred, as we ought, to immediate action.

Few of us perhaps realise the economic issues at stake in woman's political emancipation. Do we all know, for instance, that the Amalgamated Society of Engineers agreed to the dilution of labour which created such demand for women's work only on the specific condition that this work should cease with the war—and that this promise, signed by a Government Department, was later embodied in Acts of Parliament.

Do we all understand that men have already demanded that they shall settle exactly what trades women shall continue to follow after the war, and that the Government is already actually pledged to side with the men, and has promised to force employers to act in accordance with the men's wishes? All this is but the natural and inevitable of the present "way of the world"; but that the time has come when it must be changed is apparent even to the woman behind the washtub.

A MUNITION WORKER'S VIEW.

I was talking this week to a charwoman who has been engaged in munition work and who was "out" only because the men were "out." I realised as I talked with her how possible it is that later on, unless things are speedily changed, we may expect another outburst of militancy organised by a different and perhaps a more dangerous class of women.

"It's time the men were put in their place," said this woman. It was crudely stated, but I understood that it was her way of articulating the slowly dawning consciousness that "the way of the world" must be changed. This woman is a widow with four children and dependent upon herself for support. In spite, however, of her belligerent attitude to men, her personal appearance loudly proclaimed the instinctive feeling—uppermost perhaps in women of this class—that a woman is, or ought to be, dependent upon some man for support. She was arrayed for her day's work in a V-shaped blouse well open at the neck, a cameo brooch, a gold chain at her throat, and diamond (?) earrings!

When I suggested that we should be having the vote and it would be in our power to alter things, she appeared indifferent, until I explained how almost everything that affects the position of women is controlled in this way. The economic position of women lies at the root of much domestic tragedy and is the great question upon which the future of woman hinges; but it is not to be solved in the spirit of "putting men in their place," by anything like sex war.

The key to the situation lies largely with women themselves. The "change" must begin in her own outlook on life before it can take practical orm. The great need of to-day is to train future citizens. I believe that the working woman especially is becoming keenly alive to her own ignorance in the elementary principles of government, and would eagerly welcome definite instruction along this line.

Morning Post 683
19-6-17

DILUTION OF LABOUR.

DR. ADDISON CONFERS WITH TRADE UNIONS.

Dr. Addison, Minister of Munitions, held another conference with the representatives of Trade Unions on the subject of the Dilution Bill at the Grand Hotel, Northumberland-avenue, yesterday.

Dr. Addison said the Committee had examined with the minutest care the proposals with respect to safeguarding their position in connection with any dilution that might be necessary on commercial work. Where a class of work, or work in particular occupations, came under the provisions of the Dilution Bill the workmen could become War Munition Volunteers, which meant that when a man moved into another district where the rate of wages was less the difference was to be made up to him. On the other hand, if he moved into a district where the rate of wages was higher he was to receive the higher rate of pay. The Ministry would not give permission for employers to make any changes unless the requirements as set out in the Bill had been met. Mr. Hodge, M.P., was taking steps to speed up arbitration awards. (Applause.) As the number of guns increased the greater became the number for repair, because every gun had to go back to the repair shop eventually. The losses from defective guns and ammunition had been very small. (Applause.) The shipbuilding programme was three times as large as it was in 1916. That meant that a larger number of skilled men would be required. The war was largely a question of transport, and the Ministry had every confidence that the programme could be carried out. When the Army was given a particularly fine piece of material it quickly asked for more. So it was in regard to the "tanks," but the way in which these particular machines ate up the "spares" was simply appalling. The greater the number of "tanks" in the field, the greater was the demand for spares, and the question of supplying them was an enormous manufactory problem. High-powered aeroplanes and aeroplane parts, of which there had been a vastly increased output, were also a serious problem of supply. These problems between them presented a munition programme of enormous magnitude. Dealing with the demand for agricultural implements, Dr. Addison said the demand had been met as much as possible. The Ministry had agreed to supply the implements, including motor tractors, in a light sort of moment, but they had got to be supplied in great numbers in a short time.

WOMEN'S REDUCED WAGES.

A delegate declared that men doing crane work for some firms were being taken off because women did the work for less money. Women's wages had been reduced from 30s. per week to 25s. and less. The men did not want that to continue. (Hear, hear, and applause.) If the women did the work they should get the money. Sex was nothing whatever to do with it.

Another delegate said the same condition of affairs existed in the shipbuilding industry. Women receiving 27s. per week for working great hammers and forges were having their wages reduced to 22s. 6d. The men who did the work previously got 35s. per week and more.

Mr. Kellaway (who had now taken the chair) said the question had been the subject of negotiations between the Ministry and the Unions. Arrangements had been made which were thought to be satisfactory. If they were not the Ministry would reconsider the whole matter. (Applause.)

A delegate declared that unless the Government took every step to stop food profiteering and other scandals the men up and down the country would not accept dilution.

Mr. Kellaway—I hope the new Food Controller—more power to his elbow—will succeed in stopping food profiteering, a form of blackmail which even more than the vagaries of the recruiting officer has done so much to create industrial unrest in the country. The job is a difficult one, but Lord Rhondda has never shown fear in the face of a very big task. I believe he will succeed in putting a stop to this monstrous form of blackmail. Working men had a good sense of fair play, and they would continue to make sacrifices, because they realised that only by making sacrifices could British democracy beat German autocracy. (Applause.)

Common Cause
15.6.17

683
683/6

PRICES RISE, BUT WAGES—?

Every week prices go up to points higher than the week before. Are women's wages rising in proportion? Most assuredly not. They are rising in many employments, but they rise slowly and jerkily. In the 'eighties of last century £100 a year was regarded as the salary of a highly educated and exceptionally well-qualified woman. At the present day, life on £2 a week for a worker of the professional classes needs very careful planning. Yet a member of the Canadian Parliament, on the Conservative side, has been saying that women in the Dominion Civil Service should on no account be paid more than this bare minimum. Already he considered that they were paid too much, and he adduced by way of proof that they showed no desire to get married. Poverty is hardly the happiest reason for marriage. A much wider view has lately been expressed by Lady Mackworth, who, as an experienced business woman, looks forward to the time when £300 a year will not be regarded as an exceptional salary for a woman of ability. Meantime, it is urgently needful for women of the professional and of the leisured classes to help the industrial workers to get wages which bear some fair relation to the constant increase in their ordinary expenditure.

Times
29.6.17

THE FUTURE OF INDUSTRY.

TRADE COUNCILS FOR RECONSTRUCTION.

A NATIONAL SCHEME OF COOPERATION.

The report of the Sub-Committee of the Reconstruction Committee on the relations between employers and employed has been sent by the Ministry of Labour to the leading employers' associations and trade unions, together with a covering letter from Sir D. J. Shackleton in which he states that the report drawn up by a Sub-Committee mainly composed of prominent representatives of employers' associations and trade unions puts forward certain important proposals for the better regulation of industry, which if carried out will have far-reaching effects on our national welfare.

The War Cabinet, he says, are deeply concerned that timely and effective measures should be taken to deal with these questions, for they feel that the future of industry, and indeed of the country itself, are closely bound up with their successful solution. Moreover, they feel strongly that action cannot be deferred until after the war, as it is essential that the problems concerning the organization of industry which peace will bring should be fully and frankly discussed between employers and employed before they actually arise. Further, as the trustee for the well-being of all classes of the community the Government itself is vitally interested in the result of these discussions. As the Sub-Committee states in its report:—"In the interests of the community it is vital that after the war the cooperation of all classes established during the war should continue, and more especially with regard to the relations between employers and employed. For securing improvement in the latter, it is essential that any proposals put forward should offer to workpeople the means of attaining improved conditions of employment and a higher standard of comfort generally, and involve the enlistment of their active and continuous cooperation in the promotion of industry."

FOR ORGANIZED INDUSTRIES.

It is in order to meet these views, the letter adds, that the proposals made by the Sub-Committee are framed, and before deciding to adopt them the Government desire to have the general views of employers and trade organizations upon them. It should be understood that the proposals are applicable only to well-organized industries, and are intended to deal with only one aspect of the problem of industrial reconstruction; other aspects requiring other measures remain to be dealt with, but if the fundamental questions affecting the relations between employers and employed are satisfactorily settled on a permanent basis, the solution of all subsequent difficulties becomes incalculably easier.

If it is finally decided to adopt the scheme recommended by the Sub-Committee, each of the trades affected will be invited to discuss the best method of putting it into operation. At present the report is only being sent out to the employers' associations and the trade unions in the organized industries, in order to get their general criticisms and suggestions. Specially chosen officers have been appointed by the Ministry of Labour to assist in explaining the scheme. They will be glad to give assistance in this direction and to attend conferences summoned to consider it either in London or the provinces. Any communications on this subject should be addressed to Mr. Arthur Greenwood, Ministry of Labour, Montagu House, London, W.1.

THE RECOMMENDATIONS.

PERMANENT IMPROVEMENT BY COOPERATION.

The Sub-Committee, which was composed of the Right Hon. J. H. Whitley, M.P., Chairman, Mr. F. S. Button, Mr. G. J. Carter, Professor S. J. Chapman, Sir Gilbert Claughton, Bart., Mr. J. R. Clynes, M.P., Mr. J. A. Hobson, Miss Susan Lawrence, Mr. J. J. Mallon, Sir Thomas R. Ratcliffe-Ellis, Mr. Robert Smillie, Mr. Allan M. Smith, and Miss Mona Wilson describes its report as an interim on Joint Standing Industrial Councils.

"The circumstances of the present time (says the report) are admitted on all sides to offer a great opportunity for securing a permanent improvement in the relations between employers and employed, while failure to utilize the opportunity may involve the nation in grave industrial difficulties at the end of the war. It is generally allowed that the war almost enforced some reconstruction of industry, and in considering the subjects referred to us we have kept in view the need for securing in the development of reconstruction the largest possible measure of cooperation between employers and employed. In the interests of the community it is vital that after the war the cooperation of all classes, established during the war, should continue, and more especially with regard to the relations between employers and employed. For securing improvement in the latter it is essential that any proposals put forward should offer to workpeople the means of attaining improved conditions of employment and a higher standard of comfort generally, and involve the enlistment of their active and continuous cooperation in the promotion of industry. To this end the establishment for each industry of an organization, representative of employers and workpeople, to have as its object the regular consideration of matters affecting the progress and well-being of the trade from the point of view of all those engaged in it, so far as this is consistent with the general interest of the community, appears to us necessary.

COMPOSITION OF THE COUNCILS.

"With a view to providing means for carrying out the policy outlined above we recommend that his Majesty's Government should propose without delay to the various associations of employers and employed the formation of Joint Standing Industrial Councils in the several industries, where they do not already exist, composed of representatives of employers and employed.

"The appointment of a chairman or chairmen should, we think, be left to the council, who may decide that these should be:—

"(1) A chairman for each side of the council;

"(2) A chairman and vice-chairman selected from the members of the council (one from each side of the council);

"(3) A chairman chosen by the council from independent persons outside the industry; or,

"(4) A chairman nominated by such person or authority as the council may determine, or, failing agreement, by the Government."

The report suggests that the council should meet at regular and frequent intervals, and should consider appropriate matters affecting the several industries, and particularly the establishment of a closer cooperation between employers and employed. Questions connected with demobilization will call for early attention. One of the chief factors in the problem, as it at first presents itself, consists of the guarantees given by the Government, with Parliamentary sanction, and the various undertakings entered into by employers, to restore the trade union rules and customs suspended during the war. The Committee take the view that while this does not mean that all the lessons learnt during the war should be ignored, it does mean that the definite cooperation and acquiescence by both employers and employed must be a condition of any setting aside of these guarantees or undertakings.

TRIPLE ORGANIZATION.

"In the well-organized industries, one of the first questions to be considered should be the establishment of local and works organizations to supplement and make more effective the work of the central bodies. The National Industrial Council should not be regarded as complete in itself: what is needed is a triple organization—in the workshops, the districts, and nationally. Moreover it is essential that the organization at each of these three stages should proceed on a common principle, and that the greatest measure of common action between them should be secured. With this end in view, we are of opinion that the following proposals should be laid before the National Industral Councils:—

(a) That district councils, representative of the trade unions and of the Employers' Association in the industry, should be created or developed out of the existing machinery for negotiation in the various trades.

(b) That Works Committees, representative of the management and of the workers employed, should be instituted in particular works to act in close cooperation with the district and national machinery.

"As it is of the highest importance that the scheme making provision for these committees should be such as to secure the support of the trade unions and employers' associations concerned, its design should be a matter for agreement between these organizations.

"The respective functions of works committees, district councils, and national councils will no doubt require to be determined separately in accordance with the varying conditions of different industries. Care will need to be taken in each case to delimit accurately their respective functions, in order to avoid overlapping and resulting friction.

"Among the questions with which it is suggested that the national councils should deal or allocate to district councils or works committees the following may be selected for special mention:—

(Continued at foot of next column.)

(i.) The better utilization of the practical knowledge and experience of the workpeople.

(ii.) Means for securing to the workpeople a greater share in and responsibility for the determination and observance of the conditions under which their work is carried on.

(iii.) The settlement of the general principles governing the conditions of employment, including the methods of fixing, paying, and readjusting wages, having regard to the need for securing to the workpeople a share in the increased prosperity of the industry.

(iv.) The establishment of regular methods of negotiation for issues arising between employers and workpeople, with a view both to the prevention of differences, and to their better adjustment when they appear.

(v.) Means of ensuring to the workpeople the greatest possible security of earnings and employment, without undue restriction upon change of occupation or employer.

(vi.) Methods of fixing and adjusting earnings, piecework prices, &c., and of dealing with the many difficulties which arise with regard to the method and amount of payment apart from the fixing of general standard rates, which are already covered by paragraph (iii.).

(vii.) Technical education and training.

(viii.) Industrial research and the full utilization of its results.

(ix.) The provision of facilities for the full consideration and utilization of inventions and improvements designed by workpeople, and for the adequate safeguarding of the rights of the designers of such improvements.

(x.) Improvements of processes, machinery, and organization and appropriate questions relating to management and the examination of industrial experiments, with special reference to cooperation in carrying new ideas into effect and full consideration of the workpeople's point of view in relation to them.

(xi.) Proposed legislation affecting the industry.

GOVERNMENT AS ADVISER.

"The methods by which the functions of the proposed councils should be correlated to those of joint bodies in the different districts, and in the various works within the districts, must necessarily vary according to the trade. It may, therefore, be the best policy to leave it to the trades themselves to formulate schemes suitable to their special circumstances, it being understood that it is essential to secure in each industry the fullest measure of cooperation between employers and employed, both generally, through the National Councils, and specifically, through district committees and workshop committees.

"In forwarding the proposals to the parties concerned, we think the Government should offer to be represented in an advisory capacity at the preliminary meetings of a council, if the parties so desire. We are also of opinion that the Government should undertake to supply to the various councils such information on industrial subjects as may be available and likely to prove of value. It appears to us that it may be desirable at some later stage for the State to give the sanction of law to agreements made by the councils, but the initiative in this direction should come from the councils themselves."

Stating that the plans sketched are applicable in the form in which they are given only to industries in which there are responsible associations of employers and workpeople which can claim to be fairly representative, the Sub-Committee give it as their considered opinion that an essential condition of securing a permanent improvement in the relations between employers and employed is that there should be adequate organization on the part of both employers and workpeople. Such organization is necessary also to provide means whereby the arrangements and agreements made for the industry may be effectively carried out. No suggestions or opinions are offered with regard to such matters as profit-sharing, co-partnership, or particular systems of wages, the Sub-Committee considering it impracticable to make any useful general recommendations on such matters, having regard to the varying conditions in different trades. They add:—

"We are convinced, moreover, that a permanent improvement in the relations between employers and employed must be founded upon something other than a cash basis. What is wanted is that the workpeople should have a greater opportunity of participating in the discussion about and adjustment of those parts of industry by which they are most affected. The schemes recommended in this report are intended not merely for the treatment of industrial problems when they have become acute, but also, and more especially, to prevent their becoming acute. We believe that regular meetings to discuss industrial questions, apart from and prior to any differences with regard to them that may have begun to cause friction, will materially reduce the number of occasions on which, in the view of either employers or employed, it is necessary to contemplate recourse to a stoppage of work."

COUNCILS AND PLEDGES.

Questions addressed by the Reconstruction Committee to the Sub-Committee and given with the answers in an appendix to the report show that as there already exist in most organized trades joint bodies for particular purposes, it is not proposed that the industrial councils should necessarily disturb these existing bodies.

It is contemplated that agreements reached by industrial councils should (whilst not of course possessing the binding force of law) carry with them the same obligation of observance as exists in the case of other agreements between employers' associations and trade unions. A council being on its workmen's side based on the trade unions concerned in the industry, its powers or authority could only be such as the constituent trade unions freely agreed to. It is clearly intended that all pledges relating to the restoration of trade union rules shall be redeemed without qualification unless the particular trade union concerned agrees to alteration; and it is not intended that the council shall have power to decide such questions by a majority vote of the workmen's representatives from all the trade unions in the industry.

Manchester Weekly Times
23-6-17

A SANE INDUSTRIALISM.

ORGANISATION IN THE FACTORY.

THE NEED FOR IMPROVEMENT.

The Editor of the "Weekly Times" has made arrangements for the publication in these columns of a number of special articles on the War and the Worker by writers well known in different spheres of industrialism. These articles, which are appearing under the heading "A Sane Industrialism," will be found of mutual interest and advantage to both employers and employed. The first was by Mr. G. J. Wardle, M.P. for Stockport and Chairman of the Labour Party, and the second by Sir Albert Spicer, M.P. The third article, which appears to-day, is by Mr. J. M. Robertson, M.P., who, taking for his theme the fact that the war has taught us that organisation means strength, shows how the workers can benefit by organising the millions of pounds' worth of energy annually wasted.

By J. M. ROBERTSON, M.P.

"Science," discussed in the preceding article of this series, is by common consent held to apply, in industry, to the cultivation and application of the higher forms of physical knowledge of all kinds. But the spirit of science, which is simply concern for exact knowledge of causation, enters in some degree into all careful action; and there is assuredly great room for its wider activity in the management of business in general. What the commercial experts call "system" is just the method of science brought to bear in business affairs. And in thousands of businesses "system" is still very imperfectly developed.

To artistic minds, perhaps, the notion may be on some sides repellant. The principle, for instance, that in manufacture there should be no superfluous movement, that the ideal is just to make so many movements as will do the required work and no more, is apt to seem soulless. The artistic soul for which its labour is one of love would linger over some of its tasks, seeking whether or not there may be room for an added touch. But there is really no fundamental difference between art economy and trade economy in view of results. The artist is not so ready as the toiler to "down tools," because his task is for him something more than the doing of efficient work to earn his bread. But even the artist wastes no time, if he can help it, in mixing his colours; and he finds ground for some of his highest praise in "economy of effect" in line and composition in his own field. The artist who makes one sure stroke do what others do by many strokes is acknowledged to be not less, but more, an artist in doing so.

LESSON FROM "SWEATING WAGES."

Of the thousand ways in which force—and therefore Capital and Labour—can be economised I propose to speak here of one—co-ordination of work in factories. In the work of the Trade Boards, which in the recent years of peace were quietly doing so much to improve the conditions of labour in low-waged industries, it was again and again found that "sweating wages" were in many individual cases not the sign of the employer's desire to grind the faces of his workers, but the mark of his real difficulty in making profit enough to enable him to pay more. A good illustration is the industry broadly describable as that of "slop" tailoring—a technical term which, for popular purposes, I shall use in a looser descriptive sense than the strictly correct one. In that industry it was found that while some large businesses paid wages which practically put them outside of any category of sweating, others paid very low wages indeed. And the employers in the latter cases frequently protested that their business could not afford more. They produced their goods under competitive conditions; if they were undersold they lost their trade; and to pay higher wages meant to cut away all profit.

In some cases, perhaps, the only remedy was to compel a rise of wages all round, involving a rise of price. But a number of employers, on investigation, found that there were ways of cheapening production which not only [illegible] but made possible workers as to organisation in general. Such hints actually do pass from workers to labour organisers, who sometimes pass them on to employers with beneficial results. But the price of perfect organisation, like the price of liberty, is eternal vigilance; and there should be a constant openness to new discovery in these matters. When it is realised that organisation means not only increase in wage-paying power, but the possible continuance of employment where otherwise it might be arrested, there is seen to be a new reason for habitual consultation between employers and employed.

In the cases of which I have spoken, gain has come from conference among employers who previously had not conferred. There we have one of the evidences of the importance of trade societies in general. Too often, doubtless, business men are reluctant to give information which will help their competitors; but in this, as in many other directions, the standard of public spirit is steadily rising. War at least reveals that there is a community of national interest which involves every kind of national efficiency. Weak industries are national weaknesses. A few which cannot be made really strong had better just be abandoned; but it is one of the standing lessons of trade experience that the difference between weakness and strength may just be bad organisation.

OLD FREE TRADE CONDITIONS.

The captain of industry, in short, must see to it that he not only makes the utmost use of "science" in all his mechanical processes, but that he himself is scientific in all the departments of his concern. To put it bluntly, he will have to work harder in future. In no country have business men had a larger share of leisure in modern times than in Britain—at least in none of the leading industrial countries where business is carried on on a great scale. Much of this comparative lack of stress was certainly due to the Free Trade conditions of a long past. But the best of fiscal systems cannot in future avert the need for a great increase of productive power in this country. By no other means can it pay off its debts.

To a certain extent the required increase will undoubtedly have to be secured by combinations. The large factory has, up to a certain point, inalienable advantages over the small; and in some industries—the chemical, for instance—the gain from combining a large number of modes of production is overwhelming. This has been abundantly evident in Germany. But combination is not the last word, or the only word, in the extension of production. There is a point at which a giant factory runs multiplying riots of inefficiency, just because the perfect co-ordination of everything calls for more and more stress of attention. I have known a large factory driven to abolish one of its departments and rely on outside work where before it had supplied itself. It is significant that in the past evolution of animal life the giant organisms have mostly died out; and the elephant, in its turn, seems likely to disappear. I do not press the analogy, which could easily mislead us if we followed it confidently; but it is suggestive.

HELP FROM THE "HANDS."

The measure of fitness, in any case, is the same all round—success. If a British industry is found to lag in competition with a foreign one, the sane course is not to begin to call for tariffs, but to ask first whether it is not behind in point of organisation. I could name some which have notoriously been hampered by long-protracted failure of co-operation between employers and employed. And wherever an industry is found to be paying unduly low wages, defective organisation is one of the causes first to be looked for. If employers all round will more and more exchange ideas for the general good, and further try to elicit the ideas of their "hands," a great and helpful impulse may be given.

One hopes for much in this way from the new commercial journalism, which cheerfully presumes to teach business men their business. In the United States, for years past, there have been professional advisers of business con-

Reynolds Newspaper 683
17-6-17

PIECEWORK RATES.

Important Agreement Now Under Discussion.

The adjustment of piecework rates of wages and other systems of payment based on output, necessitated by alterations in manufacturing methods, has been a fruitful source of difficulty in the industrial world. Very satisfactory results, however, are now expected to flow from the friendly discussions of the question which have been included in the negotiations on the Munitions of War Bill conducted by Dr. Addison and Mr. Kellaway, one of his Parliamentary Secretaries, with the Engineering Employers' Federation (of whose Executive Committee Mr. Allan Smith is chairman), and with representatives of the Amalgamated Society of Engineers and the Federation of Shipbuilding and Engineering Trades.

An agreement on this point would probably do more than any other single amendment of the Munitions of War Act to remove suspicion and prevent misunderstandings in future, and all friends of industrial peace will share the hope that the important agreement which is being negotiated will be attended with complete success.

By J. M. ROBERTSON, M.P.

"Science," discussed in the preceding article of this series, is by common consent held to apply, in industry, to the cultivation and application of the higher forms of physical knowledge of all kinds. But the spirit of science, which is simply concern for exact knowledge of causation, enters in some degree into all careful action; and there is assuredly great room for its wider activity in the management of business in general. What the commercial experts call "system" is just the method of science brought to bear in business affairs. And in thousands of businesses "system" is still very imperfectly developed.

To artistic minds, perhaps, the notion may be on some sides repellant. The principle, for instance, that in manufacture there should be no superfluous movement, that the ideal is just to make so many movements as will do the required work and no more, is apt to seem soulless. The artistic soul for which its labour is one of love would linger over some of its tasks, seeking whether or not there may be room for an added touch. But there is really no fundamental difference between art economy and trade economy in view of results. The artist is not so ready as the toiler to "down tools," because his task is for him something more than the doing of efficient work to earn his bread. But even the artist wastes no time, if he can help it, in mixing his colours; and he finds ground for some of his highest praise in "economy of effect" in line and composition in his own field. The artist who makes one sure stroke do what others do by many strokes is acknowledged to be not less, but more, an artist in doing so.

LESSON FROM "SWEATING WAGES."

Of the thousand ways in which force—and therefore Capital and Labour—can be economised I propose to speak here of one—co-ordination of work in factories. In the work of the Trade Boards, which in the recent years of peace were quietly doing so much to improve the conditions of labour in low-waged industries, it was again and again found that "sweating wages" were in many individual cases not the sign of the employer's desire to grind the faces of his workers, but the mark of his real difficulty in making profit enough to enable him to pay more. A good illustration is the industry broadly describable as that of "slop" tailoring—a technical term which, for popular purposes, I shall use in a looser descriptive sense than the strictly correct one. In that industry it was found that while some large businesses paid wages which practically put them outside of any category of sweating, others paid very low wages indeed. And the employers in the latter cases frequently protested that their business could not afford more. They produced their goods under competitive conditions; if they were undersold they lost their trade; and to pay higher wages meant to cut away all profit.

In some cases, perhaps, the only remedy was to compel a rise of wages all round, involving a rise of price. But a number of employers, on investigation, found that there were ways of cheapening production which not only involved no sweating, but made possible at once the payment of better wages. The machinery of the Trade Boards brought together a number of employers who had previously known each other only as rivals. Coming together, rather distrustfully at first, they began to compare notes as to business methods, and, gradually, a number who had supposed themselves unable to spare more for labour, discovered that at some important point or points they were behind their more successful competitors in business methods. Naturally, it would be in the smaller businesses that such discoveries were most frequently made. Factories in general grow great by being well managed. But even in the larger factories, employers at times learned that they were overlooking leakages of time and labour which seriously impaired their total efficiency. Waste of time in the distribution of material and the allotment of tasks will arise in any factory where there is not as vigilant a watch over such details as there is over the financial departments; but in this, as in many other directions, the standard of public spirit is steadily rising. War at least reveals that there is a community of national interest which involves every kind of national efficiency. Weak industries are national weaknesses. A few which cannot be made really strong had better just be abandoned; but it is one of the standing lessons of trade experience that the difference between weakness and strength may just be bad organisation.

OLD FREE TRADE CONDITIONS.

The captain of industry, in short, must see to it that he not only makes the utmost use of "science" in all his mechanical processes, but that he himself is scientific in all the departments of his concern. To put it bluntly, he will have to work harder in future. In no country have business men had a larger share of leisure in modern times than in Britain—at least in none of the leading industrial countries where business is carried on on a great scale. Much of this comparative lack of stress was certainly due to the Free Trade conditions of a long past. But the best of fiscal systems cannot in future avert the need for a great increase of productive power in this country. By no other means can it pay off its debts.

To a certain extent the required increase will undoubtedly have to be secured by combinations. The large factory has, up to a certain point, inalienable advantages over the small; and in some industries—the chemical, for instance—the gain from combining a large number of modes of production is overwhelming. This has been abundantly evident in Germany. But combination is not the last word, or the only word, in the extension of production. There is a point at which a giant factory runs multiplying riots of inefficiency, just because the perfect co-ordination of everything calls for more and more stress of attention. I have known a large factory driven to abolish one of its departments and rely on outside work where before it had supplied itself. It is significant that in the past evolution of animal life the giant organisms have mostly died out; and the elephant, in its turn, seems likely to disappear. I do not press the analogy, which could easily mislead us if we followed it confidently; but it is suggestive.

HELP FROM THE "HANDS."

The measure of fitness, in any case, is the same all round—success. If a British industry is found to lag in competition with a foreign one, the sane course is not to begin to call for tariffs, but to ask first whether it is not behind in point of organisation. I could name some which have notoriously been hampered by long-protracted failure of co-operation between employers and employed. And wherever an industry is found to be paying unduly low wages, defective organisation is one of the causes first to be looked for. If employers all round will more and more exchange ideas for the general good, and further try to elicit the ideas of their "hands," a great and helpful impulse may be given.

One hopes for much in this way from the new commercial journalism, which cheerfully presumes to teach business men their business. In the United States, for years past, there have been professional advisers of business concerns, who undertake to tell a lagging firm, after close inspection, where it is lacking in point of management. It is to be feared that British firms will in general be less ready than American to resort to such guidance. Fear of disclosure will operate, as well as unwillingness to believe than any man can be competent to advise as to the management of business of every kind. One fear I believe to be ill-founded; though there are experts and experts, in this as in other walks of life. Given honesty—and as to this, business men can consult with each other—the experienced man with an eye for organisation may be quite as useful as the sanitary inspector—who is not infallible either.

Pending the development of the organising expert, however, much benefit might be had from a spirit of mutual help among the heads of business themselves. And perhaps the war may have some effect in promoting fraternity of that kind—though it is not a price that any of us would have proposed to pay.

Birmingham Post
23-6-17

INDUSTRIAL UNREST.

WOMEN WORKERS' EVIDENCE.

Evidence on behalf of women workers was heard yesterday by the Industrial Commissioners—Major J. W. Hills, M.P., Mr. J. W. White (Sunderland), and Mr. J. W. Ogden (Heywood)—who are holding sittings in Birmingham to enquire into the causes of industrial unrest. The witnesses were Miss Howarth and Mrs. Mitchell, of the National Federation of Women Workers; and Miss Varley, of the Workers' Union. Arrangements have been made for the Commission to hear numerous working women from the shops. The Commission will resume the sittings on Monday afternoon and evening. Evidence from non-official sources is to be taken, and a deputation of shop stewards from engineering establishments will be received. In the evening Mr. Solomon Hill, of the Engineering and Allied Trades' Federation, will attend before the Commission.

Manchester Dispatch
11-7-17

Latest Labour Conference

Labour delegates met in the Central Hall to-day to determine upon an amendment to the Bill now going through to supplement the original Munitions Act. Dilution of labour, substitution of women for men, of the old for the young, is going forward among trades not controlled by the Ministry of Munitions and doing private as opposed to Government and war work.

The recruiting office takes away a man from the bench or the tool and gives a woman worker in his place. The trade union agrees on condition that the job shall be restored to the man after the war or to another member of the union. But if the union has no legal guarantee of this restoration the men are at the mercy of the employers, who are not in that case liable to prosecution. Consequently to-day's delegates have decided to demand a legal guarantee of restoration of all trade union rules and conditions by employers after the war which have been suspended by agreement.

Such a guarantee has already been allowed to controlled factories and workshops where trade union rules have been suspended. What is claimed is the equivalent protection for the trade unionists in private workshops.

New Statesman
14-7-17

The Prime Minister's reading this week-end is apparently to consist of the separate reports of the eight district Commissions on Labour Unrest whose hurried peregrinations have excited much local interest, but who have been unable, in the limited time allowed, to examine more than a tithe of the witnesses who have desired to be heard. Only in a few special cases have the Commissions taken evidence in public, and no statistics have been compiled. All the eight reports are to be delivered this week at the Prime Minister's office. We gather that high prices and "profiteering," and the failure to get sugar, coal and beer, along with the various restrictions on personal liberty under the Munitions Acts and "Dora," and the manifold grievances against the wages orders of the Ministry of Munitions, form the main burden of the complaints. But there is also definite evidence of no little discontent at the working of the Military Service Acts (especially as to "re-examination" and the treatment of the Conscientious Objectors); at the very partial application of the Trade Boards Acts to women's employment; at the extensive suspension of the benefits of the Factory Acts and the very long hours of work now insisted on; and at the excessive price of lodgings in the munition areas, and the serious shortage of working-class dwellings in all districts due to the almost complete cessation of speculative building of this class during the past few years. The twenty-four Commissioners are to meet in London during the ensuing week to consider whether they cannot agree upon a united report for presentation to Parliament—at least as to the grievances discovered, if not also upon the remedies suggested.

Common Cause
27-7-17.

Industrial Unrest and Women's Wages.

The Report of the Commission of Enquiry into Industrial Unrest has just been issued. The Commission finds the main causes of unrest in two facts—that the cost of living has increased disproportionately to the advance in wages, and that the distribution of food supplies is unequal. It makes various recommendations as to regulation of wages, prices, and distribution. In the matter of prices the Government is already preparing to follow its advice.

The findings of the Commission in connection with wages is the part of the report which most closely affects women. One of these is "the inconsiderate treatment of women whose wages are sometimes as low as 13s." Another, the unsatisfactory working of the Munitions of War Act, 1915, especially as it touches female labour. So much for the hoped-for benefits of Circular L 2, which was to secure a minimum wage of £1 to every woman over eighteen! The Commission strongly supports the proposed formation of Joint Standing Industrial Councils, composed of representatives of employers and employed. It remains to ensure a proper representation of women's interests upon these Councils.

Ship building
16-8-17

Industrial Unrest.—The perplexing issues, industrially and economically, which are being multiplied because of the very serious strain that is being borne by the country, are trying the perspicuity and good sense of both employer and trade union official. The Management Committee of the General Federation of Trade Unions, in their latest report, remark that the reports of the Commissions of Industrial Unrest contain nothing but what was known to the ordinary trade union official, but that they do offer the Government another opportunity of dealing seriously with the situation which is much more complicated and much more difficult than it was when their predecessors were in office. On the question of profiteering the Committee says it is hardly worth while for the Government to limit the rate of profit, if it takes no steps to limit the aggregate amount of profit.

Employment of Women.—The adaptability of women to men's work in war time has been remarkable, and cannot fail to raise important economic issues when the great conflict is over. In the lighter occupations women have filled almost every conceivable position, and even in the heavy industries, such as the iron and steel trades, they are serving in no inconsiderable numbers. The current report of the Iron and Steel Trades Confederation urges that the unions in the industry should keep a watchful eye to see that the patriotism of the women is not exploited by employers who may be seeking to introduce cheap labour simply because it is cheap. The Confederation in the iron and steel industry recommends that before further women are introduced into the trade the unions ought to be consulted and ought to contend that wherever women are employed on work usually done by men they shall receive the same rate of pay as men. Where it took more women to do a given amount of work than was done by a lesser number of men, or where an individual woman had to be relieved of some of the heavier or more dangerous work, it might not be unreasonable that the group of women should receive among them the grouped men's rates, or have an adjustment in their wages which would bear some relation to the relief of the work granted.

Common Cause
31.-8.-17.

The Training of Welfare Workers.

The Report on Industrial Unrest, lately issued, states that there is a feeling among workers, in some districts, that the welfare supervisors selected are not of the right type, and do not thoroughly understand industrial conditions. A Committee invited to consider the selection and training of welfare supervisors has now made its report. It recommends that in addition to the social study courses now given at the London School of Economics, and in connection with several of our Universities, there should also be teaching in the industrial organisation of a factory and the special duties of a welfare supervisor. Students should gain some experience in life as a wage-earner, and bursaries or scholarships should be provided.

Morning Post
25.-6-17.

CAUSES OF INDUSTRIAL UNREST.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE MORNING POST.

SIR,—I am in direct opposition to Mr. W. C. Anderson and his associates with reference to the war. But it is useless to disguise the truth that on the National Workers' (War Emergency) Committee, and in other directions, they have done really good service to the working class. That service, not their pacifism, gives them what influence they possess among the Trade Unionists, and the mass of the people, at the present time. Moreover, your correspondent "Trade Unionist" is, I think, mistaken in not boldly admitting that the discontent and unrest among large numbers of the workers, directly or indirectly in national employment, are in part due to the continuous blundering of the Government. You yourself, sir, have pointed this out very trenchantly more than once. In dealing with great bodies of men frankness, courage, and good faith are always needed. Other qualities are required, but these are indispensable. They have too often been "conspicuous by their absence" among our rulers of yesterday and to-day.

The strike of the engineers need never have occurred had the Government taken account of plain facts that were constantly pressed upon them by the men, and as persistently neglected by "the authorities." In one case, I myself can bear witness that the secretary of the A.S.E. at a most important centre, wrote to the Government explaining fully the action, in contravention of official pledges, which was being taken by its agents on the spot. In spite of repeated requests for reply, that letter remained unanswered for five months! Is that the right way to treat working men upon whose loyal co-operation our victorious soldiers at the front are dependent?—Yours, &c.,

H. M. HYNDMAN.

9, Queen Anne's-gate, S.W.1, June 23.

683/9

683/10

Causes of Industrial Unrest.

THE WOMEN'S STANDPOINT.

The Reports of the Commission of Enquiry into Industrial Unrest, issued last week, show that the working-classes have many serious causes for discontent; some the inevitable consequences of war, some that might have been avoided and may still be remedied, and others the result of misconception. Unrest in the industrial world is no new thing. It existed in an acute form before the war, and though it is at present allayed, to some extent, by the necessity for united national effort, there are signs that serious trouble may be expected immediately after the war, or even before it ends, if steps are not taken to deal promptly and sympathetically with some of its causes.

To the grievances already existing, others have been added, and it is with those resulting from the war, rather than with the more permanent causes of irritation, that the Reports chiefly deal. These fall into three main headings :—

I. Interferences with the liberty of the people, both as citizens and workers.

Under this heading come the Military Service Act, which many workers feel has not been at all fairly administered, the curtailing of freedom to leave employment, liquor restrictions, and various other minor restrictions, that all tend to increase irritation.

II. Interference with trade customs, and the suspicion that these will not be restored after the war, according to pledge.

Unrest on this score is increased by industrial fatigue.

III. Interference with domestic comfort.

Discontent caused by the great increase in the price of food has been much increased by unequal distribution, the poor having suffered much more inconvenience than the well-to-do, and by the suspicion that prices have been inflated by profiteers. In many districts lack of housing accommodation has been added to the irritation caused by unaccustomed diet and liquor restrictions. Industrial workers have suffered great discomfort, and the lot of the housewife has been hard indeed. Unable to buy sugar or potatoes, told to cut down her family's consumption of bread, she has had to wrestle, in cramped surroundings, with strange kinds of food that her skill is quite unable to render palatable. In addition to her own family, she has often lodgers to feed and "do for," and if, at the end of her hard day's work, her culinary efforts were rejected with scorn, her cup of bitterness must have overflowed.

The causes of unrest enumerated under headings I. and II. have already been discussed at considerable length in the daily Press. So, too, has the question of food prices. Less has been said about the subject of housing, which is emphatically a woman's question, but reports from some of the areas into which the country was divided for purposes of this investigation show that a state of things exists which is a national disgrace. One can only be amazed at the wonderful patience of the women who can try to make a home in such conditions, and the apathy of the local councils that have allowed it to come about. This question is dealt with more fully on page 224.

The Commissioners have very little to say with regard to the special grievances of women as workers, but though these cannot be regarded as actually causing industrial unrest, they certainly require prompt remedy.

In the North-Western area—where the Commissioners seem to have taken most pains to find out the women's point of view, examining a number of women witnesses, from whom they state they received most valuable assistance—the chief cause of complaint among the female workers seems to be that the promises to pay women the same rates as men for the same work, and to give them the minimum wage which they are entitled to, have not been carried out. The illusory nature of these promises has frequently been pointed out in THE COMMON CAUSE, and it is discouraging to find that, in spite of representations to the Ministry of Munitions from various quarters, there is still cause for complaint. "Details of shop discipline, such as the closing of lavatories were also rightly complained of," says the Report, "and there seems to be an opinion among working women that the Welfare Workers are not always drawn from a class that really understand the needs and habits of the girls whose interests they are appointed to safeguard."

The Commissions for the London and South-Eastern Area lay special stress in their report on the hardship incurred by women through suspension. "Of all the suggestions offered in this Report," they state, "there is none which we desire more strongly to urge than this, that women suspended where they are not at fault should be provided with continuing pay, or furnished with sufficient means to enable them at once to return home." It is certainly a gross injustice that workers forbidden by law from leaving their place of employment can yet be suspended, perhaps for several weeks, with only a small proportion of their usual weekly wage, or in some cases none at all. Most of these women are living far from their own homes in lodgings; yet, according to a statement lately made by Mrs. W. C. Anderson, Secretary of the National Federation of Women Workers, no passes are issued to them, as they are to men munition workers, though the homes of some are at such a distance that the return fare costs £3 or more, and they have not been home since they started work. As a concession, she says, they are now to be allowed the passes that the men do not need, but this is quite inadequate.

There is urgent need for putting a stop to the practice of suspension without proper payment, the dangers of which, in the case of women and girls away from home, are obvious, and it is to be hoped that a Government order dealing with this question will be not only made, but strictly enforced. Unfortunately, no satisfactory arrangement has yet been made whereby women can obtain prompt attention for their grievances. They have not the same strong trade-union backing as the men, and they are more timid in putting forward complaints. The Commission for the West Midlands recommend that all women appearing before munitions tribunals should be allowed to see a Woman Assessor in private, and also that the Tribunals should not meet in a Court of Law, as they often do at present, and certainly not in a Police Court. The women, they state, particularly dislike this, and rather than face the publicity will submit to injustice.

With regard to the men's attitude towards the women, a certain amount of jealousy is reported on account of the high wages sometimes earned by women. Apprentices, it is stated, engaged on quite important work, may be receiving, after many years' experience, wages that "bear no proper relation to wages earned by female labour recently introduced." It also sometimes happens that a "skilled man with a life's experience behind him, sees a girl or youth, whom perhaps he himself has taught, earning twice as much as he does. The injury to his self-respect is as great as that to his pocket." Supervisors often do not earn as much as the workers whom they supervise, and often "the tool-maker and the gauge-maker, both skilled men, whose skill is the basis on which the machine operates, are still working on a pre-war rate, plus the bonuses and advances received since the war; but, taking all this into account, are receiving considerably less than the piece-workers." This inequality of wages between the skilled and semi-skilled is mentioned in several reports as a cause of acute discontent.

While there is a certain amount of resentment because women, here and there, are earning wages that seem to their male fellow-workers unduly high, there is also considerable apprehension that women will be used to lower piece rates, and the West Midlands Commission reports that they are satisfied that in some instances the employment of women is actually being used for this purpose. But if the men and women workers will only pull together they can surely make exploitation of this kind impossible. Strongly backed by the men, the women should be able to insist on equal pay for equal work. They will then, without detriment to male workers, be able to take their share in building up our industries again after the war, just as they are taking their share now in furnishing munitions.

Should employers go behind the promise of the Government and attempt to exploit women's labour to bring down rates of pay, there will undoubtedly be such a war between capital and labour as the world has never seen. The Commissioners give grave warnings as to what may happen if steps are not taken to dispel the impression, steadily gaining ground among the workers, that they cannot rely on the pledges given by the Government with regard to the restoration of pre-war customs. The Scottish Report states: "What is known as Dilution of Labour is a very fruitful source of labour unrest. This unrest appears to arise chiefly from the fear that, notwithstanding statutory undertakings to the contrary, dilution will continue after the war, either through the bad faith of employers or through industrial necessity. We believe that unrest on this score would be largely allayed if an undertaking were given publicly by a responsible Minister that if (as many people believe will happen) it should be found impossible to restore exactly certain pre-war conditions, the new conditions would be mutually arranged in conference with employers and workmen."

The Commissioners for the North-Eastern Area also urge that there must be no going back on, or varying any pledges that have been given, and that "if circumstances have shown that the pledges were given without realisation of the circumstances as they have emerged, it is better to trust to the good and liquor restrictions. Industrial workers have suffered great discomfort, and the lot of the housewife has been hard indeed. Unable to buy sugar or potatoes, told to cut down her family's consumption of bread, she has had to wrestle, in cramped surroundings, with strange kinds of food that her skill is quite unable to render palatable. In addition to her own family, she has often lodgers to feed and "do for," and if, at the end of her hard day's work, her culinary efforts were rejected with scorn, her cup of bitterness must have overflowed.

The causes of unrest enumerated under headings I. and II. have already been discussed at considerable length in the daily Press. So, too, has the question of food prices. Less has been said about the subject of housing, which is emphatically a woman's question, but reports from some of the areas into which the country was divided for purposes of this investigation show that a state of things exists which is a national disgrace. One can only be amazed at the wonderful patience of the women who can try to make a home in such conditions, and the apathy of the local councils that have allowed it to come about. This question is dealt with more fully on page 224.

The Commissioners have very little to say with regard to the special grievances of women as workers, but though these cannot be regarded as actually causing industrial unrest, they certainly require prompt remedy.

In the North-Western area—where the Commissioners seem to have taken most pains to find out the women's point of view, examining a number of women witnesses, from whom they state they received most valuable assistance—the chief cause of complaint among the female workers seems to be that the promises to pay women the same rates as men for the same work, and to give them the minimum wage which they are entitled to, have not been carried out. The illusory nature of these promises has frequently been pointed out in THE COMMON CAUSE, and it is discouraging to find that, in spite of representations to the Ministry of Munitions from various quarters, there is still cause for complaint. "Details of shop discipline, such as the closing of lavatories were also rightly complained of," says the Report, "and there seems to be an opinion among working women that the Welfare Workers are not always drawn from a class that really understand the needs and habits of the girls whose interests they are appointed to safeguard."

The Commissions for the London and South-Eastern Area lay special stress in their report on the hardship incurred by certain amount of jealousy is reported on account of the high wages sometimes earned by women. Apprentices, it is stated, engaged on quite important work, may be receiving, after many years' experience, wages that "bear no proper relation to wages earned by female labour recently introduced." It also sometimes happens that a "skilled man with a life's experience behind him, sees a girl or youth, whom perhaps he himself has taught, earning twice as much as he does. The injury to his self-respect is as great as that to his pocket." Supervisors often do not earn as much as the workers whom they supervise, and often "the tool-maker and the gauge-maker, both skilled men, whose skill is the basis on which the machine operates, are still working on a pre-war rate, plus the bonuses and advances received since the war; but, taking all this into account, are receiving considerably less than the piece-workers." This inequality of wages between the skilled and semi-skilled is mentioned in several reports as a cause of acute discontent.

While there is a certain amount of resentment because women, here and there, are earning wages that seem to their male fellow-workers unduly high, there is also considerable apprehension that women will be used to lower piece rates, and the West Midlands Commission reports that they are satisfied that in some instances the employment of women is actually being used for this purpose. But if the men and women workers will only pull together they can surely make exploitation of this kind impossible. Strongly backed by the men, the women should be able to insist on equal pay for equal work. They will then, without detriment to male workers, be able to take their share in building up our industries again after the war, just as they are taking their share now in furnishing munitions.

Should employers go behind the promise of the Government and attempt to exploit women's labour to bring down rates of pay, there will undoubtedly be such a war between capital and labour as the world has never seen. The Commissioners give grave warnings as to what may happen if steps are not taken to dispel the impression, steadily gaining ground among the workers, that they cannot rely on the pledges given by the Government with regard to the restoration of pre-war customs. The Scottish Report states: "What is known as Dilution of Labour is a very fruitful source of labour unrest. This unrest appears to arise chiefly from the fear that, notwithstanding statutory undertakings to the contrary, dilution will continue after the war, either through the bad faith employers or through industrial necessity. We believe th unrest on this score would be largely allayed if an undertaking were given publicly by a responsible Minister that if (as many people believe will happen) it should be found impossible to restore exactly certain pre-war conditions, the new conditions would be mutually arranged in conference with employers and workmen."

The Commissioners for the North-Eastern Area also urge that there must be no going back on, or varying any pledges that have been given, and that "if circumstances have shown that the pledges were given without realisation of the circumstances as they have emerged, it is better to trust to the good sense of the workers than to raise any doubt as to the bona-fides of the pledges given."

Women employed on work hitherto closed to them, are profoundly hoping that the good sense of their male fellow-workers will lead them to take a broader view of women's place in industry than trade unionists have usually done in the past. They are feeling very anxious; for while some leading trade unionists have frankly admitted that the women "have come to stay," and have a right to stay, threats of "turning the women out" are heard in many quarters. It is impossible to view without apprehension agreements made between representatives of employers' associations on the one hand, and of the trade unions on the other, without any representation of women's interests; especially as some of the most powerful trade unions do not admit women to membership. Dilution cannot, of course, be continued without the trade unions' full consent. The Government's pledge on this score was quite definite; but if the scheme formulated by the Whitley Committee is adopted, there should be women's representatives on all the committees appointed. If the point of view of the women workers is put forward with tact and courage, there is hope that the trade unions will not insist on pre-war restrictions on women's labour, but will content themselves with obtaining the safeguard of a pledge that equal pay shall be given for the same unit of work. This safeguard, staunchly upheld by the unions, should allay any fear of the men being ousted by the women. Employers, as a rule, show a decided preference for male labour, other things being equal, and if slack times come the women will be the first to go. There is certainly no desire on the part of the women to oust the men, but it is to be hoped, as much from the national point of view as for the sake of the women themselves, that no hasty action will be taken to deprive them, as soon as the war is over, of all chance of using the skill they have acquired. According to many prophecies, there will be room and to spare for all in the work of building up our industries anew.

M. MEREDITH.

Wood Green Sentinel
13-10-17

A WOMAN TO WOMEN.

Miss Mary McLaren Ramsey gave a very good address to a meeting of Wood Green Liberal women in the Liberal Club on Monday afternoon.

She explained in a sympathetic and well-informed way the struggles trade unionists had made to win for themselves a measure of protection against the selfishness of private employers, and had sacrificed them at the outbreak of the war to increase production for the nation's safety on a promise that after the war they shall all be restored. She explained how "unrest" had followed upon this, and set forth the causes as discovered by the hastily appointed commissions of investigation which had recently reported, showing real causes for discontent. She stressed the fact that Government departments had given satisfaction to neither the employers or the employed, and went on to commend the suggestions of the Whitley Committee in favour of permanent organisations of employers and employed (with something like universal trade unionism), not merely to deal with disputes after they have arisen, but to settle causes of difficulty in advance.

Somebody asked how the Whitley plan would satisfy those who begin to see that industry and increased production need not depend on "private profit." To which she replied that, of course, there were some who wished to "put industry on a different basis altogether." The same questioner made reference to articles in the "Times," written to inflame public feeling against all organised labour. Miss Ramsey replied that she does not read or take her ideas from the "Times." The retort was that the "Times" articles represent the feeling of industrial magnates who are very powerful.

It is all to the good that women should be made aware of what is needed to preserve the standard of life represented by men's wages, especially that women are now likely to have votes, and we should like to hear Miss Ramsey at the Liberal Club again.

Coventry - Embargo Strike
Name + date of paper not given:

68

SERIOUS STRIKE START.

60,000 Workers Idle in Birmingham.

16,000 COVENTRY MEN.

Churchill's Offer to Meet the Leaders.

The chief development in the munitions strike is the carrying out of the threat by the Birmingham men to cease work.

It is estimated that 60,000 workers in the city are idle to-day.

Several centres agreed to await the decision of the national conference, and at a Woolwich meeting it was decided to advise the Coventry strikers to return to work.

A Coventry telegram says yesterday has brought no new development in the position there, but the strikers claim that they have been joined by the United Machine Workers and the number of men unemployed raised to 16,000.

No further development is looked for till the result of the Leeds conference is known.

A meeting last night of the executive of the London District Committee of the Engineering Trade Unions passed a resolution stating that notwithstanding the various explanations of the Government they are not satisfied as to the necessity of the embargo scheme and are calling a mass meeting to consider the position.

POINTS IN DISPUTE.

Birmingham Workers' Reply to Mr. Churchill.

Many thousands of skilled workers ceased work in Birmingham at six o'clock last evening as a protest against the embargo placed upon their movement by the Ministry of Munitions.

The Joint Committee of the Birmingham and District Engineering Trade Unions sat continuously at 23, Colmore-row until six o'clock in order to be ready for any advance towards a settlement. The only communication they received up to six o'clock was a letter from the local representative of the Ministry intimating officially that the Ministry could not consent even to the suspension of the embargo.

Grave Position.

Tuesday's mass meetings in Birmingham and Smethwick had re-affirmed the decision to "down tools" unless the embargo was removed or suspended pending negotiations, and the Joint Committee, acting upon their instructions, expressed the opinion, after receiving the letter from the Ministry, that the men and women affected were left with no option but to carry into effect the decision of Sunday's mass meeting.

The position judged from all points of view, including that of the output of munitions and the general public of the city, could hardly be worse than it is. From Temple-row the Joint Committee adjourned to 15, Spiceal-street, Bull-ring, where a protracted combined meeting of the district committees of the twelve societies directly affected took place.

Reports were brought in as to the response of the twenty workers to the decision of the mass meetings. Various estimates of the number of night-shift workers were given, both officially and unofficially, but obviously this is a point which will not be [illegible] accurately until Monday, when the full effect of the decisions [illegible] should be known.

The Ministry's Leaflet.

In the course of [illegible] the Ministry of Munitions distributed in Birmingham and the district a leaflet, in the form of a letter, addressed to the National Labour Advisory Committee (who are meeting the Minister of Munitions to-day to discuss the embargo) in the following terms:—

> Responsibility for the whole position in Birmingham rests with the Minister of Munitions, as the men and women are only standing out for the original suggestion made by the National Labour Advisory Committee to his Majesty's Minister of Munitions, namely, that local committees, consisting of representatives of the local Engineering Employers' Association, the trade unions, and the Ministry should be set up at once to deal with the whole question of the embargo, and that in the meantime the embargo should be raised.

A number of Birmingham trade union secretaries and officials will, it is anticipated, attend the meeting between the National Labour Advisory Committee and the Ministry of Munitions which is taking place in London to-day.

Discharged Soldiers' Offer.

Following a meeting attended by 400 members, the secretary of the Birmingham Branch of the Discharged Soldiers' Association wired as follows last night to Mr. Winston Churchill:

> National Federation Discharged Sailors and Soldiers, Birmingham, representing 6,000 discharged men, absolutely unanimous in remaining at work, and offer their services to Government immediately. Letter follows.

Many of the men present, it was stated, are members of the A.S.E. and other skilled unions.

It was decided that a demonstration should be held in the Bull-ring to-night, and that the Toolmakers and members of the A.S.E. should be allowed to state their case.

A BALLOT VOTE.

COVENTRY'S STEP ON THE EMBARGO QUESTION.

(From Our Own Correspondent.)

COVENTRY, Wednesday Night.

The Engineering Joint Committee has decided to take a ballot vote on the embargo question as follows:

(1) The Joint Committee's recommendation.

(2) The result of the National Allied Conference at Leeds.

This information was given in a statement made to the Press late in the afternoon by Mr. James Reid, secretary to the Joint Committee.

He further stated that 15 societies at the aggregate meeting decided to accept the committee's recommendation to suspend the week's notice pending a national allied conference. Five societies did not report, owing to no meetings having been held. It was then decided that a ballot be taken, and the committee also decided to recommend the members to continue work pending the result of the ballot.

Mr. Reid added that an official letter had been received from Rugby stating that the members there had agreed to fall into line with Coventry, and to suspend notices pending the result of the national conference.

In the afternoon members of the Steam Engine Makers' and the United Machine Workers held a meeting and decided to join the A.S.E. and the toolmakers in rejecting the Joint Committee's recommendation to suspend strike notices.

The factories were all working yesterday, but the absence of the skilled workers caused considerable disorganisation.

CHURCHILL'S DECISION.

READY TO MEET LEADERS AND SHOP STEWARDS.

Replying to Lord Henry Cavendish Bentinck in the Commons yesterday, Mr. Churchill said that it was open to the Trade Union Advisory Committee or any branch of it specially elected to discuss the administration of any scheme affecting labour which they desired to raise.

It was very difficult to express an opinion as to the machinery without the necessary discussion with the responsible representatives of labour and also with the representatives of the employers, but if from these bodies were received suggestions of a practical character machinery existed for the purpose, and it would be easy to carry [illegible] into effect.

Reports were brought in as to the response of the twenty workers to the decision of the mass meetings. Various estimates of the number of night-shift workers were given, both officially and unofficially, but obviously this is a point which will not be cleared up very definitely until to-day, when the full effect of the down-tools policy should be known.

The Ministry's Leaflet.

In the course of yesterday the Ministry of Munitions published broadcast in Birmingham and the district a leaflet, in question and answer form, setting forth as "Notes to Workmen," the character and meaning of the embargo. The contents of this leaflet and the statement reported elsewhere, made by Mr. Winston Churchill in the House of Commons yesterday afternoon, were considered by the District Committees at their meeting, and late in the evening Mr. Percival Bower, secretary of the Joint Committee, issued the following official rejoinder:—

"The statement made by Mr. Churchill in the House of Commons in reply to Mr. Tyson Wilson, is a gross misrepresentation of the true facts. In the first place he could, had he wished, have called the National Labour Advisory Committee together long ago. Many of the members of this body have waited patiently hourly expecting to receive a summons.

Workers' Reply.

"The negotiations in Birmingham have been conducted by the Joint Committee of Engineering Trade Unions, which is a constitutionally-elected body comprising three delegates from each society's district committee, or thirty-six delegates in all. To designate this body as an unorganised or unofficially organised body is monstrously to distort the truth.

"The Joint Committee have used every available hour and every ounce of effort to avert a stoppage, but the damaging statements made in the explanatory pamphlet issued by the Ministry of Munitions in the district this afternoon, particularly questions and answers 3 and 17, causes the officials more difficulty than ever in justifying the Ministry's attitude."

Questions and answers 3 and 17 referred to are as follow:—

3.—Is the embargo of general application?—It only applies to about 100 firms at present, and will only be extended as need is shown.

17.—Is it true that the trade unions have not been consulted?—No: they had the scheme fully explained to them this spring. They were not asked to agree to or to approve of the scheme. The Ministry expressly stated that the responsibility was the Government's.

Asked to indicate the position as it had developed since the fateful hour of 6 p.m., Mr. Bower said among other matters which the combined meeting of the District Committees had considered was the question submitted to them by a skilled union as to whether or not skilled men responsible for the maintenance of the whole of the electric current of the city should or should not cease work simultaneously with all other workmen affected.

Another question which they had to consider seriously at the request of the men themselves, was the position of a large number of Army Reserve munition workers in the district who were members of their respective organisations.

"In both cases," Mr. Bower continued, "a settlement of the matters submitted which was satisfactory to the parties putting forward the questions has been arrived at." Although pressed by several newspaper men, Mr. Bower and the other officials present declined to be more explicit.

Churchill and the Embargo.

In a statement issued during the morning on behalf of the Joint Committee, Mr. Percival Bower said a telegram had been Trade Union Advisory Committee or any branch of it specially elected to discuss the administration of any scheme affecting labour which they desired to raise.

It was very difficult to express an opinion as to the machinery without the necessary discussion with the responsible representatives of labour and also with the representatives of the employers, but if from these bodies were received suggestions of a practical character machinery existed for the purpose, and it would be easy to carry any decision come to into effect.

Colonel Sir F. Hall asked whether when the 12½ per cent. bonus was granted it was done in accordance with the representations of Labour and were the leaders consulted.

Mr. Churchill replied that the difficulties of the 12½ per cent. bonus lay in the past; he had enough difficulties in the present.

Replying to Mr. Tyson Wilson, Mr. Churchill said that the Department did their utmost to consult the representatives of the working classes as represented by the principal trade union leaders, but in this case there were unorganised or unofficially organised bodies who had put forward their point of view, and to have regard only to them would be to weaken the authority of the recognised responsible leaders of Labour.

Mr. Churchill added that if any of the trade union leaders liked to bring with them the shop stewards the Ministry would be ready to meet them.

THREAT TO STRIKERS.

SHOULD BE CALLED UP TO FIGHT, SAYS MR. ROBERTS.

Speaking at the Holborne Restaurant, Mr. G. H. Roberts, Minister of Labour, referring to the munitions strike, said if it had been a matter between employer and employed the strike might have been pursued without those engaged in it laying themselves upon to the operation of the Military Service Act.

As this was a strike against the State he was sure public opinion would agree that the strikers ought not to be exempted from the operation of the Act.

If they persisted in withholding their labour at a time of extreme national emergency it was only right that they should be called up to fight.

NEAR AND FAR.

Owing to illness being so prevalent, the schools at Earl Shilton, Hinckley, have had to be closed down.

Private H. J. Hines, whose mother resides at 22, Vicarage-road, Leomanster, Lichfield, is reported missing since 27 May. Before joining the colours he was employed by the L. and N.-W. Railway Co.

At the funeral of Private G. Corbett at Earl Shilton, Hinckley, two members of the firing party were wounded at the same time as deceased over a year ago. Discharged soldiers carried the coffin to the grave and members of the local V.T.C. followed in procession.

Acock's Green Free Churches Sewing Guild, which was formed in September, 1914, under the auspices of the Lady Mayoress's Fund to supply and make garments for sailors and soldiers and prisoners of war, has up to date made and forwarded over 1,500 garments. Eighteen special voluntary war workers badges have been awarded to date. The president of the guild is Mrs. Horton.

The Times
July 16th. 1917.

FUTURE OF CHILD LABOUR.

PLANS FOR DEMOBILIZATION AND AFTER.

The Ministry of Labour have issued the report of a conference which was recently held at the Ministry of Labour Employment Department, under the chairmanship of Mr. R. A. Bray, Chairman of the London (Central) Advisory Committee on Juvenile Employment, and which was called mainly to discuss a memorandum prepared by Mr. Bray on the problem of juvenile employment after the war. Lively discussion arose as regards the necessity of approaching employers with a view to inducing them (a) to notify discharges of juveniles in advance; (b) to notify all vacancies to Juvenile Employment Committees during the period of demobilization, and (c) to consider and formulate schemes of apprenticeship and training. The conference felt that some arrangement should be made which would prevent the children from wandering from one employer to another in search of work, and that every effort should be made to provide training for young people engaged in industry. It was decided that the London (Central) Advisory Committee should approach the Ministry of Munitions, the Reconstruction Committee of the Cabinet, the Ministry of Labour, and possibly the Board of Trade, in the matter, and that an urgent appeal should be made to employers.

In view of the dislocation of industry likely to occur during the period of the transfer of labour from "war" work to other work, the conference agreed that it was highly desirable that centres for unemployed boys and girls should be provided during the demobilization period. It was decided that the London (Central) Advisory Committee should refer the general question of the provision of premises and workers to the Reconstruction Committee of the Cabinet, the Ministry of Munitions, and the Ministry of Labour. It was also decided to suggest to the Reconstruction Committee that the War Office be asked to demobilize teachers immediately on the conclusion of peace. As regards the question of limiting the number of children entering the labour market, it was agreed that every effort should be made to persuade children attaining the school-leaving age to remain at school. Heated discussion took place on the proposals for the prohibition of employment for wages of children liable to attend school, and on this point it was necessary to take a vote, the result of which showed a majority of 30 in favour of total prohibition. As regards the question of the limitation of hours of employment immediately on the declaration of peace, and the raising of the compulsory age for attendance at school, a general agreement was arrived at.

Daily News
29.7.18

THE FUTURE OF WAR WORKERS.

Extensive Readjustments Foreshadowed.

RECONSTRUCTION REPORT.

Important recommendations are made in the first interim report of the Civil War Workers' Committee, of which Mr. Gerald Bellhouse is chairman.

Steps should be taken, it is urged, by the Government to assist munition and other workers discharged on the termination of hostilities to return to their former or other employment.

It is estimated that of the 5,000,000 recruitments up to July, 1917, 4,000,000 have been drawn from industrial and commercial occupations and transport. About half of the reduction in the number of males has been made good from various sources, while, in addition, the loss of men has been replaced by nearly 1,400,000 women, of whom 1,000,000 represent a net increase of women employed in occupations outside their own homes.

A MOST SERIOUS PROBLEM.

The question how many of the latter will desire to remain in such occupations after the war, and the extent to which it will be possible for them to obtain employment, will form one of the most serious problems with which the country will be faced. A further report on the subject will be prepared.

It is proposed also to deal with the position of juvenile labour, as regards which the Committee have already taken some evidence.

It is estimated that the total number of persons employed in January, 1917, in industries from which there is likely to be a considerable outflow of labour after the war was: Men, 1,380,000; women, 591,000. There is no reason to suppose that more than a proportion of these workers will be discharged, but there will be extensive readjustment, which must involve, at any rate temporarily, some abnormal unemployment.

FULFILLING THE PLEDGE.

The numbers of semi-skilled workers, and especially of women, for whom employment will be available in the engineering and certain other trades after the war will be largely determined by the arrangements made to carry into effect the pledges given as regards the restoration of trade union conditions suspended during the war. It is of vital importance to the early resumption of industrial activity on a peace basis that a settlement of this question should be arrived at before the end of the war.

1918

Times. 28.11.18.

700/3

THE NEW WAGES ACT.

POLICY OF THE MINISTRY OF LABOUR.

The Ministry of Labour issues the following statement with reference to the Wages (Temporary Regulation) Act, which passed through Parliament last week :—

The Act, which repeals Part I. of the Munitions of War Act, 1915, renders necessary certain alterations in the procedure hitherto adopted for the settlement of differences as to wages. The main purpose of the new Act is to secure the maintenance for a period of six months of the minimum wages generally applicable at the date of the signing of the armistice in each trade or branch of a trade or district, to each class of workmen, except in so far as these minimum wages are varied by arbitration or by agreement.

"Workmen" includes men and boys, women and girls, and the wage elements dealt with by the Act are the recognized time rate or other basis for determining wages (e.g., in the various trades, a shift rate, or piece-work price list, or scale of tonnage rates, &c.), the usual allowances for overtime, night work, week-ends, or holidays when any of these are worked, and the general war bonuses or war advances where these are paid in addition to the time rate or other wage basis. The wage resulting from these elements, ascertained with regard to classes of, as distinct from individual, workmen, is called "the prescribed rate of wages." Other elements in wages are not dealt with by the Act, nor are the wages of individuals. Such matters are for arrangement between the parties concerned.

The Act contains special provisions in the case of the wages of women and girls.

During the six months period for which the Act provides the prescribed rate of wages may be varied either as the result of arbitration or an agreement or settlement approved by the Minister of Labour. The Act provides for the establishment of a Court of Arbitration, which will deal with differences referred to it by the Ministry of Labour in cases where the parties have been unable to settle as to what the prescribed rate should be.

Freedom to Negotiate.

It will be observed that the Wages Act alters in important respects the wages position under the Munitions of War Acts. Minimum rates of wages being provided for, it leaves all other questions as to wages open to free negotiation. The Minister of Labour trusts that this freedom to negotiate will be generally exercised in a conciliatory spirit, so that satisfactory wage arrangements of a permanent character may be established in each trade before the Act expires.

Questions which do not come under the Wages Act, and which cannot be settled satisfactorily by the employers and workpeople concerned or by the employers' associations and the trade unions, may, with the consent of both parties, be referred to arbitration through the Ministry of Labour under the Conciliation Act, 1896. Requests for arbitration under this Act should, if possible, be made jointly by the parties concerned. Under this Act the Ministry of Labour can appoint an arbitrator only with the consent of both sides.

The Minister of Labour has established a Wages and Arbitration Department (under Mr. H. J. Wilson, C.B.E., Assistant Secretary) to deal with questions relating to wages, &c., under the Wages Act and the Conciliation Act, 1896. Correspondence arising out of these Acts should be addressed to the Secretary, Ministry of Labour, Montagu House, Whitehall, S.W.1.

DISCHARGES OF MUNITIONS WORKERS.

RIGHT TO WEEK'S NOTICE OR WAGES.

In connexion with discharges of munitions workers, the Minister of Munitions wishes to point out for general information that (with the exception of persons engaged in manual labour on certain building and construction work, certain classes of sea-going engineers, and workmen engaged in ship repairing, or whose employment is of a discontinuous or temporary nature), workpeople engaged on, or in connexion with, the manufacture of munitions are in general entitled, in accordance with the provisions of Section 3 of the Munitions of War Act, 1917, to a week's notice of discharge or a week's wages in lieu of notice.

If, therefore, a munitions worker (not falling within the above exceptions) is discharged with less than a week's notice or wages in lieu thereof, he or she can complain to a local Munitions Tribunal and claim payment of a week's wages in lieu of notice by the employer. All necessary particulars, together with the proper form of complaint, can be obtained from any employment exchange.

The Minister of Munitions would be glad if employers generally would give their workpeople as early an intimation as possible of any intention to discharge, and would in all cases give the employment exchanges at least a fortnight's notice of impending discharges.

Daily News. 28.11.18.

SIX MONTHS WAGES MINIMUM.

Freedom of Negotiations on Other Questions.

The Ministry of Labour calls attention to the Wages (Temporary Regulation) Act which passed through Parliament last week. The Act (which repeals Part I of the Munitions of War Act, 1915) renders necessary certain alterations in the procedure hitherto adopted for the settlement of differences as to wages. The main purpose of the new Act is to secure the maintenance for a period of six months of the minimum wages generally applicable at the date of the signing of the armistice

"Workmen" includes men and boys, women and girls, and the wage elements dealt with by the Act are the recognised time rate or other basis for determining wages (e.g., in the various trades, a shift rate, or piece-work price list, or scale of tonnage rates, etc., etc.), the usual allowances for overtime, night-work, week-ends or holidays when any of these are worked, and the general war bonuses or war advances where these are paid in addition to the time-rate or other wage basis.

WOMEN AND GIRLS.

The Act contains special provisions in the case of the wages of women and girls.

During the six months period for which the Act provides the prescribed rate of wages may be varied either as the result of arbitration or an agreement or settlement approved by the Minister of Labour. The Act provides for the establishment of a Court of Arbitration, which will deal with differences referred to it by the Ministry of Labour

It will be observed that the Wages Act alters in important respects the wages position under the Munitions of War Acts. Minimum rates of wages being provided for, it leaves all other questions as to wages open to free negotiation. The Minister of Labour trusts that this freedom to negotiate will be generally exercised in a concilatory spirit

REQUESTS FOR ARBITRATION.

Questions which do not come under the Wages Act, and which cannot be settled satisfactorily by the employers and workpeople concerned or by the employers' associations and the trade unions, may, with the consent of both parties, be referred to arbitration through the Ministry of Labour under the Conciliation Act, 1896. Requests for arbitration under this Act should, if possible, be made jointly by the parties concerned. Under this Act the Ministry of Labour can appoint an arbitrator only with the consent of both sides.

G. R.

MINISTRY of MUNITIONS

OFFICIAL NOTICE TO CONTRACTORS, SUB-CONTRACTORS & WORKPEOPLE ENGAGED on WORK for the MINISTRY.

The great task before the country is the transformation of industry from war to peace. This necessarily involves the disturbance and dislocation of industries and workshops, and very large numbers of workpeople will have to change their employment, and in many cases their present abodes. This must be faced.

In order that the change may be made with the least possible hardship and the minimum of waste, exceptional arrangements are necessary. The Government intend to recognise in these arrangements the good work which has been done by munitions workers in helping to bring the war to a victorious conclusion.

The following instructions are hereby issued to all factories and firms engaged on work for the Ministry of Munitions:

1. There should, so far as possible, be no immediate general discharge of munitions workers.

2. All workers, however, who desire to withdraw from industry or to leave for any reason, and all workers who can be absorbed elsewhere, should be at once released.

3. Production on contracts for guns and gun-ammunition, machine-guns, small arms, and small-arms ammunition; trench warfare mortars, bombs and stores, pyrotechnic stores; aerial bombs; all accessories of the above stores; aircraft and aero-engines; and the manufacture of explosives, should be reduced in the following way:

(a) All overtime should be immediately abolished.

(b) System of payment by results may be temporarily suspended provided that the customs of the trade and the expediency of the case render this possible. In such cases the customary notice of the transfer from payment by results to time work should be given.

(c) When a transfer to time work has taken place a reduction of the hourly week should, wherever possible, be introduced. The reduction of hours will also apply to men already on time work, and in their case the customary procedure as to reduction of hours should be followed.

(d) Whenever reduced hours are worked on a time-work basis, the number of hours worked must not be less than one-half of the hours in the present normal working week of the establishment. If in any case the earnings of the workpeople for the full weekly number of hours on the short-time system fall below the following amounts:

	Per week.
Men of 18 years and over.....	30s. 0d.
Boys under 18	15s. 0d.
Women of 18 years and over.	25s. 0d.
Girls under 18	12s. 6d.

their earnings will be made up to these sums by the employer, who will be reimbursed by the State. Where time is lost, the amounts payable will be sums proportionate to the number of hours actually worked.

4. The adoption of half-time may cause unavoidable discharges, but every effort should be made to minimise unemployment, utilising employees for a short period on labouring and cleaning up work. In allotting this work, preference should be given to workpeople who are ordinarily dependent upon industrial employment.

5. All persons discharged, or claiming release, can obtain free railway warrants for journeys from the place of employment to their homes or to places where they have found new employment. The warrants will be issued through the Employment Exchanges. In cases where large numbers are required, warrants can be obtained by the employers from the Employment Exchanges for issue at the works.

6. Directions will be given at an early date with regard to War Munition Volunteers, Army Reserve Munitions Workers, and other special classes of workers.

7. The foregoing instructions are issued for the guidance of contractors until individual firms receive further and particular instructions from the Ministry of Munitions. The loyal and cordial co-operation of all employers is confidently invited

UNEMPLOYMENT DONATION.

To provide for the abnormal period that must immediately follow on the cessation of hostilities, the Government have adopted as a temporary measure the following general scheme of non-contributory unemployment donation, which has been laid before them by the Minister of Reconstruction in agreement with the Minister of Labour. The broad conditions of the scheme are that this unemployment donation shall remain in force for a period of six months from a date to be announced shortly by the Government, and that the benefit can be drawn for a maximum of thirteen weeks during that period in cases where unemployment cannot be avoided. The other conditions and necessary safeguards will be explained by the Minister of Reconstruction in his statement to Parliament, and he will then also deal fully with the scheme that will be applicable to the demobilised members of his Majesty's Forces. Under this temporary non-contributory scheme, which will remain in force pending the introduction of a general contributory scheme, demobilised civil war workers will receive benefits on the following scale:

(a) To unemployed men over the age of 18 years, 24s. a week. To unemployed women over that age, 20s. a week.

(Continued at Foot of Column Four.)

(Continued from Column Five.)

(b) There will be an additional allowance in respect of the first dependent child under 15 years of age, 6s. per week, and 3s. for each additional dependent child under that age

(c) There is a further provision for unemployed juveniles between the age of 15 and 18 of 12s. per week for boys, and 10s. for girls, conditional on their attending a course of instruction approved by the Board of Education or other control department concerned.

It is necessary that industry should be rapidly transformed to peace conditions in order to provide permanent and reproductive employment for the civil workers and for the fighting men returning from the war. The proposals outlined above are solely intended to bridge over the inevitable period of dislocation. It must be emphasised that the non-contributory scheme is a purely emergency measure. While it is in operation the existing compulsory unemployment insurance scheme will remain in suspense so far as benefits are concerned. Contributions will, however, still be payable in order to build up a reserve of benefits for contributors when the temporary scheme comes to an end. Thus the special interests of contributors are fully safeguarded; in the meantime the Government are pressing forward with their scheme for general contributory insurance, which will be based on permanent considerations, and must not be prejudiced by the non-contributory scheme here announced.

In all cases where discharges of Munitions Workers are in contemplation, it is necessary that the management of firms should work in close-co-operation with the Local Employment Exchanges, in order to facilitate the return of the Munitions Workers to their homes and their re-absorption in Industry.

It is, therefore, absolutely essential that the Employment Exchanges should be notified at least a fortnight in advance of the numbers of Workers to be discharged, and that, as soon as possible thereafter, they should be supplied with full information as to the individuals affected. Officers of Employment Exchanges, and Dilution and Investigation Officers of the Ministry of Munitions have been instructed to advise firms as to the order of discharge, etc., and to co-operate with them in the endeavour to mitigate hardship.

Daily Telegraph

STATE AND WAR WORKERS.

AIDING THE UNEMPLOYED.

Before the signing of the armistice the amount of unemployment in this country was negligible. There was work in plenty for all who cared to work. With peace in sight and war industries closing down on every hand the registers of the Employment Exchanges are beginning to assume a bulky appearance. Many thousands of wage-earners who have been engaged in the production of munitions are now faced with the necessity of turning to other occupations, and the Ministry of Labour is doing its best to help them to find suitable employment. The powers of adaptability possessed by British industries will, it is hoped, render comparatively brief the period necessary for changing over from war to peace activities. There is evidence that numbers of enterprising firms are already beginning to settle down to the work of production for the civil population instead of for the fighting forces. But a certain amount of dislocation is inevitable, and the task of resettling those who have been, or shortly will be, thrown out of work is one of no small importance.

The State is not unmindful of the needs of workers who are temporarily without a market for their labour. Financial assistance on a greatly increased scale, as compared with the old benefit, is now provided for all persons classed as employed contributors under the National Insurance Act. The machinery through which this relief is afforded is that of the Employment Exchanges. For a long while the Employment Exchange, or Labour Bureau as it was christened originally, was a kind of Cinderella amongst Government institutions, but the days of neglect are past, and, given the cordial co-operation of employers, the part it will be able to play in the coming industrial reconstruction should be one of ever-increasing usefulness. What is happening to-day is that at upwards of 500 exchanges in all parts of the country discharged soldiers and civilian workers without employment are required to make a regular call in order to entitle them to the out-of-work donation. They are thus kept in constant touch with an agency specially designed to find situations for them and whose officials recognise the filling up of vacant places by suitable wage-earners as their principal duty. Besides the regular exchanges the Labour Ministry thrusts out its tentacles into the rural districts and by means of about 1,000 local agencies in small country towns attempts to deal with cases of unemployment wheresoever they may arise.

THE OUT-OF-WORK DONATION.

It cannot be complained that the present out-of-work donation is niggardly. Men receive 29s and women 25s per week. In the case of persons with families there is a supplementary donation of 6s for the first child and 3s for each succeeding child. Provision for young people from 15 to 18 years of age is on an equally favourable scale, as boys receive 12s and girls 10s per week. The donation policy is valid for six months, and during that period the holder is entitled to draw unemployment benefit for thirteen weeks, or seventy-eight working days. Discharged soldiers awaiting re-employment are also paid 29s per week, but their policy holds good for twelve months, and under it benefit is paid, if necessary, for a period of twenty-six weeks—a concession to the men who have served their country under arms which everyone will agree is thoroughly well deserved.

It has been said that beneficiaries are required to keep in touch with the exchange at which they are registered. As a matter of fact, during the time they are drawing the benefit they are under an obligation to call each day in working hours, unless they live more than two miles away, when they need attend only every other day. And every day there is presented to their notice in the exchange a list of the situations available for men and women of which employers have advised the officials. So much for the system. How does it work in practice? The writer paid a visit recently to the White City, where the main entrance hall of the old exhibition premises has been converted into a commodious employment exchange capable of dealing with numbers which would cause hopeless congestion at a permanent exchange. What was seen there may be taken as typical of what is happening throughout the country. The area allocated to the exchange is North Kensington, Notting-hill, Shepherd's-bush, Hammersmith, Barnes, and parts of West Kensington. The average numbers registered as in need of employment during the last two or three weeks were given as follows:

Women	2,500 to 3,000
Men	1,000 to 1,500
Boys	150
Girls	50 to 80

TASTE FOR FACTORY LIFE.

This emergency exchange building was opened a fortnight after the signing of the armistice. That is not a long while ago; yet the organisation appears to leave nothing to be desired. The thousands of persons who attend the exchange daily are dealt with promptly and, one may say, sympathetically—for friendly counsel is never lacking. A little investigation showed that since they have "been in munitions" women have acquired to a remarkable extent a taste for factory life. Many of them, of course, might return at once to the domestic service from which they came, but, for the moment at any rate, they literally scoff at the idea. Fifty or sixty per cent. of their number, if not more, say in effect, "Factory work, and nothing but factory work." Herein lies the difficulty of speedily getting them back into employment. When the thirteen weeks are coming to an end they may, if unsuccessful in the meantime in securing a factory job, be inclined to abandon their preference and settle down to some other useful occupation. At present they are of quite a different mind. The disinclination to enter domestic service is shown by the fact that at a certain exchange only one woman out of about 3,000 voluntarily entered her name as desiring that kind of employment.

What is the opinion of unemployed workers regarding the provision made for them? The answer was supplied by an Employment Exchange official. "Generally speaking," he said, "they are quite satisfied, and no complaints are heard." No doubt the vast majority really need the money, and are not like one good lady, who, when handed her weekly donation of 25s, cheerfully remarked, "That will just buy a teddy bear for my baby." The Employment Exchanges are experiencing less difficulty just now in finding places for men than for women, and there are fewer male workers in need of places. Juveniles are accommodated fairly easily with situations, though it is recorded that a boy of 15, who had been earning £4 a week on war work, refused with great promptitude a situation at 35s. The work of the exchanges is likely to be heavy for some time to come, and the Ministry of Labour does not expect to escape without some criticism. But it has laid its plans with great care, and, in the words of an official, "it hopes in the great testing time which is now at hand to justify the best hopes that have been entertained concerning it."

Daily News
4 1 19

OUT-OF-WORK GIRLS.

Problem of Reinstating the War Workers.

One of the big problems awaiting solution is that of getting back to their ordinary duties the women factory hands, laundry workers, and domestic servants, who during the war went into munition factories and are now unemployed.

The laundries are clamouring for workers, thousands of mistresses want maids, there are many vacancies in factories, and yet there are, on the other hand, taking the whole of the country, between 150,000 and 200,000 women war workers now unemployed. At the laundries and the factories, and in private houses, the same story is told. "The girls and women will not come back to work," they say, "whilst they are being paid 25s. a week by the Government for doing nothing."

There is, however, another side to the question, as was pointed out yesterday to a representative of "The Daily News." In all the types of employment mentioned the work is arduous and exacting, the hours are long, the wages are often low, and in the case of domestic servants there is a loss of freedom. Cannot something be done, it is urged, to improve the conditions and make the work less unattractive?

With regard to the Government 25s. a week to the unemployed, it is not paid, it is pointed out, to any women who refuse what is regarded as a fair offer of employment. At the Ministry of Labour, in fact, it was stated yesterday that since Christmas there has been an increase in the rate of return to work, particularly in domestic employment.

A census that was taken in the national filling factories some little time before the war ended shows the following pre-war occupations of the women employed in them:

Domestic servants	25.0 p.c.
Dressmakers and milliners	5.9 p.c.
Laundry work	4.9 p.c.
Dairymaids and farm work	0.45 p.c.
Trade factory hands	18.2 p.c.
Clerks and typists	1.75 p.c.
Shop assistants, waitresses, and barmaids	4.2 p.c.
Home duties and sundry	39.6 p.c.

Experience is showing that where good wages and comfortable conditions are offered the girls in many cases are returning to the occupations they left during the war.

Y.W.C.A. TRAINING SCHEME.

As soon as the Y.W.C.A. (Employment and Emigration Department) can obtain a house suitable for converting into a training centre, they will put into force their scheme for training young women as household helpers. The first training centre is to be opened in the West End, to cater for the large West End flats. When recruiting starts, only educated and better-class girls will be accepted.

The Household Corps is not a domestic servants corps. The status of the members should be equal or higher than that of a nurse. After training girls will be hired out to employers by the hour. The employer pays the Y.W.C.A., and the Y.W.C.A. pays the girls. The girls must live at a hostel, where all meals will be taken. A special uniform will be worn indoors with the Blue Triangle badge, but there will be no outdoor uniform. Recreation and work rooms will be provided at the hostels. Careful inquiries will be made before placing the girls with any employers.

5

THE GREAT TURNOVER FOR WOMEN.

No Need For Panic Cries: Slow But Steady Absorption Of Girls: Munitions To Milk Cans.

By MRS. HENRY FAWCETT,
President of the National Union of Women's Suffrage Societies.

AT the beginning of the war, and again in an even more vehement form at the time of the adoption of compulsory service, the cry of the pacifists was that, while we were out to destroy German militarism, we were creating a British militarism at least as formidable and dangerous to the peace of the world.

Events have proved how very wide of the mark these Cassandra-like wailings were. There has been no creation of militarism in Great Britain; the trouble arising out of demobilisation is not that the new armies are overflowing with military spirit.

MRS. HENRY FAWCETT.

Brave to the point of heroism as our men were so long as the German menace lasted, now that it has disappeared they clamour in their thousands to be demobilised now, this minute. They long to be back in their old jobs, living their own lives, wearing their familiar "civvies."

This, of course, has been the meaning of the soldiers' demonstrations in Whitehall all through last week.

The Pacifists' Blunder.

It is very easy to understand their point of view, and it shows how completely the pacifists misunderstood the whole situation in 1914 and 1916.

Probably it is only necessary for an authoritative voice such as the Prime Minister's to call once again to the men on military service and remind them that the safety and welfare of their country still demands the sacrifice from them of a few more weeks and months of the individual liberty so dear to them until the actual signing of the treaty of peace.

Meanwhile the demobilisation of women is taking place very rapidly. The Government has provided a fairly generous weekly grant in the case of unemployment, amounting at the lowest to 25s. a week, and in some cases, where there are children, rising as high as £3 per family, guaranteed, unless re-employment is secured, for thirteen weeks.

Some authorities say that the absorption of the unemployed men and women is proceeding with perturbing slowness, because however eager manufacturers and traders may be to re-open their former businesses, they are held up for lack of material and machinery.

The Lead Of Woolwich.

Other authorities give a more cheerful account of the immediate outlook. We hear, for instance, of Woolwich Arsenal applying its machinery to making milk cans instead of munitions, and retaining as many of its workers, male and female, as possible; of firms at Hull, Nottingham, Newcastle, and Glasgow having already converted their premises from the munitions needed for war to the utilities needed for peace, and employing their old staffs, men and women, on the new jobs.

There is no need for panic. We can all do something to promote the creation of an atmosphere of confidence and hope.

It must necessarily take some time for a complete transformation of all business of the country from the purposes of war to the purposes of peace; but this transformation has made a good start, and the Government unemployment grant is intended to tide the people over the uncomfortable gap which must necessarily arise in many cases.

That the need for it will be only temporary there is every reason to be confident.

The demand for all kinds of utilities which has been dammed up during the war will burst forth like a torrent the moment the war is really over.

Prophets Of Disaster.

It was a far more difficult thing to divert the industry and capital of the nation from peace to war, and there were many prophecies of disaster then; but these disasters did not materialise. Manufacturers, traders, and workers, both men and women, showed extraordinary adaptability and resource.

We are the same, exactly the same, people as we were in 1914, and the spirit which pulled us through the far more appalling crisis of 1914-15 will pull us through now.

Daily Chronicle

11/3/19

DEMOBILISED WOMEN.

OVER 476,000 STILL HOLDING DONATION POLICIES.

The total number of women who took out donation policies from the Armistice to February 14 was:—

Civilians	630,874
Forces	2,444
	633,318

Of these, 156,438 policies have been renounced by the holders, and probably represent the number of women who have found new employment, or who do not desire employment.

About 63 per cent. of these have been placed in work by the Employment Exchanges, as follows:—

Domestic Service	36,578
Commercial and Clerical	14,319
Engineering Trades	7,502
General Labourers	6,227
Textile Trades	6,027
Food, Drink, Tobacco and Lodging	5,197
Dressmaking	3,817

D 15.

MINISTRY OF LABOUR.

OUT-OF-WORK DONATION

(CIVILIAN WORKERS).

SUMMARY OF SCHEME.

I. GRANT OF DONATION.

1. In order to make provision against the unemployment of civilian workers during the period immediately following the termination of hostilities, it has been decided as an emergency measure to extend to civilian workers, who are British subjects, out-of-work donation on lines similar to those on which it is proposed to pay out-of-work donation to demobilised sailors and soldiers. The terms and conditions of out-of-work donation in respect of demobilised sailors and soldiers are described in a separate leaflet; those applying to civilian workers are detailed below. The scheme as regards civilian workers will come into operation on Monday, November 25th, 1918, and will remain in operation for six months from that date.

2. Out-of-work donation will not be paid concurrently with Unemployment Benefit under the National Insurance (Unemployment) Acts, nor with out-of-work allowances under the special enrolment and other schemes, e.g., W.M.V.'s, W.W.V.'s, W.A.V.'s Colonial workmen, etc.

II. CLASSES OF WORKERS ENTITLED TO CIVILIAN OUT-OF-WORK DONATION.

3. Civilian workers in order to be entitled to out-of-work donation must be of 15 years of age or upwards and if of 16 years of age or upwards must show that they became employed contributors under the National Health Insurance scheme at least three months prior to November 25th, 1918. If between 15 and 16 years they must show that they entered employment at least three months prior to November 25th, 1918.

III. RATE OF DONATION.

4. Out-of-work donation will be paid at the rate of 24s. a week (i.e., 4s. a day) to men over 18 years of age and 20s. a week (i.e., 3s. 4d. a day) to women over 18 years of age; boys and girls between the ages of 15 and 18 will receive donation at half these rates, viz., 12s. a week and 10s. a week respectively conditionally on their joining a Course of Instruction approved by the Board of Education or other Central Department concerned. In addition to the above-mentioned rates supplementary donation will be payable in respect of dependent children of both men and women over 18 years of age at the rate of 6s. a week for the first dependent child under 15 years of age and 3s. a week for each additional dependent child under that age, but supplementary donation will not be paid to more than one claimant in respect of the same children.

5. Out-of-work donation will be payable to civilian workers for a maximum period of 13 weeks (i.e., 78 days) during the six months for which the scheme is to be in operation.

IV. METHOD OF CLAIMING DONATION.

6. Civilian Workers desiring to claim donation for the first time should attend at an Employment Exchange, or Branch Employment Office of the Ministry of Labour and ask for an "Out-of-Work Donation Policy (Civilian Workers)." If over 16 years of age they will be required to produce a Health Insurance Record Card, showing that they became employed contributors under the National Health Insurance scheme at least three months before November 25th, 1918, and also the current Health Insurance Card. Unless both the Record Card and the current Health Insurance Card can be produced, only a provisional policy can be issued. If neither a Record Card nor a Health Insurance Card can be produced they will be asked to give the name of the approved Society to which they belong, or, if they do not belong to an approved Society, full particulars to enable the fact that they comply with the requisite conditions to be established; a policy will not be issued until the fact that the applicant became an employed contributor before the appointed date has been verified.

Applicants between the ages of 15 and 16 will not, of course, be insured under the National Health Insurance scheme, and they will therefore be required to produce a certificate signed by their previous employer to verify that they entered employment at least three months before the appointed date.

7. The Out-of-work donation policy will be retained by the person to whom it is issued, except when he is unemployed and claiming out-of-work donation, during which period it must be lodged at the Employment Exchange or Branch Employment Office. When desirous of claiming out-of-work donation for a second or subsequent time, the holder of the out-of-work donation policy should attend at an Employment Exchange or Branch Employment Office and lodge his policy.

8. On attending at an Employment Exchange or Branch Employment Office to claim donation, the applicant will be required to sign a form of declaration contained in the policy. A coupon is provided for each week and constitutes both the claim for donation in respect of each day on which it is signed and a statement that the applicant is in fact unemployed, capable of work and unable to obtain employment.

9. Whilst unemployed the applicant must in general attend daily at the Employment Exchange or Branch Employment Office in order to sign the coupon in the policy as evidence of unemployment. Attendance on alternate days will be sufficient if the applicant resides more than two miles from the nearest Exchange or Branch Employment Office, and once a week if he resides more than four miles away.

10. Applicants for donation who are workmen in the trades insured under the National Insurance (Unemployment) Acts, 1911-1918, will be required to lodge their unemployment books at the time of making application for donation and when the right to receive donation is exhausted he will be entitled to claim unemployment benefit in respect of his contributions, if any under these Acts.

700/10

V. SUPPLEMENTARY DONATION.

11. An applicant desiring to claim supplementary donation in respect of dependent children will be required to complete a form of declaration, as to the number and ages of the children in respect of whom the claim is made. This declaration will have to be confirmed by

(a) a local magistrate, or

(b) a minister of religion, or

(c) a registered medical practitioner, or

(d) a secretary of the applicant's trade union, or approved society, or branch thereof.

Supplementary donation will not be paid until confirmation of the declaration is received, but when such confirmation is lodged at the Local Office the supplementary donation will be paid in respect of the same days as ordinary donation.

VI. WAITING PERIOD.

12. Donation will not be payable for the first three days of any continuous period of unemployment; in other words, an applicant in order to become eligible for payment of donation must, in addition to satisfying the other conditions, be first of all unemployed for three consecutive working days and sign the coupons in the policy in respect of each of these days as described above. He will then become eligible for payment for each subsequent day of unemployment (subject to the usual conditions) in respect of which he duly signs the coupon in the policy, until he fails to attend and sign the coupons for six consecutive working days or more. When such failure to sign occurs a further waiting period of three consecutive working days must be fulfilled before he can again become eligible for payment of donation.

VII. ADJUDICATION ON DISPUTED CLAIMS.

13. In any case of doubt as to whether a claim to donation should be admitted the claim will be referred to a Court of Referees which sits locally and consists of an independent chairman together with two industrial members taken by rota from panels of representatives of employers and workpeople respectively. In the case of allowance of the claim by a Court of Referees payment of the donation, subject to the conditions above described, will commence immediately but the Ministry of Labour will be entitled to appeal to the Umpire, if they think fit, against the allowance. Pending the hearing of the appeal donation will continue to be paid. If the claim is disallowed by the Court of Referees, an appeal against disallowance may be made to the Umpire by the Ministry of Labour or by a trade union of which the applicant is a member, or, if leave is given by the Court of Referees, by the applicant himself.

VIII. CONDITIONS UNDER WHICH DONATION WILL BE PAYABLE.

14. In order to be eligible for donation the applicant must be capable of work but unable to obtain suitable employment. In particular he must not refuse an offer of suitable employment, but he will not be disqualified for donation by reason only that he has declined—

(a) an offer of employment in a situation vacant in consequence of a stoppage of work due to a trade dispute; or

(b) an offer of employment in the district where he was last ordinarily employed at a rate of wage lower, or on conditions less favourable, than those which he habitually obtained in his usual employment in that district or would have obtained, had he continued to be so employed; or

(c) An offer of employment in any other district at a rate of wage lower or on conditions less favourable than those generally observed in such district by agreement between associations of employers and of workmen, or failing any such agreement, than those generally recognised in such districts by good employers.

15. An applicant who has lost employment by reason of a stoppage of work which was due to a trade dispute at the factory, workshop or other premises at which he was employed is disqualified for receiving donation so long as the stoppage of work continues, except in a case where he has, during the stoppage of work, become bona-fide employed elsewhere.

Where separate branches of work which are commonly carried on as separate businesses in separate premises are in any case carried on in separate departments on the same premises, each of those departments shall, for the purposes of this provision, be deemed to be a separate factory or workshop or separate premises, as the case may be.

16. An applicant who loses employment through misconduct or who voluntarily leaves his employment without just cause, is disqualified for receiving donation for a period of six weeks from the date when he so lost employment.

17. An applicant is disqualified for receiving donation whilst he is an inmate of any prison or any workhouse or other institution supported wholly or partly out of public funds, and whilst he is resident temporarily or permanently outside the United Kingdom.

18. An applicant is disqualified for receiving donation whilst he in receipt of unemployment benefit or any sickness or disablement benefit or disablement allowance under National Insurance Acts.

IX. PAY DAYS FOR DONATION.

19. The pay week for civilian workers will be from Thursday to Wednesday, and donation will be paid on Friday of each week up to and including the previous Wednesday.

X. PAYMENT OF HEALTH INSURANCE CONTRIBUTIONS DURING UNEMPLOYMENT.

20. In order to prevent unemployed workers falling into arrears under the Health Insurance scheme it has been arranged that on presentation of their Health Insurance Cards when drawing donation they will be entitled to have the card impressed with a rubber stamp at the Employment Exchange or Branch Employment Office for the week preceding that in which the payment of donation is due, provided that they have not worked during that week and a Health Insurance contribution in respect of employment during that week has therefore not become payable.

XI. EMERGENCY CHARACTER OF SCHEME.

21. The provisions described above are solely intended to bridge over the inevitable period of dislocation immediately following the cessation of hostilities, and it must be emphasised that the non-contributory scheme is a purely emergency measure. Whilst it is in operation the existing compulsory unemployment scheme will in effect remain in suspense so far as benefits are concerned. Contributions will, however, still be payable in order to build up a reserve of benefit for contributors when the temporary scheme comes to an end. Thus the special interests of contributors are safeguarded and meantime the Government are pressing forward with a scheme for general contributory insurance and must not be prejudiced by the non-contributory scheme above described.

MINISTRY OF LABOUR,
November, 1918.

2,000M. 11/18. R. & L.

Freeman's Journal. 26.2.18. 1918

701.
cf: 665 III
7328 A

701/1

THE PROBLEM OF THE WOMEN WORKERS

When the men seek to return to their pre-war occupations they will find nearly one and a half million women filling the places formerly held by male employes. This will be the great industrial problem after the war. In industries and transport the places formerly filled by men and now filled by women number 588,000, and, in addition, there are 35,000 such places in agriculture. Will the women workers give up their occupation to the 620,000 workingmen that formerly held these positions? This does not represent the extent to which women have encroached on male employment, for the sex have invaded in larger proportion the commercial, professional, finance, and banking occupations and the civil service, nor does it represent the extent to which women are employed in industry, because most of the 214,000 employed in Government establishments are really in industrial occupations. The number of women employed in all occupations, except small workrooms in the dressmaking trades, Government establishments, military, naval, and Red Cross hospitals and domestic service, as returned by the Board of Trade, from whose report on employment in 1917 we take these particulars, was 4,713,000 This is an increase of 1,426,000 over the pre-war figure. This great increase in women employment generally is accompanied by a small decrease in the number of women engaged in occupations that were formerly female occupations, notably in the textile, clothing, and paper trades, to the extent of 50,000.

One-third of the textile trade firms, one-fourth of the clothing trade firms, and one-sixth of the paper trade firms report a shortage of female labour. It is therefore not unlikely that the vacated places may be filled, but even if they be not filled the re-employment of 50,000 women and girl workers in their old occupations will not diminish sensibly the tension caused by the employment of 620,000 women in industrial positions formerly held by men. That situation is the first and most pressing problem of the restoration after the war. It must lead to serious industrial unrest and the position of women in factory and workshop will lead to endless labour disputes. The numbers we have quoted are those of women who replace men in old-established industry. In addition to these thousands of other women have been called to newly-created industrial work—munition workers in Government establishments, the women's army auxiliary corps, and many other workers in war occupations—many of whom will probably seek places in industry after the war. Excluding direct war-working classes who are not enumerated in the Board of Trade returns, there are no fewer than 1,413,000 women who fill occupations, industrial and sedentary, that were formerly filled by men. The Board of Trade state it is calculated that about 700,000 women are now employed on munition work, and 650,000 on other Governmental work, in addition to about 40,000 females engaged on work for the Government in commercial occupations and transport. Those figures should be added to the numbers of women in industry in order to grasp the size of the labour problem after the war.

Yorkshire Observer 26.2.18.

DISMISSED WOMEN MUNITION WORKERS.

Some thirty members, over whom Lord Henry Cavendish-Bentinck presided, yesterday saw a deputation representing women munition workers who have recently been discharged. The number affected has been much exaggerated, but it is considerable, and during the next five or six weeks will be very largely increased. The total then, it is feared, may run into some forty thousand. Primarily the deputation complained that they had received only a week's notice, and that intimation of their discharge was sent to the Employment Exchanges only a couple of days before they actually ceased work, so that it was impossible to obtain other employment, and they asked that longer notice should be given of the subsequent dismissals and for an increase of unemployment benefit under the Insurance Act. After the women had stated their case the members discussed it and decided to ask Mr. Churchill, Mr. Kellaway, and Dr. Addison to meet them to consider the claims and grievances of these workpeople.

The question is one of very wide importance, for the employees of the Government are numbered by the million, and it has long been foreseen by the observant that when the time for discharging any of them arrived almost irresistible pressure would be brought to bear on members to secure terms far in advance of any that could be conceded by private employers. Considering the very high wages most munition workers receive, it is not unreasonable to expect that they themselves shall make some provision for the inevitable cessation of their employment. Recent events have shown how dangerous it would be to leave a matter like this to the decision of Mr. Churchill—or, indeed, anybody concerned with the Ministry of Munitions.

Morning Post. 8.3.18.

COMPLETED MUNITION CONTRACTS. 8,000 WOMEN DISEMPLOYED.

Mr. KELLAWAY (Secretary, Ministry of Munitions), in reply to Mr. Anderson (Lab., Sheffield, Attercliffe), said that in the three weeks ending Saturday last, owing to completion of munitions contracts, 8,000 women munition workers had either been dismissed or received notice of dismissal. The Ministry regretted that a certain amount of hardship was inevitable, but everything would be done to mitigate it. There were openings for women in agriculture, in the shipyards, in the W.A.A.C., and other occupations. The possibility of giving priority of war work to these women was under discussion, and a departmental conference was considering various suggestions, such as giving a grant of a certain amount of wages or free railway warrants to the women's homes.

Yorkshire Observer 26.2.18.

A week ago 1,000 women workers in Leeds munition factories who had been discharged from their employment protested against being thrown aside at a week's notice, and called upon the Government to make them a subsistence allowance for the period of their unemployment. Yesterday, by which time the number of women discharged or under notice had grown to more than double, at a further meeting it was reported that no reply had been received from either the Ministry of Munitions or the Ministry of Labour, to both of whom the request of the women had been sent, and that the headquarters of the National Federation of Women Workers in London had failed to move the Departments to a response of any sort. Whatever the Government may or may not decide to do in the case of these women, the example of procrastination in the matter by the two Departments dealing with labour is unfortunate. If the question is still under consideration the polite and tactful way to have gone about things would seem to have been to have informed the women so. This would, at any rate, have stilled resentment. Sufficient attention is not paid by employers, State and private, to the avoidance of petty irritations, which are taken by the workers to imply discourtesy, indifference, and even callousness.

Morning Post. 27.2.18

701/2 701

DEMOBILISING THE SUBSTITUTES.

PROBLEM OF DISPLACED WOMEN.

Appended to the final report of the Civil War Workers' Committee, now issued as a White Paper, is a remark of Dr. Addison, Minister of Reconstruction, to the effect that the principal recommendations have been adopted by the Government. The report shows that, outside munitions, replacements have taken place in labour to the extent of 878,000 females and 1,064,000 males, the figures for women substitutes in different employments being: Commerce, 354,000; the Civil Service, 99,500; transport, 78,000; Post Office, 59,500; clerks, 57,000; finance and banking, 63,000; and non-Government industries, 89,000. Since two-thirds of the male replacements have been effected by the natural growth of the male population, the employment of boys at an early age and the return of men from the Forces, while help has also been given by retired men or those on the eve of retirement, who will drop out in the normal course, the Committee does not anticipate there being any serious unemployment among male substitutes, and makes no recommendations about them. But it regards the position of the women as more critical.

The bulk of the women substitutes considered in this report are engaged in clerical and commercial occupations. The report states that:

"It is very desirable not only that the opportunities and conditions of their employment in these occupations should be considered, but also that a more definite understanding should be arrived at in regard to the standards of education and training which should be recognised as qualifications for the various branches and grades of such work. We recommend that the Ministry of Labour should be asked to set up, in connection with the Labour Resettlement Committee, a Committee to consider and advise on these problems."

Informal inquiries, conducted in a typical section, seemed to show that 58 per cent. of temporary women clerks in the Civil Service would want work after the war. Adjustment rather than serious displacement is anticipated in non-Government clerical work and commerce, more women, indeed, being likely to be employed in insurance offices and banks than before the war. In the railways there is the possibility of certain kinds of work being reserved for women, while on the land a considerable number of women will probably continue to be required for some time after peace is declared.

Committee's Recommendations.

The recommendations made, apart from that regarding women's employment in clerical and commercial occupations, suggest:

(1) That the employment exchange now set up at Burlington-gardens and working with the Civil Service Commission should, if necessary, with an augmented staff, deal with the work of demobilisation.

(2) That a complete register of temporary Government clerks should be formed and their wishes noted as to continuing in employment.

(3) That in connection with the exchange there should be an advisory committee to collect and furnish information as to openings outside the Civil Service and arrange for special courses of training when necessary.

(4) That facilities should be given for full-time intensive courses of professional training.

(5) That in case of Civil Service vacancies the claims of temporary clerks should be considered as well as those of discharged service men and established civil servants.

(6) That a decision in regard to the future position of women in the Civil Service should be reached and carried into effect, if possible, before demobilisation.

(7) That vacancies in temporary posts should be filled by transfer of clerks displaced from other departments.

(8) That the period of notice given should not be less than one month.

(9) That where necessary local advisory committees set up in connection with employment exchanges which deal largely with clerical workers should be strengthened by the appointment of members specially conversant with the needs of this group of workers, including women; and

(10) That steps should be taken without delay by railway companies and Trade Unions concerned to arrive at an agreement in regard to the conditions of the future employment of women on railways.

MUNITIONS MINISTRY'S CLERKS: A PROTEST.

The way in which the clerks of the Ministry of Munitions are being demobilised has provoked protest from the National Union of Clerks. Its general secretary, Mr. Herbert H. Elvin, in a letter to Mr. Winston Churchill, says: "I am considerably surprised to find that the clerks in your department at Whitehall are being treated differently from other clerks. As no doubt you are aware, under the orders issued by the Government, persons receiving £160 per annum or more are to have one month's warning and one month's notice, and those who are being paid on weekly salaries one week's warning and one week's pay. . . . I cannot understand how it is that whilst the clerks employed at St. Ermin's are treated in accordance with the above regulations, these do not apply to the clerks employed at the Ministry of Munitions."

Mr. Elvin has also written to the Prime Minister asking him to put right the grievance without delay.

APPLICANTS' COMMUNICATIONS.

The Secretary of the War Cabinet states that many communications are being sent direct to Sir Eric Geddes with regard to applications for demobilisation. This action shows a misapprehension of the duties committed to Sir Eric Geddes and can only result in disappointment and delay. Sir Eric Geddes' function is to co-ordinate the activities of the various Government Departments, but these Departments retain all their responsibilities and all communications regarding demobilisation should be addressed as directed in the instructions already issued to the public.

Morning Post 27.12.18.

INDUSTRY CHANGING OVER

EFFORTS TO MEET GERMAN COMPETITION.

Every day witnesses some fresh progress in the transition of industries from munitions to peace production. The seventy small private firms in the neighbourhood of Leicester which were engaged on munitions have all returned to their proper pre-war work.

Enterprising firms are in many cases not only undertaking their former manufactures, but others also which are quite new to them in an endeavour to capture trade formerly held by other countries.

One such firm at Hull, in order to meet German competition, is beginning the manufacture of cast-iron valves for both water and steam purposes. They are also laying down a plant for the making of malleable iron fittings. The firm hopes to retain a large percentage, if not all, of the women previously employed on munitions.

A Newcastle Firm and Female Labour.

A Newcastle company, changing over to general steel castings, hopes, similarly, to retain the female labour for core making and labouring. Other instances are:—

A Nottingham firm is making works additions in order to increase output of malleable castings for the motor-car trade. The bulk of them before the war were imported.

A firm of wood-cutting machinists propose to undertake the manufacture of precision grinders and small surface grinders. A firm of aeroplane makers are turning over their pre-war trade to shop fittings, and jewellers' cases, and have enough orders in for three years.

Tin plate manufacturers in South Wales are very busy, and likely to continue so for some considerable time.

A bicycle firm proposes to make motor-cycles, a new departure for them, while another company had added standard railway waggons to its pre-war productions.

A firm making seed-drills have sufficient orders to keep them busy till the end of the year, and a lace manufacturer reports a somewhat similar state of affairs.

From Bombs to Gas Pipes.

A Newcastle firm are changing over from bombs and 18-pounder shrapnel shells to gas and steam pipes and shipyard castings.

A Glasgow firm is employing the greater part of the labour formerly employed on munitions work, on boilers, cranes, stokers, etc.

Another firm has absorbed all its staff—including women—on pump making.

A firm of sugar-mill machinery makers anticipate a busy time for at least a year. They are endeavouring to capture the former German trade with Java in sugar machinery.

1918.

Sheffield Independent.
25. 2. 18.

WOMEN MUNITIONERS.

Organised Workers' Views on Possible Demobilisation.

The difficulties of finding situations immediately for discharged women munition workers were discussed yesterday in the course of an interview with Miss Mary Macarthur, secretary of the Women Workers' Federation. According to newspaper reports, said Miss Macarthur, Mr. Kellaway was alleged to have stated in the House of Commons that about 8,000 women munition workers had been dismissed or had received notices of dismissal within the last three or four weeks.

The Federation strongly controverted this statement regarding the number of dismissals. Although they quite appreciated the sympathetic attitude Mr. Kellaway showed towards the somewhat unhappy situation that had arisen. Many circumstances had brought about the dismissals. "It is notorious," remarked Miss Macarthur, "That large orders destined for Russia have been cancelled, while lack of tonnage, no less than the fact that amazing supplies of certain types of munitions have been stocked, are all factors to be considered when workpeople are discharged at the present time.

"Seeing that more dismissals are under contemplation, some of us are beginning to think that so far as women are concerned something like demobilisation on a small scale has begun. The case of organised women against the Ministry of Munitions is that, although they must have been fully aware of the situation created by recent circumstances, no adequate notice was given either to the contractors or to the labour exchanges.

"The National Federation of Women Workers, and those unions which include women workers in their membership, have demanded that all their members engaged on munition work should receive, immediately on the termination of their employment, at least a month's full wages, with a free railway pass to their homes. In addition, every effort should be made to find suitable employment for those discharged at the earliest possible moment.

"To this end we think it is necessary there should be greater co-operation between the various Government departments. The problem of the discharged munition workers has the cordial sympathy of employers, and since attention has been drawn to the matter we understand that ample notice will henceforward be given when it is proposed to terminate contracts."

Munitions Dismissals. Feb-Mch 18

New Witness 1.3.18.

701 of 665

701/4

Daily News. 4.3.18.

WOMEN MUNITIONERS

Message from Ministry to Those Who Have Lost Their Employment.

The women munition workers at Leeds who have lost their employment discussed their grievances at a mass meeting called by the National Federation of Women Workers on Saturday.

A telegram received from the Ministry stated that "particulars of all vacancies for women workers can be obtained at Employment Exchange, and every effort will be made by the Ministry of Labour to find work for women discharged. Whole question under examination by Government, and Ministry of Munitions cannot express any opinion as to possibility of granting demand for special benefits to discharged women workers. Ministry meeting representatives of unions and women's trade union advisory committee Monday next, when matter will be discussed."

The message was not regarded as satisfactory by the meeting, but it was decided not to take any further action immediately pending the result of to-day's conference.

Evening Standard. 4.3.18.

WOMEN MUNITIONERS.

MINISTRY AND THOSE WHO HAVE LOST EMPLOYMENT.

The women munition workers at Leeds who have lost their employment discussed their grievances at a mass meeting called by the National Federation of Women Workers on Saturday.

A telegram received from the Ministry stated that "particulars of all vacancies for women workers can be obtained at Employment Exchange, and every effort will be made by the Ministry of Labour to find work for women discharged. Whole question under examination by Government, and Ministry of Munitions cannot express any opinion as to possibility of granting demand for special benefits to discharged women workers. Ministry meeting representatives of unions and women's trade union advisory committee Monday next, when matter will be discussed."

The message was not regarded as satisfactory by the meeting, but it was decided not to take any further action immediately pending the result of to-day's conference.

Daily News Leader. 28.2.18.

THE 8,000 DISMISSALS.

Women Workers' Federation's Claim on Behalf of Discharged Munitioners.

In an interview, Miss Mary Macarthur, secretary of the Women Workers' Federation, discussed Mr. Kellaway's statement that about 8,000 women munition workers had been dismissed recently.

She said that her Federation strongly controverted this statement regarding the number of dismissals. Owing to the cancelling of contracts for Russia, the lack of tonnage, and the amazing supplies of some munitions, more dismissals were likely.

They were beginning to think that, so far as women are concerned, something like demobilisation on a small scale had begun. In one instance women were dismissed with only two days' notice.

The National Federaion of Women Workers have demanded that all their members engaged on munition work should receive, immediately on the termination of their employment, at least a month's full wages, with free railway passes to their homes.

SIDE by side with appeals to patriotic men and women to enlist for National Service we find reports of cases where munition workers have been abruptly discharged. On Tuesday last, Mr. Anderson, M.P. for Attercliffe Division, Sheffield, obtained from Mr. Kellaway an admission that some 8,000 women munition makers had received a week's notice of dismissal during the last three weeks as the result of the termination of certain contracts. The Parliamentary Secretary for the Ministry of Munitions admitted that no arrangements had been made for the employment of these workers though he insisted that the machinery of the labour exchanges and the National Service Department was being utilised in the fullest capacity to bring them into other forms of national service. Now it is obvious that a limited exercise of that "business" capacity which, we are told, Sir Auckland Geddes possesses in so high a degree, would have realised the necessity for finding further employment for workers who must have attained a certain degree of skill, and have provided for the emergency. The Ministry of National Service could surely make it their business to discover at what periods Government contracts are likely to lapse, the corresponding number of workers who are likely to be thrown out of employment, and make arrangements accordingly. As it is, however, it would seem that 8,000 women, many of whom are stranded at long distances from their homes, have suddenly been deprived of their means of livelihood, while the country has lost their services. It would seem, however, that the task of finding work for munition makers is beyond the genius controlling the departments concerned with the making of the armaments of war, and that it is easier to remove large numbers of people from their employment and draft them into National Service than to find work for those already enlisted. If the demobilisation of the Army is to be handled in the same way as the demobilisation of munition workers there is likely to be trouble.

Daily News. 8.3.18

40,000 DISMISSALS.

Women Munition Workers' Case to be Put Before Mr. Churchill and Dr. Addison.

A private meeting of some 30 M.P.s, representing all parties, was held at the House of Commons last evening to receive a deputation of discharged women munition workers. Lord Henry Bentinck presided, and the deputation was introduced by Miss Mary Macarthur, secretary of the National Federation of Women Workers.

Remedies urged on behalf of the discharged women, who, it is stated, now number over 40,000, included the abolition of overtime work in munition factories where women are employed, a reduction of the hours, where possible, and a more equitable distribution of the available work for women; closer co-ordination between the employing departments of the Government and the Ministry of Labour; a month's pay for all demobilised women; and an improved scale of unemployment benefits for women.

The members of Parliament subsequently conferred together, and decided to ask Dr. Addison and Mr. Churchill to meet them one day next week to discuss the grievances. Those present included Mr. J. H. Thomas, Mr. W. C. Anderson, Mr. Crooks, Sir W. Cowan, Mr. Astor, Mr. R. Harcourt, Mr. Howell Davies, Mr. Aneurin Williams, Mr. T. Wing, Mr. Jacobsen, Mr. Kiley, and Col. Yate.

Daily News. 8.3.18.

On a very small scale, the country is already being confronted with the tremendous demobilisation problem which will have to be faced after the war. The case of the 40,000 discharged munition girls is sufficiently embarrassing in itself, but it is not alone. There are signs that the reduced import of paper may result in the dismissal of a good many men in the printing trades; and the same is true of the cotton industry. If it is the fact that Lord Rhondda is demanding—no doubt quite rightly—more shipping-room for food, the process is bound to extend to other trades. In a sense, of course, the absorption of labour is more difficult at the present time than it will be after the war. On the other hand, the amount to be absorbed is incomparably smaller, and the essential difficulties—illustrated in the case of the munitioner who bluntly refused to return to the domestic service she had left—are the same. It is an unfortunate complication of the difficulties of a very difficult time that this question should arise now. But it may not be wholly a misfortune if it leads to the practical exploration in good time of problems which will eventually be the supreme question of the day on which the whole future of the country will depend.

Times
5-3-18

MUNITION WORKS DISMISSALS.

WOMEN'S CONFERENCE WITH MR. CHURCHILL.

Mr. Churchill, Minister of Munitions, presided yesterday over a meeting of the Women's Trade Union Advisory Committee, at which the question of the dismissals of women munition workers was considered. We understand that the meeting ended without any definite result, and it is believed that the matter will be brought before the War Cabinet for final decision.

Arrangements are being made for members of Parliament to interview a number of the women during the present week and to discuss the position with them.

Daily News & Leader
5-3-18

DISCHARGED WOMEN W R ORKERS.

Serious Outlook in the Munition Areas.

The position of discharged women muni tion workers—estimated last week by Mr Kellaway at 8,000—is causing the graves concern to the trade unions interested i their case. The Women's Trade Unio Advisory Committee yesterday met Mr Churchill, Minister of Munitions, on th subject, and a meeting of M.P.s is also t be convened to receive deputations o women from the localities most affected b the discharges.

Meanwhile the trade unions directly in terested are pressing their demand that al the dismissed women shall be given a month's wages It is understood that the War Cabinet is considering the proposal The questions of the abolition of overtime in some factories and a reduction of hours in others are also being considered as a possible means of absorbing a percentage of the discharged women.

The anxiety of the trade unions concerned is intensified by a belief that further dismissals are in contemplation in other areas. It is stated that in one district several hundred women have been without work since Christmas owing to the termination of contracts; while in other areas there have been shorter periods of unemployment. The Munitions, Labour, and National Service Departments, with the aid of the Labour Exchanges, are now working in closer co-operation than hitherto, with a view to absorbing the women in other branches of war work, but owing to the fresh training required the joint task is proving a very slow one.

New Statesman 23-3-18

THE MUNITION DISCHARGES

To the Editor of THE NEW STATESMAN.

SIR,—The repentance of the Ministry of Munitions, in the matter of consideration for the workers to be discharged, has apparently been prompt. In one district known to me a large Government T.N.T. factory has had instructions to discharge 1,000 women. Every possible consideration has been shown to these workers, and to the Employment Exchange officers, by the factory authorities. The local Exchange has been informed of the proposed discharges, and invited to make use of the factory premises for registration, etc. The workers themselves have been informed of the pending discharges a fortnight before a fortnight's notice was actually given—practically amounting to a month's notice.

The women have been registered on the premises of the firm. Arrangements have been made to send 200 women to a shell-filling factory in the south. A representative of a projectile factory in the north-west has been brought down to interview applicants, and a good number have been accepted. Recruiting meetings have been held for the W.A.A.C. and the Women's Land Army; a Medical Board has been held at the factory, and a good number have joined up. All this has occurred before any discharges took place. In fact, very few women have yet been discharged, as the 1,000 are to be discharged slowly in small numbers. The women who do not reside in the district will have their fares paid home, and the Employment Exchange at their home will receive their names and addresses at least a fortnight before they are discharged. What can be done in one district can be done—should be insisted on—in other districts.—I am, etc.,

Political Notes
8-3-18

101
cf. 665

701/5

DISMISSED WOMEN MUNITION WORKERS.

Some thirty members, over whom Lord Henry Cavendish-Bentinck presided, yesterday saw a deputation representing women munition workers who have recently been discharged. The number affected has been much exaggerated, but it is considerable, and during the next five or six weeks will be very largely increased. The total then, it is feared, may run into some forty thousand. Primarily the deputation complained that they had received only a week's notice, and that intimation of their discharge was sent to the Employment Exchanges only a couple of days before they actually ceased work, so that it was impossible to obtain other employment, and they asked that longer notice should be given of the subsequent dismissals and for an increase of unemployment benefit under the Insurance Act. After the women had stated their case the members discussed it and decided to ask Mr. Churchill, Mr. Kellaway, and Dr. Addison to meet them to consider the claims and grievances of these workpeople.

The question is one of very wide importance, for the employees of the Government are numbered by the million, and it has long been foreseen by the observant that when the time for discharging any of them arrived almost irresistible pressure would be brought to bear on members to secure terms far in advance of any that could be conceded by private employers. Considering the very high wages most munition workers receive, it is not unreasonable to expect that they themselves shall make some provision for the inevitable cessation of their employment. Recent events have shown how dangerous it would be to leave a matter like this to the decision of Mr. Churchill—or, indeed, anybody concerned with the Ministry of Munitions.

The Times 14-3-18

THE MUNITION DISMISSALS.

Mr. Churchill attended yesterday a meeting of members of the House of Commons presided over by Lord Henry Cavendish-Bentinck, and made a statement on the dismissal of women from munition factories. The dismissals, he said, would continue, but care would be taken to give a minimum notice in each case of a fortnight, and everything possible would be done to assist the women in obtaining employment in other forms of war work now open. It might also be practicable, he added, to lessen the hardship by reduction of working hours.

Manchester Guardian
6-3-18

The Discharge of Women Munitioners.

The difficulty caused by the dismissal of some eight or ten thousand women munition workers throughout the country is greater than appears on the surface. The proposal which is being pressed on the Ministry of Munitions by the women trade union leaders is understood to be the payment to discharged women of a month's wages at £1 a week. No agreement has been reached at present, and the matter is expected to go to the War Cabinet for decision.

If this demand is granted it is obvious that it will be impossible to confine this compensation to women workers who are discharged owing to the completion of contracts or from any other reason, and the Government may be faced with problems at least as formidable as that caused by the famous 12½ per cent. The women affected are chiefly unskilled workers employed on certain processes. Opinions differ as to whether the labour will be permanently displaced or not.

It is hoped that the abolition of overtime in some cases and the reduction of hours elsewhere may lead to the absorption of some of the displaced labour, but in any case a good deal more will be heard of this matter.

Dismissals. New Statesman. 16.3.18. March 701 of 665

A WEEK'S NOTICE

THE summary discharges of certain sections of munition workers—almost entirely women—which continue to occur weekly, in this factory or that, are raising the whole question of the relations in which the Government will stand, as soon as peace is assured, to the three millions of civil workers in war industries. It seems to have been borne in, some months ago, upon those responsible for supplies that, owing to the extraordinary increase in production and to a certain slowing down of consumption during the past nine months, the accumulation of war stores was mounting up to more than could possibly be required even for the longest conceivable duration of the war. It was therefore decided, legitimately enough, to reduce the output; and certain kinds of shells and cartridges, together with other supplies, were chosen for restriction. The necessary arrangements were made—a task which took weeks of time—with regard to the various kinds of material, the readjustment of different streams of components, the payments on account, the transfer to other work of certain supervising officials, and even, in some cases, for a new utilisation of the premises and machinery. It does not appear that, whilst this was in progress, any thought was given to what was to happen to the tens of thousands of human beings whose services were going to be abruptly dispensed with. At any rate, no intimation was given of the contemplated reduction of staff either to the local Employment Exchanges, or to the Minister of Labour, or to the Director-General of National Service, who was actually seeking in all directions to enrol additional women in various branches of work of national importance, from labour on the land and motor-car driving up to the "Waacs" and the "Wrens." No general warning seems to have been given to the women themselves of the coming discharge, in order that they might readjust their humble housekeeping, their domestic arrangements, and their agreements for lodgings. No inquiry was made of the other branches of munition work, or of the other Government Departments, whether some, at least, of these workers might not be simply transferred. No provision was made to enable such of them as had come hundreds of miles to take up the Government employment to return to their homes (railway fares having in the meantime been raised fifty per cent.). Suddenly, in one factory after another, the blow falls, and week after week has seen thousands of girls given a week's notice—not a week during which they might look for new situations, but the bare legal notice, secured to them by the Munitions of War Acts, that, whilst they would have to continue to put in the full factory day, their employment and their wages would come to a sudden stop seven days hence. Even when the notice was given, no communication was made to the local Employment Exchange (at least in one instance) until five out of the seven days had passed, so that the Ministry of Labour was apparently expected, the "day after to-morrow," to be able to find situations for some thousands of women, stranded in a district where the Government factories constituted nearly the whole demand for the class of labour in question. The whole incident is a revelation and a warning of the extent to which, in spite of all the fine phrases used by Ministers, the habitual ruthlessness of the merely "commercial" employer, and the old doctrine of the Treasury that the "Labour Market" would "absorb" any discarded workers, still dominate the officials directly concerned with the Government employment of manual-working wage-earners, especially when these happen to be women or unorganised male labourers.

The world sweeps on, and the sufferings of these particular ten or twenty thousand women—the number may soon be as high as forty thousand in all—are ignored. It is only fair to record that, after a stiff fight, a free railway ticket home has been secured for some of them; and that the Director-General of National Service and the Minister of Labour have done their very best, when they became aware of what had happened, to find new employment for this sudden and entirely unheralded accession to the Labour Market. It is fortunate that present circumstances permit of new places being thus found for most of the women without the loss of more than three or five per cent. of their income for the year, together with a certain amount of personal inconvenience and expense. What it is now important to consider is the provision that the Government will make for the discharge, when peace comes, not of a few tens of thousands of civil workers on war supplies, but of some three millions of them; not in half a dozen munition centres only, but practically all over Great Britain; not when there is an unsatisfied demand for workers, but at a moment when all industries will be dislocated and literally millions of people will be looking for situations.

It is significant that, whilst the demobilisation of the five million soldiers has, we learn, been arranged for down to the smallest detail, that of the three million civil workers on munitions and in other "war trades" has not yet been made the subject of any Cabinet decision. Yet the discharge of the munition workers will come first, and be far more sudden and simultaneous than the demobilisation of the Army. However urgently the Treasury may press the Army Council to bring to an end the colossal daily expense of an army in the field, it must inevitably be weeks, or even months, before it can be cut down on any large scale. The disbandment of the whole five million men, more than half of them to be brought back overseas, will probably be spread, from first to last, over a couple of years. On the other hand, the discharge of the three million civil workers will begin the very day that peace is assured—probably even as soon as it is actually in near prospect—and an enormous proportion of these workers (half of them women) will be turned adrift within a month. Nearly a year ago, after many attempts, the Government was induced to go so far as to appoint a Committee to consider what arrangements ought to be made for the eventual discharge of these civil war workers, including also those serving in other occupations as substitutes for men with the Colours. Nothing has yet been heard of any report from this Committee; and we believe that no arrangements have actually been made. Peace may not yet be even on the horizon; but when it comes it will come with absolute suddenness, probably in some quite unforeseen way, and it ought not to find us unprepared for what will be a whole avalanche of discharges.

What ought to be done is clear. The Government has the same sort of responsibility for getting these three million civilian war workers into fresh employment, and for providing for them in any interval, as it has for the disbanded soldiers. Which among all the eight millions has endured the most hardship, gone through the greatest inconvenience or made the largest pecuniary sacrifice—it is not always the soldier—cannot be gone into. The nation cannot afford to have any of these millions of men and women swelling the ranks of the unemployed, and sinking rapidly into the abyss of the unemployable. If it is asked why the Government should assume a larger responsibility, or do more for the munition workers than for civilians employed in other occupations, the answer is plain. All the civilian workers in the wide range of munitions are, by the Munitions of War Acts, held compulsorily to that service to the very last day on which they are required. Under the latest Act, they may change their employer, but not their occupation, under penalty of never being able to get any paid employment, in any occupation whatever, so long as the Munitions of War Acts endure. We know, and they know, that the occupation to which, in the public interest, they have been lured must come presently to a sudden end. The more provident among them would be naturally looking out for a change to more per-[illegible]nent employment. For the service of the State we [illegible]torily forbid them to take this course, although [illegible] that their wages will suddenly stop at a week's [illegible] at a time when it will be particularly diffi-[illegible] a new situation. The moral obligation o[illegible]vernment is thus exceptionally great.

701/6

Dismissals. New Statesman

W[illegible]ggest that these civilian war-workers need to be provided for on the same lines as the disbanded soldiers. They should, like these, if only for the sake of promoting mobility, certainly be given free railway tickets either to their former homes or to any new situation that can be found for them. They need—the women workers especially—a similar month's furlough with pay; indeed, the nation cannot afford, in the interests of the public health and of the continuance of the race, not to ensure these women some holiday after their unduly prolonged hours of labour and perpetual strain without any other intermission than illness. They ought to have provision against the contingency of unemployment just as the soldier is to have, not merely the odd weeks at seven shillings that their brief compulsory insurance will have entitled them to, but provision covering all the unemployment to which they may be subjected during the whole year of reconstruction, at a subsistence level. But, above all, what is needed is intelligent organisation in advance so as to have employment ready to which as many as possible of the discharged workers can be transferred without any greater interval than is required for the indispensable holiday. This needs special action by the Employment Exchanges, so far as private employment is concerned. But it means more than this. The need for finding situations for these workers ought to form part of the Government scheme for such an arrangement of the national and municipal works requiring anyhow to be undertaken within the next few years as will prevent the occurrence of unemployment on a large scale. This is otherwise bound to be an evil accompaniment of the "General Post" of half the wage-earning population, which will set in when peace comes.

"IN TIMES OF CONFUSION"

"AT the close of 1611," recounts one of Russia's greatest modern historians, Kluchevski, "the Muscovite Empire presented a spectacle of universal and complete disruption. The Poles had taken Smolensk . . . ; the Swedes had occupied Novgorod . . . ; the second false Dimitri had been murdered and succeeded, in Pskov, by a third pretender . . . ; the first expeditionary force of the provincial nobility had been broken up near Moscow. Meanwhile the country lacked an administration . . . the State changed into a kind of amorphous, coagulated federation." "On all sides the State of Muscovy is now torn by foes," wrote in 1612 the boyars of Moscow in a circular letter to the towns. "In the eyes of all rulers round about are we now fallen into contumely and reproach."

The evil days have returned, and after having grown outwardly into the greatest Power on the European con-

March

701 of 865

Daily News. 12. 9. 18.

September 1918.

WOMEN AFTER THE WAR.

Demobilisation of New Workers.

PLANS IN PROGRESS.

The problem of the demobilisation of women war-workers is just now engaging the attention of a number of interested organisations. Various schemes, official and unofficial, have been prepared, and it is hoped that some workable plan to meet all cases will soon take definite shape.

In addition to the Ministries of Labour and Reconstruction, different organised bodies, such as the National Alliance of Employers and Employed, the Women's Industrial Council, the Women's Labour League, the National Federation of Girls' Clubs, and other more individualistic societies, are making good progress towards a solution of the problem.

It is roughly estimated that there are at present nearly 5,000,000 women employed in industry in this country. Of that number, approximately 3,500,000 were engaged in work of some kind before the war. They have in the majority of cases changed their occupations, but do not offer so great a difficulty to demobilisation as the remaining 1,500,000 newcomers into the labour market. Women in employment before the war had an economic reason for working, while a very large percentage of those who went into industry since 1914 did so out of purely patriotic motives, and not because of any real necessity.

ORDER OF DEMOBILISATION.

In regard to the general question of demobilisation the Ministries of Labour and Reconstruction have very little that can be made public at the moment, but many important conferences have been held by unofficial organisations. In this connection the National Federation of Employers and Employees, representing every industry except that of agriculture, have initiated a number of conferences, at which many points have been debated and decided upon as being the most suitable methods of procedure on demobilisation.

Among the methods suggested was the order in which women should leave industry, and it was decided the best solution was to be found in the following manner:

1. Women with private means.
2. Widows with war pensions and children.
3. Widows with war pensions and without children.
4. Married women whose husbands have work.
5. Single women without dependents.
6. Single women with dependents.

Another method suggested was "that the hours of labour of the women and the returning men be reduced to six, five, and four hours per day, so that all women and all the men work on half time, and that as the social system resumed its normal course and the women went back to pre-war industries the hours of the men be increased to a maximum of eight."

GOVERNMENT OFFICE PROBLEM.

The problem is being tackled in another manner by the Women's Industrial Council, who are chiefly concerned at present with the future of women employed in Government offices. No plans are apparently being made officially on this matter, yet it is one that forms perhaps the most serious of all the problems. Many of these women and girls were not working before the war, are largely untrained, and are not receiving any training of lasting value in their present work. A large percentage of these women, so the Council affirm, are willing during the war to work at "pocket-money" wages, and would possibly continue to do so afterwards, to the great detriment of those women dependent upon their earnings. The Joint Committee of the Council, including representatives of all women's societies and organisations, estimate that the women leaving Government offices after the war will fall into three main classes:

1. Those who wish to leave the labour market altogether.
2. Those who wish to remain at work, but were not necessarily dependent on their earnings.
3. Those who would be forced to live on their earnings, either as clerks or in some other occupation.

[illegible] The National Federation of Women Workers, and, to a less extent, the general labour unions, have fought for fair treatment, and in some cases have wrung concessions from the Special Arbitration Tribunal appointed by the Ministry to deal with women's

November 1918

Parliamentary Debates.
12. 11. 18.

WAR WORKERS.

Lord H. CAVENDISH-BENTINCK asked the Minister of Reconstruction if he can state which Committee or Committees are considering the question of the demobilisation of women warworkers; whether any of the Committees have reported or are ready to report; and what steps are being taken to put into operation the recommendations of the Committees?

Sir J. D. REES asked the Minister of Reconstruction whether any scheme has been elaborated for continuing as State or other manufactories large munition and the like factories, employing many thousands of workers, as soon as the War ceases; and, if not, whether such action is required, in view of the inevitable results of suddenly closing establishments upon which so many citizens directly or indirectly depend for their livelihood?

Major NEWMAN asked the Minister of Reconstruction whether it is the fact that there are at present employed on the making of munitions of war 250,000 lads under military age; and will he say what scheme is under the consideration of the Ministry to prevent the danger that may be caused by numbers of these lads being thrown out of employment on the termination of hostilities?

Dr. ADDISON: I hope later in the day to make a comprehensive statement on reconstruction questions, particularly with regard to demobilisation, and I will endeavour to deal fully in my statement with the points raised in these questions.

Daily News.
16. 11. 18.

MUNITION GIRLS' OUT-OF-WORK PAY.

Unfulfilled Promise of the Government.

Thousands of women and girls in all parts of the country have already been discharged from munition works that are slowing down. The number is increasing every day.

None of these girls have yet received, or officially become entitled to receive, one penny of the special out-of-work pay promised her by the Government.

No information can be obtained as to the date at which the payments will commence. All that can be said is that the Government appear to have no intention of making the allowance retrospective. In other words, there will be an interval —whether long or short is uncertain— during which the workers who have already been discharged and cannot find other employment must live as best they can.

The amount definitely promised to women workers over 18 years of age is 20s. a week, and to men over 18 24s. a week. All that discharged women are actually getting in any instance is 7s. a week, and then only if they have been engaged in a compulsorily insured trade. The case of discharged men is the same, but is not so immediately pressing as the number discharged is far smaller.

If serious trouble is to be prevented the Government must immediately announce the date at which special out-of-work pay will begin, and must undertake to reckon it from the day on which the worker was discharged.

WOMAN M.P. BILL PASSED.

Lords Refuse to Admit Peeresses in Their Own Right.

The right of women to sit in the House of Commons, if elected, is now secure, as the qualifying Bill was read a third time and passed in the House of Lords last night. It now awaits the Royal Assent.

Lord Haldane moved an amendment in Committee providing that peeresses in their own right might sit and vote in that House.

Lord Islington, for the Government, but not personally, said he could not support or accept the amendment. The proper way to carry it out was by the introduction of a separate Bill.

The Earl of Selborne supported Lord Haldane's proposal, but it was defeated by 33 votes to 14, and the Bill passed through Committee and the remaining stages unamended.

20.11.18

OUT-OF-WORK DONATION.

The Government Scheme to Come in Force on Monday.

WOMEN MUNITION WORKERS' DEMANDS.

The scheme of out-of-work donation will come into operation on Monday next, and out-of-work donation policies will not be issued before that date.

Following are the rates of donation:

Men over 18 years of age .....24s. a week.
Women over 18 years of age.....18s. a week.

With supplementary allowances for dependent children of 6s. a week for the first child under 15 years of age and 3s. a week for each additional child under that age.

Boys between 15 and 18.....12s. a week.
Girls between 15 and 18 .....10s. a week.

Subject to attendance, if required, at a course of instruction under the Board of Education or other Central Authority.

The donation does not become due until after the applicant has been unemployed and has attended at the Exchange for three consecutive working days, and payment will not be made for these three days.

The donation will ordinarily be paid as follows: To ex-members of his Majesty's Forces, on Thursday, up to the preceding Tuesday, inclusive; to civilian workers on Friday up to the preceding Wednesday, inclusive; and the first days for receipt of donation in the ordinary course will, therefore, be Thursday, Dec. 5, or Friday, Dec. 6.

Subject to previous application, however, payment of the donation due up till Friday, Nov. 29, inclusive, will be made on Saturday, Nov. 30. The amount to be drawn on the succeeding pay day will, of course, be correspondingly reduced.

Ex-sailors, soldiers, and airmen will be entitled to out-of-work donation policies, available for 12 months, if they have actually served with the forces during the present war, and civilian workers will be entitled to out-of-work donation policies, available for six months, if they are British subjects and became "employed contributors" under the National Health Insurance scheme before August 25, 1918, and in the case of boys and girls between 15 and 16 if they entered employment before that date.

Unemployed persons desiring to claim donation should, on and after Monday, attend at an Employment Exchange or Branch Employment Office, taking with them their discharge or other military certificates if they served in his Majesty's Forces during the present war, or their Health Insurance Record Cards and Health Insurance Contribution Cards if civilian workers.

THE DISABLED.

Important Government Decision on Compensation.

Our Lobby Correspondent writes that the Cabinet Committee to which all problems of demobilisation and reconstruction are referred consists of General Smuts (chairman), Mr. Barnes, and Mr. Austen Chamberlain. The release of men from the front and other pressing matters are now before them.

The Government have decided on the position of disabled men under the Workmen's Compensation Act. Early in 1918 the Ministry of Pensions and the Ministry of Labour received representations from various quarters that the Act would operate to the detriment of the employment of disabled men, owing to the apprehension among employers that such men would be specially liable to accident, thereby increasing the cost of compensation.

The Home Secretary appointed a Committee to consider what special provisions should be made, and they have now recommended that in the case of discharged sailors, soldiers, or airmen in receipt of disability pensions employers should be relieved, without prejudice to the men, of any additional compensation liability which their employment might entail.

A scheme based on the guarantee of certain payments by the State is now being prepared for carrying this into

WOOLWICH WOMEN.

Procession of 5,000 March to Ministry of Munitions.

A remarkable procession of 5,000 women munition workers from Woolwich Arsenal appeared suddenly in front of the Ministry of Munitions headquarters at the Hotel Metropole yesterday afternoon to impress upon the Government authorities the necessity of doing something promptly for the women who will be discharged from the Arsenal in consequence of the cessation of the demand for munitions of war. As a result they learned that the Government's scheme for an unemployment donation of £1 a week for 13 weeks is to come into operation next Monday.

The demand for this demonstration, one of the women shop stewards explained to a "Daily News" representative, arose quite spontaneously in the workshops on Monday because of rumours which had been flying through the workshops at the Arsenal to the effect that the women, numbering about 20,000, were to be dismissed very quickly in large batches.

Yesterday morning they sought the assistance of Miss Mary Macarthur, of the National Federation of Women Workers, and when Miss Macarthur arrived at Charing Cross in the afternoon she found the procession there ready to follow her and her assistants anywhere, and she found the police, polite as ever, but sadly perplexed as to how to deal with 5,000 women forming a procession in a prohibited area on the day when the King was going to Parliament!

TRIUMPHANT DELEGATES.

The police said that the women could not march towards Parliament or within a mile of it. The leaders of the women replied that they were already within the charmed circle of the mile radius, and they must march somewhere, even if they could only march in the other direction. So Miss Macarthur and a band of the women shop stewards went off to the Hotel Metropole to see some of the chief officials. There were consultations with 10, Downing-street, and Scotland Yard, and at last the delegates emerged triumphant. As soon as the King had returned to Buckingham Palace the procession had permission to march nearer than ever to Parliament—the man-made law keeping them a mile away had been abrogated in favour of the Women with the Vote. They had no brass band, but headed by a banner with the words, "Shall Peace Bring Us Starvation?" and the banner of the National Federation of Women Workers, the 5,000 girls, walking four abreast, marched to the Kingsway Hall.

A deputation consisting of Miss Macarthur and a dozen or more of the women shop stewards went into Whitehall-gardens to see Sir Stephenson Kent, of the Demobilisation Board, Sir T. Munro, and General Martell. The interview lasted an hour and a half. When the deputation arrived at the Kingsway Hall they were received with tremendous enthusiasm.

"GRADUAL DISMISSALS."

Miss Macarthur told the meeting that Sir Stephenson Kent and the other officials quite naturally appreciated the apprehensions of the workers—(roars of laughter)—and they thought that the women were entitled to go to Whitehall to express their apprehensions, although they thought it was perhaps unnecessary for 5,000 of them to have gone there. Sir Stephenson and his colleagues promised that they would endeavour to [illegible] dismissals at Woolwich [illegible] than the first child under 15 years of age and 3s. a week for each additional child under that age.

Boys between 15 and 18.....12s. a week.
Girls between 15 and 18 .....10s. a week.

Subject to attendance, if required, at a course of instruction under the Board of Education or other Central Authority.

The donation does not become due until after the applicant has been unemployed and has attended at the Exchange for three consecutive working days, and payment will not be made for these three days.

The donation will ordinarily be paid as follows: To ex-members of his Majesty's Forces, on Thursday, up to the preceding Tuesday, inclusive; to civilian workers on Friday up to the preceding Wednesday, inclusive; and the first days for receipt of donation in the ordinary course will, therefore, be Thursday, Dec. 5, or Friday, Dec. 6.

Subject to previous application, however, payment of the donation due up till Friday, Nov. 29, inclusive, will be made on Saturday, Nov. 30. The amount to be drawn on the succeeding pay day will, of course, be correspondingly reduced.

Ex-sailors, soldiers, and airmen will be entitled to out-of-work donation policies, available for 12 months, if they have actually served with the forces during the present war, and civilian workers will be entitled to out-of-work donation policies, available for six months, if they are British subjects and became "employed contributors" under the National Health Insurance scheme before August 25, 1918, and in the case of boys and girls between 15 and 16 if they entered employment before that date.

Unemployed persons desiring to claim donation should, on and after Monday, attend at an Employment Exchange or Branch Employment Office, taking with them their discharge or other military certificates if they served in his Majesty's Forces during the present war, or their Health Insurance Record Cards and Health Insurance Contribution Cards if civilian workers.

THE DISABLED.

Important Government Decision on Compensation.

Our Lobby Correspondent writes that the Cabinet Committee to which all problems of demobilisation and reconstruction are referred consists of General Smuts (chairman), Mr. Barnes, and Mr. Austen Chamberlain. The release of men from the front and other pressing matters are now before them.

The Government have decided on the position of disabled men under the Workmen's Compensation Act. Early in 1918 the Ministry of Pensions and the Ministry of Labour received representations from various quarters that the Act would operate to the detriment of the employment of disabled men, owing to the apprehension among employers that such men would be specially liable to accident, thereby increasing the cost of compensation.

The Home Secretary appointed a Committee to consider what special provisions should be made, and they have now recommended that in the case of discharged sailors, soldiers, or airmen in receipt of disability pensions employers should be relieved, without prejudice to the men, of any additional compensation liability which their employment might entail.

A scheme based on the guarantee of certain payments by the State is now being prepared for carrying this into effect.

headquarters at the Hotel Metropole yesterday afternoon to impress upon the Government authorities the necessity of doing something promptly for the women who will be discharged from the Arsenal in consequence of the cessation of the demand for munitions of war. As a result they learned that the Government's scheme for an unemployment donation of £1 a week for 13 weeks is to come into operation next Monday.

The demand for this demonstration, one of the women shop stewards explained to a "Daily News" representative, arose quite spontaneously in the workshops on Monday because of rumours which had been flying through the workshops at the Arsenal to the effect that the women, numbering about 20,000, were to be dismissed very quickly in large batches.

Yesterday morning they sought the assistance of Miss Mary Macarthur, of the National Federation of Women Workers, and when Miss Macarthur arrived at Charing Cross in the afternoon she found the procession there ready to follow her and her assistants anywhere, and she found the police, polite as ever, but sadly perplexed as to how to deal with 5,000 women forming a procession in a prohibited area on the day when the King was going to Parliament!

TRIUMPHANT DELEGATES.

The police said that the women could not march towards Parliament or within a mile of it. The leaders of the women replied that they were already within the charmed circle of the mile radius, and they must march somewhere, even if they could only march in the other direction. So Miss Macarthur and a band of the women shop stewards went off to the Hotel Metropole to see some of the chief officials. There were consultations with 10, Downing-street, and Scotland Yard, and at last the delegates emerged triumphant. As soon as the King had returned to Buckingham Palace the procession had permission to march nearer than ever to Parliament—the man-made law keeping them a mile away had been abrogated in favour of the Women with the Vote. They had no brass band, but headed by a banner with the words, "Shall Peace Bring Us Starvation?" and the banner of the National Federation of Women Workers, the 5,000 girls, walking four abreast, marched to the Kingsway Hall.

A deputation consisting of Miss Macarthur and a dozen or more of the women shop stewards went into Whitehall-gardens to see Sir Stephenson Kent, of the Demobilisation Board, Sir T. Munro, and General Martell. The interview lasted an hour and a half. When the deputation arrived at the Kingsway Hall they were received with tremendous enthusiasm.

"GRADUAL DISMISSALS."

Miss Macarthur told the meeting that Sir Stephenson Kent and the other officials quite naturally appreciated the apprehensions of the workers—(roars of laughter)—and they thought that the women were entitled to go to Whitehall to express their apprehensions, although they thought it was perhaps unnecessary for 5,000 of them to have gone there.

Sir Stephenson and his colleagues pro[illegible] they would endeavour to dismissals at Woolwich
[illegible] than the

Daily News. 28.11.18.

7

SIX MONTHS WAGES MINIMUM.

Freedom of Negotiations on Other Question.

The Ministry of Labour calls attention to the Wages (Temporary Regulation) Act which passed through Parliament last week. The Act (which repeals Part 1 of the Munitions of War Act, 1915) renders necessary certain alterations in the procedure hitherto adopted for the settlement of differences as to wages. The main purpose of the new Act is to secure the maintenance for a period of six months of the minimum wages generally applicable at the date of the signing of the armistice

"Workmen" includes men and boys, women and girls, and the wage elements dealt with by the Act are the recognised time rate or other basis for determining wages (e.g., in the various trades, a shift rate, or piece-work price list, or scale of tonnage rates, etc., etc.), the usual allowances for overtime, night-work, week-ends or holidays when any of these are worked, and the general war bonuses or war advances where these are paid in addition to the time-rate or other wage basis.

WOMEN AND GIRLS.

The Act contains special provisions in the case of the wages of women and girls.

During the six months period for which the Act provides the prescribed rate of wages may be varied either as the result of arbitration or an agreement or settlement approved by the Minister of Labour. The Act provides for the establishment of a Court of Arbitration, which will deal with differences referred to it by the Ministry of Labour

It will be observed that the Wages Act alters in important respects the wages position under the Munitions of War Acts. Minimum rates of wages being provided for, it leaves all other questions as to wages open to free negotiation. The Minister of Labour trusts that this freedom to negotiate will be generally exercised in a concilatory spirit

REQUESTS FOR ARBITRATION.

Questions which do not come under the Wages Act, and which cannot be settled satisfactorily by the employers and workpeople concerned or by the employers' associations and the trade unions, may, with the consent of both parties, be referred to arbitration through the Ministry of Labour under the Conciliation Act, 1896. Requests for arbitration under this Act should, if possible, be made jointly by the parties concerned. Under this Act the Ministry of Labour can appoint an arbitrator only with the consent of both sides.

1918. 701/12 701.

Daily Chronicle. 6.12.18

Halstead Times + Haverhill Express. 30.11.18

WATCHING WOMEN'S INTEREST

NEW DEPARTMENT SET UP BY THE GOVERNMENT.

The "Daily Chronicle" learns that a new women's branch of the Demobilisation and Resettlement Department of the Ministry of Labour has been formed. Its function will be to deal with the questions arising from the demobilisation of women war workers. Special consideration will be given to the question of domestic service for women. State organisation of the conditions of domestic service was indicated in Monday's "Daily Chronicle" as a probable step in the near future.

It will probably be found that regulated daily service, in shifts, if necessary, on the lines advocated by the Household Order'y Corps, will be found to fit in best with the new ideas which the war has brought. In this case, the hostels which have served their war purposes might be utilised to provide homes for daily workers, including war widows with children.

TO LEARN NEW TRADES.

In the readjustment of industry an important place will be taken by facilities for women to learn new trades. The Women's Branch will be empowered to deal with this question. Special consideration will be given, the "Daily Chronicle" understands, to wives and fiancées of soldiers and sailors who wish to fit themselves for a specific industrial career, but who are unable to obtain necessary training unaided.

Associated with the Women's Branch will be Miss Durham, of the women's side of the Employment Exchanges, and Miss Squire, of the Home Office, and in close touch with it will be a Women's Trade Union Advisory Committee.

The nucleus of this committee is the old committee associated with the Ministry of Munitions, but its members will be added to by women representing trades of particular peace-time importance, such as textiles and potteries. The committee has already met, and sub-committees have been set up to report.

D.C. 6.12.18.

UNEMPLOYED IN FUR COATS

MUNITION GIRLS WHO REFUSE TO ENTER DOMESTIC SERVICE.

FIRST OUT-OF-WORK PAY TO-DAY.

First payments to unemployed war workers registered at the Employment Exchanges will be made to-day.

In such centres as Woolwich, Enfield, Acton, Shepherd's Bush, and various parts of North London, the number of applicants is likely to be very great. It is not expected, however, that the officials will be unable to deal with them all, as demobilisation has been proceeding gradually, and only those who were the first to register will be able to claim payment to-day.

A "Daily Chronicle" representative who visited the Employment Exchange in Acton yesterday found a queue of women waiting to register. The doors were closed and they were admitted in turn. Thousands of women were employed at the great shell factory at Park Royal, and at Shepherd's Bush a large number of women were employed in the making of camp kit, gas masks, and so on.

DEMAND FOR WAITRESSES.

Some of the applicants at the Acton Exchange wore well-made fur coats. Although householders are applying daily for domestic servants these ex-munitioneers refuse to consider posts as "generals" or cooks even at tempting wages.

"If we went into service," said one of the applicants to our representative, "we should be out of the swing of it all, and never know when there were any good jobs going. If we get some kind of work that doesn't mean living in we can keep in touch with the Exchange."

At the Acton Exchange the most numerous vacancies, apart from those which are purely domestic, are for waitresses, who are urgently wanted for London restaurants, for waiters and porteresses for the Christmas season, for grocers' assistants, and for laundry workers.

THE GENERAL ELECTION.

SAFFRON WALDEN DIVISION

During the present week Mr. J. J. Mallon who is the nominee of the Labour interests in the Saffron Walden Division, has been vigorously prosecuting his candidature. Meetings have been held almost nightly in the villages and towns throughout the constituency. He has had the assistance of numerous speakers, ladies as well as gentlemen, including one or two who are themselves contesting seats under the auspices of the Labour Party in different parts of the country. As a rule the meetings have been quiet and perfectly orderly, and everywhere the Labour programme as expounded from the platform has had a very good reception. Mr. Charles Ready, of Halstead, who is acting as Mr. Mallon's election agent, has been extremely busy, arranging for meetings and in otherwise carrying on the propaganda, and an enthusiastic band of helpers are rendering assistance n various ways.

Mr. Cecil Beck, the late Liberal member, who is offering his services again, this time as an advocate of a Coalition Government, is also preparing to commence his campaign, with the co-operation of Mr. Hubert Collar, his agent. Mr. Beck intends to address meetings of the electors in all the different polling districts within the next few days. He has already sent an address to the absent voters, the soldiers and sailors who are serving at home and abroad, and all other electors in North Essex will have an opportunity of reading a statement of the Coalition candidate's views within the nex day or two.

MEETING IN HALSTEAD.

A meeting in support of Mr. Mallon was held in Halstead Town Hall on Thursday evening. Miss Mary MacArthur (Mrs. Anderson), well known in the industrial world as a prominent advocate of women's interests, had been announced as the principal speaker, and Mr. Mallon himself was also expected, but owing to an accident to their motor car on the way from Saffron Walden, where they had previously attended a meeting, they were unable to arrive, and the audience were disappointed in consequence.

Notwithstanding the inclement nature of the weather, a very fair number of persons had assembled, the female sex being largely in evidence. Those present were, however, by no means all supporters of the Labour cause, a good many others having come to hear what was said. Mr. G. Hardy (who like the other members of the committee, wore a badge of red ribbon on his coat) presided, and in opening the proceedings gave a cordial welcome to all present.

The Chairman, in a short speech spoke of the encouraging progress that is being made by the Labour movement. He said that if the country coud not yet have a Labour Government, there ought at least to be a strong Labour Opposition in the House of Commons. He also alluded to the growing interest that agricultural labourers are taking in political concerns, and said that farm workers, by their efforts to increase the production of the soil had done just as much to preserve the safety of the country as the soldiers in the trenches.

Thereafter, Mr. Hines, the Workers Union organiser in the Bishop Stortford district, who happened to be in Halstead, was announced, and he spoke for some time, with the view of occupying attention until the arrival of the others. After he sat down, however, the Chairman intimated that a message had been received to the effect that Mr. Mallon's car came to grief some three miles on the other side of Bardfield, and that they were unable to procure another. With an expression of regret for the occurrence Mr. Hardy had, therefore, no alternative but to declare the meeting at an end, and the audience took their departure.

Daily Chronicle.
7. 12. 18.

70
7011

FIRST DAY OF OUT-OF-WORK DONATIONS.

WOMEN WAIT IN LONG QUEUES AT THE BIG EMPLOYMENT EXCHANGES IN LONDON.

Hundreds of women, mostly good-humoured and cheery, crowded the Employment Exchanges yesterday to claim the first out-of-work benefits to which they were entitled. In some places the queues were so great that the police had to be called in to help to keep order.

At the big Exchange at the White City, Shepherd's-bush, which a "Daily Chronicle" representative visited, excellent arrangements have been adopted to avoid congestion. As the workers applied for registration they were given cards stating the time at which they should call for their donations. The applicants were distributed throughout the day, so many coming between 10 and 11, so many between 11 and 12, and so on until the late closing hour of 7 o'clock. About 1,200 women received out-of-work pay here yesterday, but a far larger number, not among the first to register, will be entitled to the donation next week.

At Shepherd's-bush a payment of 6s. 8d. was made to registered applicants some days ago; those who applied yesterday received the balance of 13s. 4d. In future, however, the donation will not be divided up in this manner, and next Friday the full amount will be paid to those entitled to it, with proportionately smaller amounts to those who have not been out of work for a whole week.

It was a strange crowd. There were shawled women, carrying babies, and there were young girls, with elaborately curled hair, wearing expensive fur coats. Not all the munitioneers earned high wages, however. One of the women told our representative that she had been on munitions for two and a half years, and that she had never made more than 45s. a week, although she had taken her turn in the high explosive section on several occasions. "My average wage was 37s. 6d.," she said, "not such a lot in these times. And I don't suppose I'll earn anything like that again for a long time. But I feel so pleased the war's over that I'll take any old job that comes along."

"Domestic service?"

"Except that," she laughed.

Machinery has a curious attraction for these war workers. Any kind of a job in a factory where there is an unending sing-song of sound, and a crowd of busy workers is the great desire. It is unquestionable that many of these women keenly feel the loss of factory life, where they found a spirit of good comradeship, and, rather than accept posts where they would be isolated from other workers, the women are waiting for the big change over from war to peace conditions.

Meantime the Government's out of work donation is proving of real comfort and help.

December 1918 701.

Morning Post. 7.12.18.

Daily News. 12.18.

701/14

NEW WORK FOR WOMEN.

PROBLEMS AND PROSPECTS.

To deal with the special problems arising from the demobilisation of women workers a Women's Branch of the Demobilisation and Resettlement Department of the Ministry of Labour has been established. A Women's Trade Union Advisory Con mittee has also been set up; and sub-committees are already appointed to deal with such questions as the return of domestic servants to work under conditions more in accordance with the present industrial outlook, the training of women for new industries or for such occupations as were classified in the pre-war period as women's work, and the training of war-brides and wives of soldiers and sailors in housewifery and infant welfare.

In the meanwhile (according to the statement of an official of the Ministry of Labour yesterday) it is hoped that women who from patriotic rather than economic reasons have given such splendid service in the munitions factories, will during the period of reorganisation undertake some voluntary work. "There is at present," it was said, "much scope in the fields of public health and recreative education. By voluntarily undertaking these pioneer tasks women not dependent on a weekly wage will be accomplishing a double service for their country. They will be giving invaluable service to the development of the ideals of a new England, and they will be clearing the road during the transition period for those women who seek in the labour market the means by which alone they can maintain themselves and their homes."

FROM MUNITIONS TO SEWING MACHINES.

It was further pointed out that women dependent on their earnings might find some reassurance in the knowledge that progress is rapidly being made throughout the country by manufacturers in the process of restarting peace industries. The following examples were given: In one big London firm, where several thousands of workpeople were employed on munitions, a change-over is being undertaken to the manufacture of sewing machines. In this enterprise the whole of the employees will be retained, and use made of the plant installed for shell-making. Another London firm reports that they will probably employ more women and girls than during the war, while a firm of electrical engineers, also in London, state that of the small proportion of girls so far discharged some have already been reabsorbed in dressmaking. Many have been absorbed in the Post Office sorting for Christmas mails; others have been engaged as shop assistants for the holidays; and others again have returned to laundry work or to positions they held before the war.

Similar transition from war to peace industry is taking place in the provinces, and in order to bridge over the transition period the Government is providing the machinery of extended Employment Exchanges, of which it is hoped full free use will be made by both employers and employed. Added to this the workers are entitled to free railway warrants to their homes or to the place of new industry, and the unemployment donation, which can be obtained under stated conditions at the Employment Exchange.

FIRST DONATIONS TO UNEMPLOYED

Queue of Women With Babies.

GIRLS WHO WANT TO GO BACK TO FACTORIES.

Yesterday the first payment to registered unemployed war-workers was paid, and at many of the Employment Exchanges there was much activity, and the officials were kept constantly busy. At the Acton Employment Exchange, which covers an area in which there were several munition works, including the national filling factory at Hayes, "The Daily News" was informed that there had been a steady stream of women since the office opened at nine o'clock.

There were no outside queues, the applicants awaiting their turn in comfort inside the exchange. At 11.30 the number of those waiting was so great that the doors were closed until two o'clock, when another steady stream of women kept forming. All the applicants would, however, receive their benefits in good time, our representative was told, and the exchange, instead of closing at four o'clock, would remain open till seven o'clock or even later, so that those women who had been unemployed for a few days and were now working, could come for the donation to which they were entitled.

WHAT THE QUEUE DISCUSSED.

It was an orderly, good-humoured queue—many of the women well and sensibly dressed, some having babies with them—who while waiting discussed their present chances of work. Most of the girls want to return to factory work, in which many were engaged before the war.

"But I don't mind what work it is so long as I get decent money and a chance of a rise," said one girl. "Yesterday a friend and I went up to Holborn to inquire about a labelling job we saw advertised. But the money was only 18s a week, and a girl can't live on that. I don't, of course, expect war wages—£2 10s. a week—again, for I would willingly take a place at 23s. to 27s. if, when I had learnt the work, there would be a chance of an increase. I don't think many of us will go into domestic service and 'live in' like servants used to do."

Of the hundreds of girls who have registered at Acton since the out-of-work policies could be claimed quite a large number have already been placed, many as daily domestic workers and as waitresses. In spite of the numbers with which that Exchange deals, the system is working there both smoothly and well.

BRANCH FOR WOMEN.

We understand that a Women's Branch is being formed of the Demobilisation and Re-Settlement Department of the Ministry of Labour. This branch will have to deal with all the various problems that arise in connection with the demobilisation of women—problems that will necessarily be very different from any that will arise through the demobilisation of men. Men were in industry before, whereas war working women have come from all kinds of labour—domestic service, shops, their own homes—and belong to all classes and all parts of the world, some coming from the Dominions and the farthest corners of the world.

A large proportion of these are not dependent on their earnings, and during the present transition period from war to peace, which must take some time, these women are recommended to undertake for the time being some form of voluntary work, of which there is such a variety, needing helpers, such as work connected with public health, Care Committees, recreation, care of soldiers, disabled men, and so on. Afterwards, when the re-sorting is accomplished, it is thought that there will be paid work for all who want it. Wives of soldiers and fiancées of soldiers also constitute a large proportion of the demobilised women, and these, when the men are demobilised, will be provided for.

A Women's Trade Union Advisory Committee is advising the Women's Branch on such problems as that of domestic service, industrial training, and the training of the wives and fiancées of soldiers and sailors. In this latter case, the training will be concerned with housewifery and infant welfare.

Daily Express. 7.12.18.

WOMEN IN NEW INDUSTRIES.

PROGRESSIVE FIRMS FIND THEM WORK.

QUICK CHANGES.

A hopeful view was expressed by an official of the Ministry of Labour who was interviewed yesterday on the special problems connected with the re-employment of women demobilised from civil occupations.

A women's branch of the Demobilisation and Resettlement Department of the Ministry of Labour has been established, and is already at work. A women's trade union advisory committee has also been developed from the committee which, during the war, advised the Ministry of Munitions. To this will be added representatives of non-munitions industries, such as textiles, pottery, etc.

Sub-committees are already appointed to deal with such questions as the return of domestic servants to work under conditions more in accordance with the present industrial outlook, the training of women for new industries, and the training of war brides and wives of soldiers and sailors in housewifery and infant welfare.

DEPENDENT ON WAGES.

"To those women dependent on their earnings," said the official of the Ministry, "it will be some reassurance to know that progress is being rapidly made by manufacturers in restarting peace industries. In one big London firm where several thousands of workpeople were employed on munitions a change-over is being undertaken to the manufacture of sewing machines. The whole of the employees will be retained and use made of the plant installed for shell-making.

"Another London firm report that they will probably employ more women and girls than during the war, while a firm of electrical engineers state that of the small proportion of girls so far discharged some have already been reabsorbed in dressmaking. Others are in the Post Office sorting Christmas mails, engaged as shop assistants for the holidays, or have returned to positions they held before the war.

"A similar transition from war to peace industries is taking place in the provinces.

"So far as can be seen at present, the machinery set up will prove sufficient if the workers and the employers will maintain close touch with the employment changes."

New Witness Dec 1918

Mr. Winston Churchill's scheme of unemployment pay for women munition makers leaves untouched the question of the pensions for the heroic and unfortunate T.N.T. workers. These girls have forfeited their health, their youth and their beauty in the cause of their country. The devasting effect of the poisonous substances they handled can never be eradicated from their systems. They are obviously unfitted to earn their living and it is a national disgrace that they should be dependent upon public or private charity. It appears to us a matter of justice and equity that the T.N.T. workers should be provided for by the State. Mr. Churchill however, has displayed an utter indifference, nor so far as we can ascertain have any of the Labour Ministers urged their claims. It is cases of this description that go to show the utter indifference bred by professional politics. Before John Hodge took office it is difficult to believe he would have retained apathy in face of such a crying scandal. His post—and its salary—has effectually quenched his interest in the treatment of Labour, though as Minister of Pensions he could without much difficulty have intervened. It is as well in the midst of the "tosh" at present filling the papers as to the Coalition's intentions towards Labour to bear in mind that these women who, to quote Mr. George, "helped to save the Empire," have been left totally and cruelly without provision.

* * * *

Daily News. 27. 1. 19.

FEW "PIN-MONEY" GIRLS.

Women Working from Necessity More Than from Choice.

"The proportion of girls who work for pin money is very small in these days," said Miss Evans, Secretary of the Association of Women Clerks and Secretaries, yesterday. "When the Government Departments demobilise you will find that the majority of the girls will be looking for work as much from necessity as from choice. We took a census of our members on war work some time ago, and over two-thirds of them stated that they intended to remain at work."

The future employment of the Whitehall woman clerk was a difficult question, Miss Evans added. They had hoped for an opening in the 1st class Civil Service for the best qualified and experienced of the women, but the new report, though it contained recommendations for the promotion of temporary men clerks, make no mention whatever of women.

The Ministry of Labour has agreed to receive a deputation from the Association of Women Clerks and Secretaries on the question of employment benefit and higher wages.

701/15 701

Times 10.12.18

UNEMPLOYED WOMEN

DONATION INCREASED BY 5/- PER WEEK.

MR. BARNES'S ANNOUNCEMENT

Mr. Barnes, addressing a meeting of women voters in the Gorbals Division of Glasgow yesterday, announced that he had just received information that the amount of unemployment pay to women was to be increased by 5s. a week. Thus a woman who was deprived of her job in a factory, so long as she signed the book every day, and was willing to take any job, would now get 25s. a week. No more generous provision for unemployment had been made in this or any other country.

In the course of his speech, which was frequently interrupted, Mr. Barnes said the nation had cause to be grateful to the women for the courage and cheerfulness which they had shown throughout the war. He had always been in favour of the franchise being extended to women.

In reply to many questions, Mr. Barnes said that he was whole-heartedly in favour of paying women the same wages as men when they did work of the same value. That was not only necessary to safeguard the interests of the women, but was no less necessary to safeguard the interests of men, because, under our higgledy-piggledy system, there was no doubt that employers looked for the opportunity to get their work done cheaply. If it were got into the minds of the employer and the community that an employer who got the same value from a woman as he got from a man would have to pay the same wage, it would be not only good for the woman and the man, but for the whole community.

In regard to nationality rights, he was in favour of a woman not losing her rights as a British subject by reason of having married a German or any other foreigner. As to divorce, women ought to be placed in exactly the same position as men.

He congratulated the women upon having entered into their share of the covenant of the country. We had won the war handsomely, a great deal more completely than many of us expected. Six months ago they had a lot of curs barking at their heels, all the time trying to weaken the country, doing all they could to bring about strife and civil disturbance, in one of the greatest national crises that had ever occurred. Those who did so, and tried to prevent us winning the war, were doing that which was traitorous to the memory of their sons. (Cheers.) The nation was face to face with the tasks of peace, almost as great as those of war, and he thought they would be wise if they entrusted those people who had won the war with the task of finding the way back to a safe haven.

Questioned as to the peace settlement and President Wilson's 14 points, Mr. Barnes said that there was dubiety on certain matters—for instance, as to the freedom of the seas. If Mr. Wilson had in his mind that an efficient League of Nations would be set up so that there would be no fear of war in the future, they would all subscribe to what he called "freedom of the seas"; but if there was still to be danger to us from outside, then he did not believe in the doctrine at all. For every offence Germany had committed against international law she should be made to pay to the uttermost farthing. He did not call that an indemnity, but only a deterrent. As to sending troops to Russia, he said we should have been perfectly justified in making war on Russia for her betrayal of us, but the few Allied troops now in that country were there to benefit the Russian people.

A resolution of confidence in Mr. Barnes was passed.

 That portion of the out-of-work donation scheme applying to civilian workers, as outlined in Parliament on November 12, gave a grant of 24s. a week to men and 20s. a week to women, over 18 years of age, with allowances for dependent children, the maximum period of benefit being 13 weeks. For ex-Service men the maximum period is 26 weeks.

1918 December

Sunday School Chronicle 12.12.18.

701

701/16

OPENINGS FOR EDUCATED WOMEN WORKERS.

An Interview with Miss Mary G. Spencer

(Central Bureau for the Employment of Women).

This year, for the first time since the outbreak of war, a little of the old spirit of Christmas seems to have returned to us, and he would be a "Scrooge" indeed who, thinking only of his own losses—and who has not lost someone?—refused to share in the general feeling of rejoicing and relief that our men are no longer being slaughtered by a ruthless enemy.

But there are many thousands who, their brief period of rejoicing almost over, are looking with strained and anxious eyes to the future. Apart from the girls and women in the W.A.A.C., the W.R.A.F., and the W.R.N.S., whose demobilisation will be more or less gradual, there are 840,100 girls and women in other Government employment. The demobilisation of this number will not, of course, take place at once, and it is probable that a great number employed in what may be termed industrial work will be retained for some time. But week by week hosts of girls and women will be leaving Government offices never to return. What is in store for them in the future? Fortunate are they whose feet turn in the direction of the Central Bureau for the Employment of Women.

The Untrained Worker.

On a recent afternoon I had a chat with Miss Mary G. Spencer, who is in charge of the Information Bureau, and learnt a little of what is being done for the girls and women who will so soon be out of employment, and who have had perhaps no definite training, but are obliged, or wish, to earn their own living. The Bureau, Miss Spencer impressed upon me, is intended for girls who have been educated at secondary schools, private schools, at home, or who have received a university education—for any girl, in fact, with the exception of young girls just leaving the elementary schools.

I am afraid Miss Spencer lost interest in me when she found I was not seeking a post or in need of advice, but she willingly told me of the work of the Bureau.

Day by day an endless stream of girls and women call at the office and are advised and given the latest information concerning new openings, the training necessary, and the prospects when their training is complete. They are also given introductions to prospective employers. Last year 10,611 women had personal interviews and received expert advice—the number this year is, of course, much greater—and in addition 36,824 inquiries were dealt with by post.

Where Educated Women are Needed.

I asked Miss Spencer to tell me of some of the openings now available. There are so many that it is impossible to deal with them in detail. For instance, in public and social work alone there are openings for women as inspectors, in organising and administrative work, welfare work, as almoners, in club management, mission work, in schools for mothers, as prison inspectors, and as probation officers in police-courts. In business life there are now openings of every kind for educated women, from buying and travelling to house and estate agency. A new field has opened in horticulture and agriculture, poultry work and dog-breeding. There are new developments continually taking place in the teaching profession. Teachers are wanted for the blind and deaf, for teaching domestic economy, physical culture, music, eurhythmics, dancing and riding. Other professions embrace sculpture, photography, architecture, elocution, kennel management, motor work, etc. There are, indeed, so many to choose from that one is in danger of confusion.

There is a whole range of new developments in connection with the domestic arts, and I was greatly interested to learn that girls can now obtain a three months to nine months' training as lady cooks and as confectioners and caterers at The Refectory, University College, London, for the modest sum of £10 per term (lunch and tea included).

Patriotic Professions.

Then in connection with the National Health Society there are still a number of "patriotic" professions open to women as sanitary inspectors, health visitors, superintendents of baby clinics, and other public health appointments under Local Government Boards. Training for these posts is given by means of lectures, which commence in September and January of each year. Full particulars can be obtained from F. Lankester, National Health Society, 53, Berners-street, W. Then there is a new industry in medicinal herb growing, the training necessary for which can be obtained in a fully stocked and well-organised herb garden in a quaint little village in Buckinghamshire.

The Danger of Drifting.

And now I come to the most valuable of all the work carried on by the Bureau. There is a danger that many educated women will drift into the ranks of untrained, unqualified, and therefore underpaid workers, and to prevent this a Loan Fund has been inaugurated for the purpose of advancing the money for special training, or for cost of maintenance during training. The fund thus provides a "bridge" by means of which an untrained worker may reach the paths of efficiency. Concrete examples are always more interesting than abstract statements, and I asked Miss Spencer to tell me of some of the girls who had been assisted in this way. Let me mention a few.

A Bridge to Efficiency.

Miss A., the daughter of an Army officer, was unable through lack of means to finish her University career. She was granted a loan for maintenance, took a B.Sc. degree, obtained a good resident post as teacher, and repaid the loan within two years.

Miss H. was the daughter of an artist, but owing to the war was obliged to earn her own living. A loan was granted to enable her to train as a chauffeuse. She obtained a post, and repaid the money a few months afterwards.

Miss E. borrowed sufficient money to enable her to take a partnership in a poultry farm. Later this venture was merged in a larger organisation, and she was appointed as manageress.

Another applicant was granted a loan to enable her to complete her course of training in massage. She afterwards obtained a post in a military hospital.

A low rate of interest is charged on the loan, except in special cases, so that even the most sensitive need not feel they are accepting charity.

The usefulness of this branch of the Bureau's work is, of course, restricted by lack of funds, but the Committee are hoping to raise sufficient money to place the work on a permanent and self-supporting basis. Any reader who wishes to consult the Bureau should call (or write to the Secretary, Miss Mary G. Spencer) at the Central Bureau for the Employment of Women, 5 and 6, Princes-street, Cavendish-square, W.

F. H.

Times. 13. 12. 18.

1918 December

701/17

701.
cf: 703.
604 III
664 K

Daily News. 13. 12. 18.

WOMEN IN INDUSTRY.

INVESTIGATIONS IN A LARGE FIELD.

The following official statement was issued last night:—

The interests of women in proposed measures of national reconstruction are being closely watched by a committee of distinguished women who act in an advisory capacity to Dr. Addison, the Minister of Reconstruction. The committee is under the chairmanship of Lady Emmott, and comprises Lady Birchenough, Mrs. Deane Streatfeild, Miss Harris, Miss Susan Lawrence, Mrs. Pember Reeves, Viscountess Rhondda, Mrs. Symons, and Miss M. J. Tuke. Miss Beatrice Chamberlain was a member till her recent death. The committee meet at the Ministry of Reconstruction every week and take under their survey all questions in which women are primarily or largely concerned. As this field is a large one, in view of the greater place that women are taking in national affairs, the committee is split up into sub-committees to deal with different topics, and the sub-committees co-opt such outside members as may be helpful.

One of the largest subjects to be taken under review is that of the future place of women in agriculture, with particular regard to the recommendations made by the Selborne Agricultural Committee. This committee, it may be remembered, drew special attention in their report to "valuable information received from Mrs. Roland Wilkins" in respect to women's village institutes, and the good work they had done during the war towards promoting the better cultivation of gardens and allotments, the collection and distribution of vegetables, and the creation of interest in cooperative agricultural work. The report added that if, as is anticipated, there is a large increase of small holdings and settlement schemes after the war, women's institutes can play a large part in making the settlers contented and the schemes successful. Mrs. Roland Wilkins, referred to by the Selborne Committee, is the chairman of the sub-committee of the Women's Advisory Council which has been given the task of considering the place of women in agriculture. Working with her on the committee are:—Messrs. Strutt and Orwin, Professor Bryner Jones, Miss Macqueen, Lady Gwendolen Guinness, and Miss Gladys Pott, as secretary.

Other questions of importance to women which have been taken in hand by the Women's Advisory Committee include domestic service, health and kindred services for women, the co-ordination of authorities dealing with vocational training for women, and certain questions relating to the position of women in the Civil Service.

Domestic Service Problem.

The scope of the investigations dealing with domestic service referred to the Women's Advisory Committee is "to consider the general conditions in regard to domestic service as affected by the employment of women on war work, and to indicate the general lines on which the available supply of labour for this purpose may be utilized in the best interests of the nation." The inquiry has been divided under four heads:—(1) The training of servants; (2) distribution; (3) home helps (i.e., women employed as helps in the homes of working women not employing a regular servant); (4) organization and conditions of service, upon which, in the first instance, reports will be submitted by committees of experts.

As to health and kindred services, the Women's Committee are considering what extensions of the employment of properly trained and paid women are necessary and possible in connexion with national health work, and kindred services, and what place can be assigned to voluntary workers in this connexion. They are working with Miss Anderson's memorandum on this subject to the Women's Employment Committee as a basis of inquiry. It indicated a large number of different ways in which women might find employment in health and welfare work.

As to the provision of vocational training for women, the Women's Advisory Committee has reported to Dr. Addison on the best methods for co-ordinating, both centrally and locally, and for extending the existing and the proposed provision of training for women.

With regard to women in Government service, the committee has been considering certain points relating to the position of women holding administrative posts in temporary departments, and the possibility of finding permanent openings for such women in the Civil Service.

THE WOMEN WORKERS.

Advisory Committee & Finding of Employment.

Questions of importance to women which have been taken in hand by the Women's Advisory Committee include domestic service, health and kindred services for women, the co-ordination of authorities dealing with vocational training for women, and certain questions relating to the position of women in the Civil Service.

The scope of the investigations dealing with domestic service referred to the Committee is "to consider the general conditions in regard to domestic service as affected by the employment of women on war work and to indicate the general lines on which the available supply of labour for this purpose may be utilised in the best interests of the nation."

The inquiry has been divided under four heads:

(1) The training of servants.
(2) Distribution.
(3) Home Helps (i.e., women employed as helps in the homes of working women not employing a regular servant).
(4) Organisation and conditions of service, upon which in the first instance reports will be submitted by committees of experts

As to health and kindred services, the Women's Committee are considering what extensions of the employment of properly trained and paid women are necessary and possible in connection with national health work and kindred services, and what place can be assigned to voluntary workers in this connection. As to the provision of vocational training for women, the committee has reported to Dr. Addison on the best methods for co-ordinating, both centrally and locally, and for extending the existing and the proposed provision of training for women.

With regard to women in Government service, the committee has been considering certain points relating to the position of women holding administrative posts in temporary departments and the possibility of finding permanent openings for such women in the Civil Service.

1918 December. 701/18 701

Daily News. 18.12.18.

400,000 WAR BRIDES.

Munition Girls' Return to Domestic Life.

The future of the munition girl is at last engaging the attention of the Ministry of Labour. No schemes for training her for industry have yet taken shape, but a suggestion made by the Women's Trade Union League Advisory Committee for an emergency course of domestic training for war brides and fiancées is likely to be adopted by the Government.

According to War Office figures, nearly 400,000 girls have been married to soldiers since the war, and 300,000 of these have no children, and probably no settled homes. The majority of them have probably been engaged on war work for the past few years, and have had no opportunity of obtaining experience of domestic or family life.

The scheme at present before the Demobilisation and Resettlement Committee is an emergency one for a domestic training course for the war brides, or engaged girls who have been discharged from employment and are eligible for the out-of-work grant.

The course will probably be of two classes, residential and non-residential. For the former, centres will be set up in the hostels or canteens of munition areas, and the girls will be given lectures and practical demonstrations in all kinds of domestic work, infant welfare, and sewing. They will live in the hostels and be given a Government maintenance grant approximating in amount to the present out-of-work benefit.

The centres for non-residents will be set up in large towns, so that girls living in their own homes will be enabled to attend the classes. The duration of the course of training will be from three to four months, and all women who have registered themselves as unemployed at the Employment Exchanges will be eligible. A women's sub-committee is also considering a scheme for the resettlement of munition girls in domestic service.

Globe. 17.12.18.

TRANSITION OF EVE.

WAR GIRLS' FUTURE: LABOUR MINISTRY'S PROPOSALS.

MUCH WORK TO DO.

In view of the special problems of re-employment of women war-workers incidental to the transition from war to peace industries, a women's branch of the demobilisation and resettlement department of the Ministry of Labour has been establisihed, and various schemes have already been formulated.

An outline of some interesting proposals planned in connection with re-settlement was given by a woman official of the Ministry at an informal gathering this afternoon. The scheme includes facilities for training women war-workers as home-workers, in domestic arts and sciences necessary for domestic life, and in infant welfare, since it is felt that, owing to the war, large numbers of married women have never set up an independent home, and many girls who are engaged to be married, have, during their three or four years' work in a war-time industry, missed the opportunities of home life. It is also thought that they will be attracted by the scheme, since it provides interest during the period of demobilisation of their men folk.

Community Life Antics.

The scheme includes resident and non-resident trainees. Hostels and canteens used for housing munition workers may be adapted as centres of community life, which has become popular during the war. The non-residential scheme adapted to those who are still in lodgings or live in their parents' houses; and is more applicable to conditions of living in the outskirts of London or the larger towns of the provinces. It is suggested that teachers of domestic economy be drawn from those women teachers who have sought other occupations during the war, and would return to teaching. There would also be an opening for the homely woman, herself an expert in cooking and cleaning in her own home.

Non-Munition Workers.

To the Women's Trade Union Advisory Committee developed from the committee which advised the Ministry of Munitions during the war, will also be added representatives of non-munition industries. Various sub-committees have been formed to deal with questions such as the return of domestic servants to work under new conditions, and the training of women for new industries.

Times. 18.12.18

TRAINING OF "WAR WIVES."

SCHEME FOR DEMOBILIZED WOMEN.

A scheme which is likely to be proposed in the future for the Women's Branch of the Demobilization and Resettlement Department of the Ministry of Labour has certain novel elements.

The scheme is to offer to those women who are now being demobilized and who are the fiancées of or have married soldiers during the war an opportunity to perfect themselves in household accomplishments which will make the homes of the future fit for the ideal family life. The demobilized women who may come under this scheme will be trained in infant welfare and the home arts, either as residents in hostels and canteens, or as external students living at home.

The deduction from the out-of-work donation, or grant made to them while awaiting their re-absorption into labour, is not yet fixed, nor does there seem to be any trustworthy estimate of the number of women who will come under this scheme. There are, however, known to exist 400,000 "war wives," and of these 300,000 have no family. From the latter group the majority of those who will be trained under the new scheme are expected to come. The period of training is likely to be three or four months.

Glasgow Bulletin
19.12.18.

701/19
Daily Sketch
31.12.18

701.

Discharged Women and Peace Work

THE PATRIOTISM OF RETURNING TO PRE-WAR EMPLOYMENT

"MY old firm have asked me to go back as shorthand typist now that the factory has closed down, but I'm not going!" said a girl who was discharged from her engineering war work shortly after the armistice had been signed. "The Employment Exchange say that there isn't any chance of my getting back into a factory like Wark's, but I'm waiting on the off chance. I am going to stick out for the sort of work I want, not what they want to give me—and anyway I shan't starve while they pay me my unemployment money!"

There are many girls—and women too—at the moment who talk and act in the same sort of way, women who apparently fail to grasp the chaotic state of the labour world while the transitionary reconstruction is in process, and who by their shortsightedness may make matters unnecessarily unpleasant for themselves as individuals and for women workers as a whole.

The Wrong Attitude

The "change over" by women workers from war to peace employment is going on all over the country, and in the main it is going on with remarkable facility and smoothness; but it is inevitable that for a time there must be a great excess of women's labour unless women use their proverbial common sense and determine to avoid such a contingency. A great many women who have been, and who are to be, discharged from their particular war work have no real grasp of the position, and look at matters in an entirely wrong light.

The managers of Employment Exchanges and others who are concerned with reconstruction find there is a tendency among discharged women war workers to shake their heads when employment is offered to them if it does not happen to be exactly what they want—they are apt to declare that they will not go back again to the work which they used to do before the war, and generally fail to see that the need for women workers to be patriotic is as great to day as ever it was in the early days of the war, when they rushed to do unaccustomed tasks and to "carry on" in the places of the men.

It is essential for women to understand that the demands of peace and war are vitally different, and they must be ready to do whatever necessary work comes their way, which is within their ability, if they wish to avoid making serious labour difficulties. Now, as in the days of war, it is not so much what a woman wants to do as what she can do, and what must be done by some women. Besides, to touch upon another point which some discharged war workers are inclined to overlook, it is well for women to remember that if from sheer caprice they refuse to take up suitable employment, as judged by their pre-war abilities, they will not continue to be entitled to the donation unemployment insurance.

Women's Work for Women

A woman who has to deal with the demobilisation of some thousands of women told the writer that roughly the discharged workers can be divided into two classes—the women of independent means who "war worked" from purely patriotic motives and the women who before the war were employed in factories, laundries, as domestic workers, or as and so ts and conditions of clerks and typists. With regard to the former, she said, it would undoubtedly simplify matters very much if, during the transition period of reconstruction, wage-earning work was relinquished by all women not dependent upon their earnings, so as to make room for the professional workers. Where the latter class of women is concerned there is little reason for unemployment to exist among capable workers, for the demand for women for women's work is greater than it was in the days before the war.

Skilled women are wanted badly in the textile and clothing industries. Capable laundry workers can pick and choose their jobs. Dressmakers, tailoresses, milliners, and all sorts of needlewomen are at a premium, particularly in view of the fact that many Belgian and French women who have been working at these trades here during the last four years are now going back to their own lands. There is urgent demand, too, for all kinds of domestic workers and waitresses, both in private families and institutions. As for shorthand typists and women clerks, it is only necessary to read the advertisement columns of the daily press to get some idea of the difficulty which employers find in getting trained, capable women to do such work.

The Wisest Course

All these were women's jobs before the war. They are still women's jobs—and women are wanted to do them. They are among the country's industries which must be kept going—by women. Women must realise that the period of reversion to peace-time conditions is bound to be a very trying and difficult one, and they must carry on their splendid record of war service by helping to meet exigencies and by doing the work which needs to be done.

It is in the interests of the whole country, and especially to the welfare of women workers in general, that all discharged women war workers should return wherever possible to their pre-war employments—at any rate until such time as normal peace conditions can be resumed. Employers should offer conditions of such a nature that will encourage women to take this step, and it is up to the women themselves to make an effort to get back to their old work and to realise that if it is not the easiest thing to do it is decidedly the wisest course to take at the moment.

Parliamentary Debates
2.4.'19.

WOMEN WORKERS (UNEMPLOYMENT BENEFIT).

55. Lieutenant-Colonel Lord HENRY CAVENDISH-BENTINCK asked whether, in view of the large number of women workers who are drawing unemployment benefit, and taking into consideration the urgent need for wood and light iron work and other materials necessary for their housing policy, the Government will give in the national factories temporary employment of this character to women workers, thus substituting for a wasteful policy one which meets the national necessity of the time?

Sir R. HORNE: I have been asked to reply to this question. The policy of the Government as to the use of these factories has already been announced, and I have nothing to add in that respect. I am, however, taking all possible steps to stimulate the employment of women in suitable occupations.

ARSENAL GIRLS' PLANS

Adapting Woolwich Workshops To Peace Time Production.

TRANSIT DIFFICULTY.

Dreary Journeys To Town That Keep Women Near Home.

Woolwich Arsenal reopened yesterday after the Christmas respite, and the future of the war-time workers there becomes a problem of immediate urgency.

Even before the war the problem of finding suitable employment for Woolwich women and girls had long been a source of worry to the local Labour Exchange officials, as at that time no female labour was employed in the Royal Arsenal, and the few private firms in the district could only provide work for a small proportion of the local girls, whilst the appalling train service to London, which took nearly an hour to do the ten-mile journey—at a fare of 1s. 2d.—made it difficult for Woolwich girls to take work in the City. And now the problem is so much more difficult that a special committee has been formed to deal with it.

Already some 6,000 out of a total of 26,000 women and girls working in the Government factories and stores at Woolwich have been discharged, the majority being among those who came from other parts of the country during the war.

Few For Domestic Service.

These have mostly been returned to their homes, but the remainder, and many of those who expect their discharges early in January, are giving the local Labour Exchange plenty of work. Here they are given the choice of a diversity of jobs, more especially those of domestic service, shop assistants and waitresses.

Domestic service attracts not one in a thousand, and only a very few have taken such posts in default of anything else turning up.

Positions as shop assistants or waitresses are finding a very fair number of "takers," and whatever the job the girls seem to be taking very philosophically the fact that the high wages of war-time have gone for ever, and they are not "grousing" so much as might have been expected about the smaller earnings which prevail in other occupations.

Soldiers' Wives Not Seeking Fresh Work.

Many of the Woolwich munition workers are soldiers' wives, and the majority of these are not seeking fresh employment, but are returning to their homes in readiness for their husbands' return. Apart from these the majority of the girls, many of whom had not been out to work before the war, are desirous of continuing to earn a living for themselves.

One section which provides special difficulties are the girls who went straight from school to the Arsenal, and who, consequently, have no knowledge of any work other than the making of munitions. For these girls a special three - months' course of training at the Woolwich Polytechnic has been arranged, the subjects including clerical work, shorthand, and typing, dressmaking, and domestic work. During this course the girls are to be paid out-of-work donation at the rate of 12s. 6d. per week. Already about 150 of the younger girls have taken up this training.

Adapting Arsenal To Peace-Time Production.

Strenuous efforts are also being made to influence the Government to adapt the machinery in some of the largest workshops in the Arsenal for the manufacture of peace-time products of national utility, in order both to utilise the machinery and to retain in employment the many thousands of girls who, through working on these machines for two or three years, have become skilled operatives on such machines.

It is estimated that in this way at least 10,000 local girls could be retained in regular employment—provided only that the Government will keep them well supplied with large orders for work.

One thing is certain; very few Woolwich girls will take on work in London offices under present conditions, as the return railway fare is now 1s. 9d., while the alternative routes by 'bus or tram-car involve the spending of nearly three hours a day in travelling to and from work.

Evening Standard 9.1.19

"SLACKERS" WITH STATE PAY.

EX-MUNITIONEERS WHO REFUSE WORK TO BE DEALT WITH.

FIRMER ACTION.

EXPECTING LUXURY DAYS OF WAR-TIME TO GO ON.

Thousands of girls and young women, chiefly from the closed-down munition factories in London and the provinces, are out of work. By the terms of the Government scheme they can remain out for work for 13 weeks and receive 25s. a week during that period if they keep in touch with the Labour Bureau and seek work.

"But," said a high authority to an "Evening Standard" representative to-day, "thousands of them are not in any hurry while they are receiving 25s. weekly. The employment agencies are deluged with mistresses' applications for housemaids, cooks, generals, charwomen, and the like.

"Large numbers of these munitioneers were in domestic service before 'their country needed them.' They are exceedingly loth to go back to what is looked upon as the drudgery of domestic work, with its restrictions.

Want Luxurious Days to Continue.

"Their wages have run up to £2 and £3 a week. Fur coats, high-topped kid boots, gramophones, every night off, and Sundays in many cases free, have given them higher moral and not readily, especially with weekly gifts of 25s. for walking to the employment exchanges, are they going to take on the shackles of domestic work.

"But this has been brought to the notice of the Government, and I am in a position to say that there is to be a tightening up. In fact it has begun, and things are not going to be so easy. No new machinery is to be set up—only the machinery in existence is to be speeded.

Referees for Slackers.

"At present in or near all centres there is a local committee of referees, usually consisting of a local legal man or man of quasi-legal training, with two others To them all cases of slacking will be referred, as has been the case, but they will be regarded with a larger microscope.

"Thus, if the officer or officers at employment agencies are convinced that Mary, Phyllis, or Margaret, late of the local projectile factory at 45s. a week, and formerly Mrs. Ponsonby's parlourmaid at £20 a year, is determined to walk about at 25s. a week for 13 weeks, and will not go to Mrs. This, That, or the Other, who badly wants a parlourmaid, who will give, say, £30—then the 25s. will be more quickly disallowed.

A Court of Appeal.

"If Mary thinks that hard, she can appeal, and her case will come, as before, to the final court of appeal—Mr. Yates, in London.

"The whole subject is causing much anxiety. For instance, last Saturday £10,000 was paid to 9000 out-of-work young women at Sheffield. On Saturday next that number will be swollen to 14,000. At centres like Ipswich, Birmingham, Wolverhampton, Dudley, Bristol, and Gloucester thousands are walking about at 25s. a week, while the employment agencies are positively howling for domestic servants.

Time for Action.

"From the employment agencies come reports which have decided the authorities that the slacking of women has gone far enough; hence the tightening of the screw. Where tentative acceptances of domestic work have been made, the wages asked have been—

£35 for a cook
£30 for a housemaid
4s. a day for charwomen,

to give typical cases.

"In one agency a girl, after refusing work, turned to her companion, also out of work, and not ready for it, and said, 'Come along, Poll, we've got eight weeks more.' That spirit is rife, and I think the authorities now quietly mean business."

Daily Chronicle 21.12.18

OUT-OF-WORK WOMEN.

TROUBLE PREDICTED UNLESS STATE GIVES PROMPT HELP.

TRAINING FOR PEACE JOBS NEEDED

"The out-of-work war women will not be quiet after Christmas. There will be trouble with them for certain unless something is done.

"Just now their men relatives are coming home on 12 days' leave, and they have the Christmas merry-making to think about.

"They have been working exceedingly hard for years, and they think, after what they have done, they should be properly looked after."

This serious statement was made by a woman well-qualified to speak on women's work in industry in peace and war, to a "Daily Chronicle" representative who went to her for a plain statement of the position of the women who have been turning out Britain's munitions of war.

Asked to amplify her statement and to give her reasons for making it, this well-informed woman said:—

"There has been such a lot of talk, but nothing is being done.

"I regard the appointment of Sir Eric Geddes as co-ordinator of departments concerned with demobilisation as the most hopeful thing which has happened so far as these women are concerned since the armistice was signed. I sincerely hope he is to concern himself with women as well as men.

WOMEN'S FOUR POINTS.

"Four things I ask for emphatically on behalf of the women who have done the very best they could for their country:—

1. That women with real inside knowledge of the problems facing the ex-munition worker should be consulted.
2. That schemes shall not be placed before the women unless they are practical and likely to be carried out.
3. That there shall be adequate training for dismissed war-workers, so that every one of them shall have a chance of earning a decent livelihood.
4. That there shall be a survey of the industrial field, carried out in a definite manner, with a view to ascertaining how far industries opening up under post-war conditions can provide industrial careers for the women.

"The maintenance grant," continued the speaker, "I consider to be adequate as a temporary measure. The women can just live on it. But they don't want to be maintained. They want work, and work quickly.

"For the most part the munition women have not received sufficient technical training in the course of their war work for them to be enabled to go directly to adequately paid peace work—and all this, of course, apart from the trade union pledges difficulty, which will have to be settled sooner or later. My own idea is that post-war industry will develop to such an extent that there will be room for the replacement of every man who left industry for war, and for the absorption of vast numbers of women as well.

THE HANDY GIRL.

"A great many Government factories are now empty. Why should they not be utilised as training centres?

"I would suggest that girls wishing to qualify for domestic work (and in my opinion many more women would qualify for domestic work if it offered better conditions) should be trained in housewifery, cookery, laundry, mending, and should attend general utility classes to fit them to know how to deal with such matters as a broken sash-cord or roller-blind, a damaged kettle, and small carpentry repairs."

THE FUTURE OF THE SHELL GIRLS.

Very Few Are Going Back To "Cap And Apron."

TO KILL DRUDGERY.

Birmingham Scheme For Training Of Home-makers.

Everybody agrees that the splendid army of munition girls, their contribution to winning the war completed, has a very strong claim upon employers and the public generally now that they are reappearing as applicants for work. In Birmingham there are at the present time at least 7,000 who have signed the unemployment books at the Labour Exchange. What is to be the future of these girls?

Miss Julia Varley, the senior woman organiser of the Workers' Union, giving the Daily Sketch's Birmingham correspondent her views in an interview, admits that the situation was an anxious one, but she believes that with the scientific organisation of industry and the better understanding between employers and employed which has been fostered during the war a way out will be found.

Miss Varley is greatly interested in a scheme which is under consideration by the Women's Trade Union Advisory Committee for encouraging pre-war domestic servants to return to that calling.

Encouragement For Domestics.

"Our aim," Miss Varley said, "is to turn a C3 nation into a A1 nation, and we want to do what we can to create home makers.

"Since the war began there has been little opportunity for girls to learn the most rudimentary rules of housewifery, and the scheme contemplated would establish centres in all the big cities where girls who wished to do so might receive practical training in cookery and all the domestic sciences.

"In the old days, if a girl could not get a job, we said, 'There is always domestic service.' Too often these girls received poor wages, and became little more than drudges. We want to raise the status of domestic service, and we cannot do that without making the job worth while. We shall insist on a minimum wage, and a reasonable standard of living conditions generally."

Miss Varley added that the proposed scale of wages for indoor servants was 6s. weekly for girls of 16 years of age: 8s. for girls of 17; and 10s. a week for girls of 18 and over. The programme also included a proposal that all girls should be allowed two hours' freedom each day, to be arranged by mutual agreement with the mistress; and an annual holiday of a fortnight.

Back To Chocolate And Tobacco.

In and around Bristol the demobilisation of women workers from the munition factories is proceeding slowly, so that it is early yet to make any hazard as to what is likely to happen.

A number of girls who were employed in pre-war days in the cotton, chocolate, tobacco, corset and other factories employing female labour, which abound in Bristol, have been re-absorbed into their old occupations. The change-over has been made without a hitch, though often ruefully when comparison is made with the wages now and then.

Speaking generally, domestic service is "napoo." The girls are by no means keen. The Local Advisory Committee has formed a special women's committee to try to make domestic service more attractive and to standardise the conditions.

There is a little mystery about Sheffield's munition girls. When hostilities ceased there were about 15,000 women and girls engaged on shell and other munition work, and the majority have worked out their notices.

Comparatively few have registered themselves as unemployed or claimed the out-of-work pay, for the payment of which special exchanges in different parts of the city and district had been opened.

Where are the shell girls? Their overalls repose disconsolately in the stores at the shell factories; their unemployment pay is still counted out and enveloped in the exchanges awaiting claimants.

Returning To Former Employment.

Very few have gone back to domestic service, in spite of plaintive appeals in advertisements from registry offices. The domestic servant who turned shell-worker has a grievance that she is now classed as a domestic servant, and her unemployment pay ceases if she declines to take a domestic post. Many say they do not intend to go back to the cap and apron.

Another explanation of the mystery is that many have returned to their former employment in the silver and electro-plate factories, where there are enormous arrears of orders on the books.

The girls have realised their opportunity, and are now working at their old occupations at much higher wages than were paid before. Their earnings are about 30 to 40 per cent. lower than in the shell factories, where overtime, meal-time pay, and week-end working enabled them to add considerably to the standard wage.

Women's Prospects In Leeds.

There are three unemployment exchanges established in Leeds for dealing with the women and girls who have been demobilised from the various munitions factories in and around the city, and the staffs at these exchanges are fully occupied daily in paying the out-of-work benefit.

Inquiries show that for the most part the women are eager to resume work in the local factories, and it is anticipated that the bulk of them will readily be absorbed in the textile, boot and leather, and ready-made clothing industries as soon as these trades swing back to full work on ordinary peace-time employment.

In the textile industries the serious shortage of raw materials is likely to militate against the women's chances of regular employment for some little time yet.

Any Job Except "Domestic Service."

The large number of girls thus thrown on the labour market is not likely to materially assist in solving the domestic servant problem. Wages are too low, but the chief factor which sets the girls against domestic service is what they regard as the loss of their freedom, and most of them who visit the Labour Exchanges express themselves as willing to tackle any job "except domestic service."

Here and there girls have signified their willingness to take up domestic service, but they ask anything from 10s. to £1 weekly in wages, as well as their board and lodging, and such rates are naturally prohibitive.

Sheffield Telegraph 10. 1. 19

701

701/22

Observer 12. 1. 19

Sheffield Women's Work.

Sheffield, from what I hear, gives more openings for women's labour than any other town in the country just now. In fact, there is soon to be practically no unemployment there. It is indeed true, as a London paper states tonight, that last Saturday 9,000 girls discharged from munition work drew out-of-work pay in Sheffield, and that next Saturday 14,000 will receive it there. But that is below what is generally expected, and below the rate for other munition towns. They say that the munition women will not go back to domestic service, considering that they have a right to 25s. a week for 13 weeks. But no girl can continue to claim the money if she refuses suitable employment, and the ruling is that domestic service is suitable employment to any girl who before she entered a munition factory was a domestic servant. Should a former housemaid fail to apply at a "situation" which the Employment Exchange recommends, or should she refuse it without good reason, she will lose her out-of-work pay.

WOMEN AND WORK.

Reports from Germany state that women in that country who have obtained employment during the war on the railways or the tramways are refusing, now that their services are no longer required, to go back to housework. They have experience of other kinds of employment, and they are determined, if possible, not to return to their old lot. This is the case also with women in England. They are being discharged from the munition factories, and they are, as far as possible, obtaining other similar employment. But they will not even look at domestic service, and it is doubtful whether they will ever do so, until all the conditions of service have been changed. It is interesting to know that some thousands of the girls who have been employed on the land are now trying to obtain small holdings of their own. They like work on the land, and they think they can make it profitable. If the Government will only provide the land, many of the land girls are prepared to work it. It looks, therefore, as if the demand for small holdings, both for men and women, will in the near future be very large. This, we are convinced, will be a good thing, if only sensible men and women are settled upon the land. Nearly everything depends upon this.

Sheffield Telegraph 1. 18

Bradford Weekly Telegraph 25. 4. 19.

WORK AND WORKERS.

Male and Female Employment in Sheffield.

Since the opening of the new year unemployment, chiefly among women, has undergone a striking increase, and the number of persons drawing benefit at the present time is about 7,500. This is, however, considerably below the total that was estimated at the time hostilities ceased. There is reason to believe that a good many on the list are the reverse of desirous of getting jobs. There is a glut of typists of the inferior sort and very few openings. Domestic service would absorb a large number, but this kind of employment is distinctly unpopular. A fairly large proportion of the munitions women have gone into other trades, and it is estimated that during the course of the next few weeks the works will be seeking more female labour. Unemployment benefit lasts 13 weeks.

The Government order with respect to the payment of wages during holidays, exceeding the usual holiday stoppage, has brought a vast amount of clerical work to the unemployment bureaux. It has been decided that the normal Christmas stoppage is one week, and all men and women who had to exceed that period are to be paid for the extra days of idleness. More than 20,000 applications for this benefit have come in already and there are many more to follow.

It is interesting to know that male labour is scarce, and that peace time work cannot be dealt with in reasonable time for the want of men. Orders in some departments are abundant. All the employers are crying out for men from the Army. The applications by employers for soldiers for whom jobs are open amount to many thousands. Demobilisation is now being speeded up. A certain number of workers have returned to their old occupations and more than 8,000 individual applications for release from the men themselves have been approved by the military authorities. These are to be released as quickly as possible and their gradual return should begin next week. The actual demobilisation of the army, of course, does not begin for a week or two.

The local labour situation is greatly disturbed by the introduction of the 47-hours week. All sorts of objections are being raised to it. Some of the men want an interval between breakfast and the dinner hour for a snack, and others are asking for a still shorter day. The change, it is stated, will prove inconvenient and wasteful of fuel and time in those steel works where the processes are continuous and which deal with hot metal. What the men intend to do is not yet known definitely, but the local members of the Amalgamated Society of Engineers will discuss the matter at a meeting to be held shortly, when they will probably come to some decision.

THINNING OF WOMEN WAR WORKERS.

A Yorkshireman's Preference.

Day by day the ranks of the women "war-workers" are becoming thinned as the men come back and take up again their former employment. A week or so ago the last of the conductresses on the Bradford trams were replaced by returning warriors, and the other day we welcomed back our postmen, who left us four years ago to serve His Majesty's Government in a more strenuous field of endeavour. During his absence our letters have been brought to us by a post lady.

It is some time since we observed in the Bradford streets the picturesque lady window-cleaners, whose costumes, it may be remembered, excited quite a lot of comment when the women first assumed the masculine nether garment. But they did the work quite as well as the men, and used to wipe out the corners of the window panes very carefully.

Of course, in an industrial centre like Bradford, one does not have an opportunity of seeing the besmocked land-girls at work, but there used to be a fair sprinkling of feminine khaki in the streets. But even they seem to be passing through the demobilising machine, and we see the W.A.A.C.'s and the W.R.E.N.'s and the W.R.A.F. less frequently than a few months ago.

One sees the same thing at the railway stations. Up to the time when the Germans cried "Hold! Enough! the railway stations were staffed almost entirely by women—women porters, women ticket collectors and clerks, and women carriage cleaners.

And they proved themselves quite equal to the work, too. At one of the Bradford stations there was one stalwart Amazon who would shoulder a heavy case or lift a portmanteau with an ease which might well have excited the admiration of a professional weight-lifter.

One hard-headed Yorkshireman, when asked for his opinion, said he much preferred the women porters to the men. Further inquiry, however, showed that the reason for this preference was not due to his gallantry, but to the fact that whereas in the old days a porter expected a tip for services rendered, as a matter of course, a woman didn't.

As for the women who have been cleaning the carriages during the war, there are many travellers who assert that the trains have never been so clean, and the windows so transparent before.

We do not intend to commit ourselves.

As the men return to their former duties the women at the stations are becoming fewer.

But it is likely to be a long time yet before there will be enough men available to replace all the women who have been doing their work during the war.

WOMEN AND PRE-WAR WORK.

ARE THEY GOING BACK TO IT?

"The women," says "The Times" correspondent at Coblentz, "refuse to resume their pre-war status in the community." They decline to go back to house-work, and they are trying to retain the tramway and other municipal service work which has fallen to them during the war. Are there any signs of a similar tendency in this country?

A good deal has been heard about the dearth of servants, even now that the munitions staffs are being demobilised, but it is not the case, as is commonly believed, that that is the result of the unemployed Government allowance of 25s. a week. As a matter of fact, the unemployment benefit is for those women only who have no work to go to. It cannot be obtained by women who are offered and refuse what is considered to be a fair job. Any dispute on this point is a matter for settlement by the Court of Referees.

There were at the end of the war about a million and a half more women in employment than at the beginning. That something between a hundred and fifty and two hundred thousand, according to the latest return, should be unemployed is not considered a disquieting figure considering the rapid process of demobilisation from the factories.

A large proportion of the girls in munition factories were formerly domestic servants. According to an official census taken in one large group they formed twenty-five per cent. of the whole number of women employed. Are they now returning to domestic service? The answer is that where mistresses are offering good wages and comfortable conditions they are; but the supply has by no means caught up with the demand.

Many reasons induced women to change their occupation during the war. Some were purely patriotic reasons. Others were due rather to the higher remuneration and the greater freedom that were offered. The old conditions, with their long hours of duty, were often very irksome, and where these conditions at their worst remain unchanged the reluctance to return to them is strong.

Taking the country through, it is found that the number of registrations for service in hotels exceeds the demand. The reason is that the work for servants in hotels is better organised than in many private houses, and that it is good and efficient organisation for which women are seeking. In the case of charwomen the registration about equals the demand, and, in spite of the fact that certain laundries in London cannot get the maids they want, the general experience throughout the country is that registration for laundry work slightly exceeds the demand.

The return to factories is depending to a great extent upon the attitude of the trade unions, who have still to decide the position of the woman dilutee, the woman, that is, who is employed on man's work. Until the point is decided it is felt that there will not be very much opening for women in trade factories, though ultimately there will be room enough. The number of women who left these factories for munition-making during the war was nearly as great as that of domestic servants. Many firms have not discharged their women. The chemical trades, for example, are keeping them practically all on; the electrical works are still employing them; and many of the factories that have been making a rapid change from war to peace conditions are reabsorbing their women.

It is also a fact worth recording that a large number of women to whom unemployment policies were issued a month or two ago are no longer drawing their allowance. They have either returned to their former occupation or they have found others. The general tendency, in fact, has been, after the first few weeks' holiday on leaving the munition factory, for the women to look round for work again.

Weekly Irish Times Dublin 1.11.19

701/23

Hampshire Telegraph 28.3.19

701

DUBLIN LADIES' WAR WORK.

The final meeting of the lady workers connected with the Central Red Cross Workrooms was held at 64 Merrion square, Dublin, on Monday, the Lady Talbot de Malahide, President, in the chair.

Among those present were:—Mrs. Greer, Mrs. Barker, Mrs. Horace Law, Mr. Denis R. Pack Beresford, Mr. and Mrs. Maconchy, Mr. and Mrs. Gamble, Miss Cusack, Miss Seeds (Hon. Secretary), Mrs. Franks, Mrs. West, Mrs. Mooney, Miss MacNeile, Miss Shaw, etc.

The Right Hon. Sir John Ross said that in the summer of 1917 these premises were taken, and established as central workrooms. They had to acknowledge their indebtedness to Mr. Hayes, who put that fine house at their disposal, and to Mrs. Greer, but for whose devotion to the cause the great services he was about to detail would never have been achieved. Miss Cusack was also a most efficient helper, while Mrs. Franks had given invaluable services as Hon. Secretary, as had also the heads of the departments, including Mrs. Franks, Miss MacNeile, Mrs. Latimer, and Miss Minchin. He would simply give a statement of statistics covering the period since the Central Workrooms were removed to 64 Merrion square. These were the only workrooms in the United Kingdom that did cutting out to supply the workrooms elsewhere. From September 12th 1917, to December 31st, 1918, there had been 223,040 yards (equalling 126¼ miles) of flannel cut out in the cutting-out rooms, which had realised 58,924 garments. Of this number 18,186 had been made in the Central Workrooms alone. The remaining 40,738 garments had been despatched to the 174 different work parties. During the last six months alone, there had been over 41 miles of flannel cut out in the cutting-out rooms. The following number of garments had been made during that period in the Central Workrooms. Pyjamas, 1,250; vests, 503; pants, 365; day shirts, 456; helpless case shirts, 289; night shirts, 381; making a total of 3,244 garments made from July 1st last to December 31st. To this should be added an average of forty pairs of slippers a week. A more economic establishment than theirs had never existed. It was hardly any expense to the Government or the great funds in the country—it was through the liberality of the workers themselves that the establishment had done most for the cause. Donations and sales at the central workrooms realised £176 7s. 4d., the sale of baby clothes realised £33 14s. 10d., and the proceeds of the Whitsuntide Fair were £331 1s. 10d., while the cost of installation and equipment, including canteen equipment, was only £308 1s. 6d., which meant that they had £240 over expenses. (Applause.) As to waste from the cutting out of flannel, baby clothes for poor children were made from the clippings and cuttings left over from the Red Cross garments. They were sold, and the money given to the Red Cross Fund. This idea was started by Mrs. Adam in June, 1917, and had been carried on since, with the result that £60 8s. 4d. had been realised in the six months from June to December, 1918. Much praise was due to Mrs. Latimer, who was in charge of the canteen, and who had not only furnished all that was required of her, but had made a gross profit of £130 8s. (Applause.) He hoped that in case of all houses where such great work was being done, like Nos. 64 and 40 Merrion square, that they would be able to set up in bronze a plaque on the wall to show the noble work these ladies had rendered.

WOMEN WHO WILL NOT WORK.

Between 150,000 and 200,000 women, mostly war workers, are unemployed. Of these about 25,000 are in Greater London. "Hardly any of them need be out of work if they would accept the work available," said a Ministry of Labour official.

At the Employment Exchange at Shepherd's Bush, a typical munition area, the majority of the women registered about 3,500—before the war were laundry hands or domestic servants. Almost all have registered as "factory" hands, knowing that the Exchange cannot offer them all factory work, and their out-of-work pay must therefore continue. If they had registered in their pre-war employment work would be found for them before the ink could dry, for there is an enormous demand for laundry hands and domestic workers.

"In the munition factory," said a woman laundry hand, "I earned more money, but, best of all, I had regular hours. That is what appeals to me. Until I get similar work I am content to have a holiday on the Government's 25s. a week."

At West End Exchanges the number of resident unemployed is not large, but outsiders, who come from other parts of London to find work in the magic quarter of Regent street and Bond street, swell the number. Employers are crying out for dressmakers and milliners, and there is a large demand for waitresses and domestic servants. A girl, a dressmaker before the war, refused employment at a 50 per cent. increase of pay. She said that she had received £3 a week in a factory.

Over 6,000 demobilised women munition workers are drawing out-of-work benefit at Leeds. They refuse to do domestic service.

WOMEN'S RETURN TO CIVIL WORK.

701

Unfair Charge of "Holiday" Slackers.

Complaints have been made that demobilised munition workers are making "holiday" with the State unemployment pay, and are not seeking other employment as quickly as they might do. While this charge may be well founded in some instances, it is unfair to the general mass of munition workers.

Latest returns obtainable show that of the total number of demobilised employees who have received State unemployment pay since Nov. 25 the following have ceased to claim it:

Men	44 per cent.
Boys	25 per cent.
Women	28 per cent.
Girls	42 per cent.

It is assumed that these workers have been re-absorbed by industries which have turned from war to peace work.

NEED FOR RAW MATERIAL.

Every week adds to the list of demobilised workers, but concurrently with the increase in the discharges there is a steady, if slower, reabsorption into private industry. Two factors militating against a speedier reabsorption are the needs for raw materials and more pivotal men. The one is a matter of ships and the other chiefly one of Army demobilisation. As supplies of both are forthcoming in greater quantities and numbers, more openings will be created for employment of both men and women. In the case of the engineering and allied trades, however, the question of the employment of women, it is pointed out, depends almost entirely upon the attitude of the trade unions in regard to the dilutees.

DOMESTIC SERVICE.

Meanwhile, domestic service and laundry work remain the most unsatisfied sources of employment. In regard to the former, mistresses have begun to realise that, after the liberty enjoyed by their former domestic servants while on munition work, they will not return to the long hours and drudgery of pre-war service. Instances are reported of mistresses who have shortened the hours and increased the wages of servants they have re-engaged.

"The loneliness of the life," said one authority yesterday, "is a greater deterrent than the wages. This, however, might to some extent be overcome if the domestic servants were given more regular hours and more evenings free, and if at the same time the many girls' clubs founded during the war were continued as peace-time institutions to which the girls could resort for recreation and enjoyment."

MUNITION GIRLS.

Many munition girls, members of the W.A.A.C.s and sister services, have expressed a desire to emigrate to the Dominions, but all except wives, and later the fiancées, of overseas soldiers will be unable to book passages for at least a year on account of the demand for available shipping for returning soldiers to their homes. The various emigration agencies will then, it is stated, provide assisted passages for women who are prepared to go out as household helps in the towns and on the farms in the Dominions. Preference will then be given to women who can give a reference showing that they have been engaged in domestic service or are able to undertake the work. "Those who wish to emigrate, and cannot find employment elsewhere," said an authority yesterday, "might consider the advisability of taking up temporary occupations as domestic servants."

TRADES COUNCIL MATTERS.

Women in the Dockyard.

There was a full meeting of the Trades and Labour Council yesterday week, Mr. A. G. Gourd taking the chair. — A letter from the Admiral Superintendent re the discharge of women from the Dockyard, explaining that much trouble was taken in ascertaining that the necessitous cases were retained as long as possible, had been considered by the Executive, who recommended that a public meeting be held on this question.—This was moved by Mrs. Toms, and seconded by Mr. Porter, and it provoked much discussion. Mr. Britton said the Crafts Union had pressed for the discharge of the women in accordance with the Admiralty agreement. Men were returning day after day, and must be restored to their old positions. On behalf of the Workers' Union, Mr. Cowell said they wished the Admiralty to extend the time of employment for widows who had no other means of subsistence, of whom there were about 24 in the yard.—Mr. Durman pointed out that a quantity of work has been put out to contract which the women could do in the Yard. This would not affect the Crafts Unions at all. In the drawing office it had been decided to retain a number of lady tracers. Those were not widows but mostly daughters of officials. The Chairman said there was an enormous amount of sweating going on in Portsmouth and other Dockyard towns through sub-letting. He did not believe there had been any increase in the making of the garments of Marines etc., since the outbreak of war. The women should be employed direct by the Admiralty for this work at a standard rate of wage, instead of being employed by contractors at sweated wages. He considered the best thing to be done was to organise a meeting, asking the Admiralty to extend the Colour Loft, and to set up machinery whereby women could be employed directly on the making of clothing.—It was decided unanimously to support the recommendation of the Executive.

WOMEN WORKERS.

LABOUR MINISTRY DEPUTATION.

Sir Robert Horne, Minister of Labour, received a deputation on Wednesday representing the National Federation of General Workers, and the National Federation of Women Workers.

The deputation was introduced by Mr. J. R. Clynes, M.P., who explained the conditions and the present position of the women workers, and said the Government should take immediate steps to organise schemes of useful work and training for women, and also continue unemployment benefit for the whole period during which women were out of work.

Sir Robert Horne, replying, said the country was going through a very severe trial. He regarded the situation as far more difficult than any with which they were confronted during the war. In some respects, he added, it is full of dangers just as great, and things might very well happen at the present time which would inflict as severe an injury upon the country as a military defeat at certain stages in the war would have caused. The Government, he said, was not unsympathetic with regard to the hardship of women.

If the Government started to compete with private enterprise when it was so shaken and nervous, that would deter manufacturers from enterprises they were prepared to carry on, and that would make unemployment even worse. The present state of unrest was a great deterrent. "You hardly realise that the state of Europe is a great anxiety to anybody who cares anything for our civilisation. Do not imagine this Government can control great forces of the world which at the present time are inimical to the improvement of the condition of unemployment."

Daily News
20. 1. 19

DEMOBILISED CIVIL SERVICE WOMEN.

130,000 to be Involved in a Few Months.

Within the next three or four months the women clerks in many Government and municipal offices will receive their notices to quit. The number of those likely to be demobilised has been estimated from a comparison of Government figures at approximately 130,000.

Miss Evans, secretary of the Association of Women Clerks and Secretaries, explaining the position on Saturday, said that representations had been made to the Civil War Workers' Committee of the Ministry of Reconstruction in regard to the position of the demobilised women clerks, but no action had yet been taken in the matter. "When the girls are discharged," she said, "the market will be overstocked with semi-trained clerical workers, whose experience has given them no useful qualifications for the class of work demanded in business firms. They will be in a worse position than the munition girls, who can draw 25s. a week benefit, because the bulk of them will not be discharged until after May 25, when the grant will be discontinued. The head of an L.C.C. department told me the other day that he had under him 200 women clerks doing satisfactorily the work of 300 men. When I asked if they were to be kept on he said he had not considered the matter."

Referring to the subject of wages, Miss Evans said a University girl who had been receiving a good salary as a junior administrator had recently asked the head of her department what was to happen to her when she was demobilised. "You will be lucky if you get 30s. a week," was the reply. "Others have to put up with it, and so will you."

Miss Evans added that she felt the girls were entitled to receive the Government unemployment benefit while they were seeking fresh employment.

A mass meeting of women clerks is to be held at the Caxton Hall to-morrow evening at 6.30 to discuss the question, and among the points raised will be the need of opening all branches of the Civil Service to women, including the first class. Mr. Carmichael, of the London Trades Council, will take the chair, and the speakers will be leading members of the Women Clerks' and Secretaries' Association.

Times
19. 4. 19.

MORE WOMEN OUT OF WORK.

REABSORPTION RATES.

The total number of unemployed persons whose out-of-work donation policies remained lodged at employment exchanges on March 28 and had been signed within the preceding six days, was 1,060,245. Of these, 753,982 were for civilians and 306,263 were for demobilized members of the Forces. Two-thirds of the civilians were women and girls. A rise at the end of March in the number of women's policies lodged was largely due to conditions in the cotton and jute trades.

An analysis given in the Labour Gazette of 1,050,449 of the policies lodged on March 28 shows that the duration of payments in 193,722 cases had ranged from 61 to 120 days; in 739,077 cases the duration had been less than 60 days; and in 117,650 cases policies had been lodged, but no payments had been made.

The number of policies on which reduced donation was being paid after the expiry of the first period of 13 weeks was 23,666. Nearly two-thirds of the extended policies are held by women, a large proportion of which is attributable to the fact that discharge of women from munition works took place more rapidly after the Armistice than discharge of men. Noteworthy improvements in the reabsorption percentages for civilians were recorded in March, while the percentage for demobilized men remained steady at about 80 per cent. The largest numbers of unemployed men and women are found in the engineering and ironfounding, building, transport, and textile trades, and among general labourers.

Nottingham Journal & Express. 1. 1. 19

WOMEN WORKERS.

Employment Outlook in Nottingham.

MANY OPENINGS.

The question of the re-employment of local women war-workers, thrown on the market by the cessation of hostilities, seems gradually to be nearing a solution.

As far as the clerical war-workers are concerned, they are for the most part being drafted to other Government departments. With industrial workers the question is rather different. The shock of the armistice, and the natural closing of the big munition contracts threw a large number of women temporarily out of work. In addition many women, experienced for the greater part, had during the war been drafted to other centres, and with the closing down of works returned to Nottingham. The result was a temporary large displacement of labour, which it is hoped will remain but temporary.

To cope with the larger volume of work, and for greater ease in working the women's department, the Employment Exchange has been transferred with its staff and able chief, Miss Macarthur, to the Mechanics Institute, which is much more central than the premises in Stanford street.

First Come, First Served.

Now that Christmas is over, there will probably be much re-employment of women war-workers. Several large local firms have realised the advantage of getting the pick of the industrial market and have already substantially enlarged their staffs in view of developments. Some hundreds of local women workers are already in new employment. The early demobilisation of pivotal men in the different industries will lead in many cases to enlarged staffs of workpeople, and employers would be well advised not to wait till the best women have gone, but to show enterprise and get efficient staffs now in anticipation of the return of these men. Here, as elsewhere, the first comers are best served.

While female labour locally is at present plentiful, work for women is also fairly abundant. The war contracts in hosiery have not been cancelled, nor those in the shirt trade. How long, of course, this plentitude of work will continue is uncertain; but no falling off in orders is anticipated especially in the hosiery trade, as the stock of hose and underwear in the country is extraordinary low owing to the fact that manufacturers, during the war, have concentrated mainly on Government orders.

Lace Trade Quiet.

As far as the lace trade is concerned there is a temporary slump. Orders, in some cases, in anticipation of lowered prices, are being held up. Here, there is no immediate demand for female labour.

In the blouse trade, i.e., the making-up branch, there is a great shortage of labour. Practically every firm is understaffed, and can take on any amount of women and girls.

The outlook for unemployed women war-workers in Nottingham is brighter than in centres where the staple industries need male, rather than female, labour.

Globe
3. 4. 19

PRIVATE WOMEN'S LAND ARMY.

It is understood that the Women's Land Army will be demobilised as a Government force at the end of the coming autumn, but that it is kilely to remain on a private basis. More than 6,000 women wish to remain on the land, as against about 3,500 who prefer other employment. The demand for women workers is so brisk that the supply of horse-women and milkers particularly is quite unequal to it.

701/24
Times
20. 1. 19

CHARTER FOR WORKING WOMEN.

FEARS OF EXPLOITATION.

The National Federation of Women Workers is arranging a meeting to be held at the Albert Hall in a few weeks' time, at which demobilized women munition workers will present a series of resolutions embodying a charter outlining rates of fair pay and fair conditions of work.

There is considerable discontent among the demobilized women at what, in women's trade union circles, is regarded as an effort to exploit the unemployed women on badly paid domestic service and sweated laundry work, and to mislead public opinion into believing that the out-of-work women who refuse to accept £26 or £30 a year for domestic work and 17s. or 18s. a week in a laundry are having a cheap holiday at the country's expense. The greater number of the women engaged on making munitions were not, it is stated, drawn from those employed in either of these forms of labour, and they do not feel that it would be any more reasonable to expect them to adopt them now than it would be to expect an unemployed man, whatever his previous employment, to become a dock labourer or a road sweeper. An instance of the kind of thing which is complained of is said to have occurred at Leeds, where a woman with a university training previously engaged on important munition work was offered by a Labour Exchange a job as a road sweeper. There was a case recently in a London suburb of a woman who had maintained her family of three children during the war by munition work, employing another woman to look after the children during her absence from home. When demobilization came she was entitled to 25s. a week plus 12s. for her children, and could have managed on this as she had no longer to employ another woman to look after her children. The Labour Exchange, however, offered her a job at 24s. a week, and as it was impossible for her on this wage to maintain her children and pay someone to mind them she refused. Her out-of-work grant and allowances were immediately stopped and she is now almost penniless. Yet another case is that of a woman munition worker with many claims upon her, who for some time before demobilization had been earning 8s. extra a week for two hours' work each evening by taking the tickets at a cinema house. When her munition work stopped she was refused the 25s. grant because of the 8s. she was still earning at the cinema. Her case was brought before the Court of Referees and she lost it.

Croydon Times
16. 3. 18

Their Business Way.

The National Federation of Women Workers illustrated their business ability at Dennett Hall on Wednesday. They are not satisfied, for one thing, with the present methods for dealing with the problem of demobilisation. They think there is too much shilly-shallying with the question, so instead of following the example of the men folk in useless spouting without action, they have formulated a programme and button-holed a nice little bunch of 30 M.P.'s at the House of Commons. Men folk would probably have passed a resolution on the subject, ordered copies of it to be sent, etc. There seems to be more initiative, more sustained power, and more constructive ability about women than in the generality of mankind. We shall find this out in the future, and, in my own humble opinion, it will not be a bad thing for us, either.

The 10d. Jump.

FROM WAR TO PEACE.

TRANSITION IN ENGINEERING INDUSTRY.

(By Our Local Correspondents.)

The following are reports on the progress made and the difficulties encountered in the change-over from war to peace conditions in various centres of engineering industry :—

NORTH-EAST COAST.

The period of transition on the North-East Coast is being accompanied by a good deal of difficulty and unrest. A working people, whose conduct throughout hostilities was of the most exemplary character, have developed a peculiar touchiness and irritability, and there is trouble over the operation of the 47-hours' week, a serious aspect of which is that it has already delayed the production of much material essential to reconstruction projects.

Meanwhile, the dismissals from munition works continue to grow, slowly by comparison with the large batches dispensed with in the early days, but too quickly for social comfort. It is stated that in Newcastle alone, there are about 6,000 women and 5,000 men in receipt of the State unemployment benefit of 25s. and 29s. per week respectively. There is a strong feeling of resentment among many sections of the community against this subsidy. The acting chairman of the Gateshead magistrates recently declined to sign an unemployment donation certificate, on the ground that, so long as men received 29s. a week for being idle, they would not get jobs. He stated there were about 10,000 men on Tyneside who would not get work, though there was plenty to be had. There is, however, considerable reluctance, especially on the part of the elder men, to take advantage of what some of them stigmatize as State charity.

The fate of Elisabethville, the great Belgian colony at Birtley, in Durham county, hangs in the balance at present. The National Factory there, which gave employment to thousands of Belgians, has been closed down ; what is to become of it is as yet uncertain, and the question does not appear to have begun to worry anyone in high places. It is reported, however, that a great firm of motor-car makers is in negotiation with the Ministry of Munitions for the acquisition of the factory, buildings, and the residential portion of the colony in order to adapt the works for the manufacture of cars and motor-cycles.

Some very contradictory reports are flying about with reference to the early industrial prospects in this district. On the one hand, there are pessimists who appear to be convinced that the suspension of our ordinary industrial processes during the last 4½ years has given our competitors, especially those who kept out of the war most or all the time, a flying start, as a result of which they will maintain a substantial lead over us. At a recent meeting of shipbuilders and engineers in Newcastle, jeremiads were uttered with reference to British shipbuilding, because of the marvellous progress the Americans have made in the art and practice of ship construction. One eminent shipbuilder affirmed that unless our costs of production were reduced, shipowners would not give out orders as numerously as had been hoped for. He stated that orders were not being given out and that, while everybody hitherto had believed that there would be ample employment, it was quite possible that employment would fall off before very long and that our share of the shipbuilding of the world would continue to decline. As against that view, there is reason to believe that the position of most of the North-East Coast shipyards, in respect of booked orders at remunerative figures is eminently satisfactory and that, provided the industry can be kept free from labour disputes and other untoward happenings, employment is guaranteed for at least a couple of years ahead.

While some few employers are metaphorically wringing their hands over the highness of present wages and the shortness of the working weeks for which the men are striving, others are improving the occasion by pointing out that neither high wages nor short working weeks will matter if only a sufficient increase of efficiency, such as the men showed themselves capable of during the war, is maintained. Thus, Mr. C. F. Dixon, chairman of the Cleveland Bridge and Engineering Company, states that there are a number of ways in which, even with shorter hours, costs may be materially reduced, e.g., by more regular time-keeping, by punctual stopping and starting of work at machines, and, in view of the longer rest-periods, by working at higher speeds than formerly. He points out that the men know best where waste of time and effort occurs, and that, if only they will assist in checking this, the necessary cheapening of production can be obtained without any further effort than steady work during the hours in the shops.

The housing question is likely to prove a barrier to full industrial development in some parts of the district. One local engineering company, which has booked a large order for mine cars for South America, needs the services of many more workmen than were formerly in its employment, but in speedily prepared for new orders for bridge work, girders, lathes, and engine parts that there has been no stoppage except for the Christmas holidays. Even the workshops set up for the output of war materials have not all been closed. It is understood that negotiations are proceeding between the Government and private firms for the transference of these places, lock, stock, and barrel, and in at least one instance there is very keen competition for the purchase. The huge aircraft works at Hollinwood, which had barely begun operations when the armistice was signed, will probably soon be devoted to their original purpose of cotton-spinning. A shell-filling factory at Manchester is also being changed back to its former use as an exhibition hall, and a railway company has taken over a big portion of a works near Lancaster for storage purposes. There remain many other similar workshops for disposal, but there is little fear that any considerable number will be allowed to become derelict.

It is a healthy sign, too, that the demand for skilled craftsmen, mostly designers, tool setters, and draughtsmen, continues much as before. There are, indeed, very few skilled men of any kind out of employment. According to a recent return the unemployed in Lancashire do not amount to more than 30,000. Of this number by far the larger proportion are women who have been engaged in shell filling, tending automatic lathes, and other purely war-time occupations. Their future is causing some anxiety, as it does not seem likely that they will be required again for engineering work. This prospect has relieved a rather critical situation in regard to the men's unions. It was at one time thought that the objection against women remaining in the industry would be over-ruled, but the prejudice against them has grown more insistent, and though some unions have not announced any definite policy, others have declared that they will not allow their members to work alongside women who have been imported since the outbreak of war. On the other hand, the women's unions have expressed a determination to keep a close hold on the industry, and their strength is not now to be despised.

SHEFFIELD.

Engineering firms in Sheffield are not now quite so optimistic as they were in the first wave of enthusiasm and relief from the immediate pressure of war work, following the signing of the armistice, and their present attitude is rather of the "wait and see" character.

One of the largest manufacturers in the city, and a recognized leader in the engineering industry of the country, has expressed the view that the immediate prospects of trade are anything but satisfactory. There seems, he says, to be a general impression that prices are going to fall, and on that account prospective customers are hesitating about placing orders or embarking on new enterprises until they get some idea of what that drop in prices is likely to be. Indeed, orders are being cancelled on a somewhat extensive scale and goods refused on the pretext of late delivery, but really on account of the expected fall in prices. Most manufacturers, he states, have orders on their books sufficient to carry them on for another month or two unless further cancellations take place, and there is no reluctance on their part to accept orders, the reluctance being entirely on the part of the customers.

How long this stagnation is likely to continue it is difficult to say. Certainly it cannot be prolonged. The works are not idle and cannot afford to be so, nor, on the other hand, are manufacturers disposed to accumulate large stocks of their products. Some of them are inclined to the opinion that this will inevitably bring prices down. On the other hand, costs of production have so enormously increased that it cannot be expected that prices will revert to anything like pre-war figures. At the same time, there is equally a disposition on the part of prospective customers to refuse to pay the artificially inflated prices that ruled during the war.

Another factor that is holding back the expected boom in trade is the uncertainty in regard to Government control. In some departments this control has been released, but in others it still operates, and manufacturers find this state of things most confusing and hampering, especially in regard to export business. It is also felt that it is high time the Government declared its trade policy in regard to Allies, neutrals, and enemy countries. Some of the Allies seem to have different trade policies of a protective nature with which British manufacturers are quite unable to deal until the policy of this country is known. The difficulty is accentuated by the fact that the Allies are imposing their protective policy not by means of tariff, but rather by a refusal of import licences.

Labour conditions constitute another factor of some uncertainty. In Sheffield there is no lack of skilled labour, nor, on the other hand, is there any considerable surplus. Unemployment is not so extensive as the Labour Exchange officials had expected, and it is practically confined to those people who went into the works purely to meet war needs. The men who were in the shops before the war are, generally speaking, still there, and there is plenty of work to keep them fully employed for some months to come. The operation of the 47-hours' week has, however, been attended by some degree of unsettlement. The men themselves are not wholly satisfied, but they are gradu-days and save the difference. Still, there is plenty of work for the time being. A large number of vessels damaged during the war are still waiting to be repaired, and employment is assured for all the men obtainable during the next 12 months.

On the railways the difficulty is to secure the demobilization of sufficient men to deal with the revival of traffic. Coal-mining is more active than ever, and the men demobilized from the Army are being steadily absorbed. There is a constant and increasing demand for all classes of iron and steel, and there are no prospects of unemployment in this industry. It may be that some temporary slackness will be experienced, but there will be no check in production, and any surplus will go to stock until it can be utilized. The tinplate and galvanizing sheet industries, which were so much curtailed during the war in order to release metals and labour for war purposes, will absorb all the steel that is likely to be obtained during the next year or two. There is considerable complaint that tinplate workers have not been returned from the Army quickly enough to enable the industry to resume operations with reasonable promptitude.

SCOTLAND.

Comparatively little progress has yet been made in Scotland in the industrial change over to peace conditions. The progress made so far has been almost wholly in the way of demobilizing workers at the different munition factories rather than in transferring these workers to other industries. Even this, however, has been confined very largely to the new factories, which were specially created for war purposes, as distinguished from extensions of works organized by pre-war engineering or shipbuilding companies.

A very large proportion of the war factories in Scotland were of the latter class, and the firms concerned are doing all they can to retain the largest possible number of their employees, by finding employment for them in those sections of their works which were devoted to ordinary production before the war or by changing over their war-time extensions to peace-time industries. In the cases, for example, of such firms as Messrs. William Beardmore and Co., Messrs. G. and J. Weir, the Singer Manufacturing Company, the Albion Motor Car Company, and a number of others, there is in prospect a great demand for peace-time products which should absorb a large number of their war-time employees—after the intermediate stage has been passed.

Messrs. Beardmore are best known as shipbuilders, marine engineers, and armour, armament, and steel makers, but since the war began they have organized not only great munition factories, but also great works for the manufacture of complete aeroplanes and airships of all types. It is expected that this branch of the firm's war-time activities will be continued and will employ many of the present workers. Messrs. G. and J. Weir have also been engaged largely on the production of aeroplane parts as well as on shells, and have made extensive additions to their shops. These additions can quite well be turned over to aeroplane work, or they can be devoted to the manufacture of pumps and other marine auxiliary machinery for which there is bound to be a great demand for some years.

The Singer Manufacturing Company's great sewing machine factory at Kilbowie was the largest and most highly organized of its kind in the United Kingdom, if not in Europe ; but for several years it has done very little work of the character with which its name is publicly associated. It too has been devoted largely to the manufacture of aeroplane parts on a system of quantity production similar to that on which it turns out sewing machine parts. In this case, too, the change-over should mean only a change of employment for the great majority of the workers, as there is an assured increase in the demand for sewing machines, both for home and foreign markets. As a large proportion of the company's employees have always been women demobilization should not mean the dismissal of so many workers as in the case of those engineering firms who—in normal times—employ mainly male artizans, and who must revert almost wholly to these if they are to resume their former classes of work.

WOMEN IN SHIPBUILDING.

In the shipyards and marine engineering shops, and also in the locomotive shops in the West of Scotland, the change-over promises to consist almost wholly of taking on additional employees, and it is expected that these works will find work for a fair proportion of those who are being demobilized from the munition factories proper. The difficulty is that the workers at the great explosives factory at Gretna, the big shell-filling factory at Georgetown, near Paisley, and the other places which depended wholly for their existence on the making of munitions for use in the actual fighting, were very largely women who were drawn from domestic service, from offices, and from home life, and who thus have no training fitting them for positions in general engineering works. Hence in order to find employment for them in peace-time industries there will have to be considerable reshuffling of male workers so that "handy men" may become more and more artizans, and so make room for women in places where division of labour has been carried to an extreme length. Even then it is doubtful if more than a small number of women can ever find work in shipyards and marine engi-

THE
"DUFF" GAS PRODUCER
has the following advantages :—
1. It is of simple design.
2. It is easy to work, and operating charges are therefore low,
3. It is economical in fuel.
4. It produces gas of a regular quality and of a high calorific value.
5. Upkeep charges are small ; in many cases no repairs have been necessary for 20 years.
6. Takes up small ground space.
7. Has no mechanical parts to get out of order.

During the last 30 years the number of "DUFF" Gas Producers sold greatly exceeds that of any other design. The "DUFF" stands first among modern Gas Producers, and the excellent results which are obtained are chiefly due to the efficient design of grate, which ensures even distribution of the blast throughout the whole body of the fuel, and also facilitates the easy and regular descent of the ash.

Please send us your enquiries as we can be of service to you.

THE DOWSON & MASON GAS PLANT COMPANY, Limited,
Gas Plant and Furnace Specialists,
Levenshulme, Manchester.
Telegrams: "Gasify," Levenshulme.
Telephone: 261 & 262 Heaton Moor.
C/D.

WADSWORTHS
Specialise in Lifts
Transporters
Cranes
Wm. Wadsworth & Sons, Ltd.,
Bolton, England.
Telegrams : "Hoists, Bolton."
Telephone : 1342 Bolton (3 lines).

FANS FOR ALL DUTIES.
HIGH PRESSURE FANS
for Cupolas, Smiths' Hearths, etc.
STEEL PLATE CENTRIFUGAL FANS
for Ventilating Public Buildings, etc.
BOX BLADE PROPELLER FANS
for Air, Dust, or Steam removal.
WRITE FOR LIST.
Makers :
STANDARD ELECTRICAL Co., KEIGHLEY.

cline. As against that view, there is reason to believe that the position of most of the North-East Coast shipyards, in respect of booked orders at remunerative figures is eminently satisfactory and that, provided the industry can be kept free from labour disputes and other untoward happenings, employment is guaranteed for at least a couple of years ahead.

While some few employers are metaphorically wringing their hands over the highness of present wages and the shortness of the working weeks for which the men are striving, others are improving the occasion by pointing out that neither high wages nor short working weeks will matter if only a sufficient increase of efficiency, such as the men showed themselves capable of during the war, is maintained. Thus, Mr. C. F. Dixon, chairman of the Cleveland Bridge and Engineering Company, states that there are a number of ways in which, even with shorter hours, costs may be materially reduced, e.g., by more regular time-keeping, by punctual stopping and starting of work at machines, and, in view of the longer rest-periods, by working at higher speeds than formerly. He points out that the men know best where waste of time and effort occurs, and that, if only they will assist in checking this, the necessary cheapening of production can be obtained without any further effort than steady work during the hours in the shops.

The housing question is likely to prove a barrier to full industrial development in some parts of the district. One local engineering company, which has booked a large order for mine cars for South America, needs the services of many more workmen than were formerly in its employment, but is finding itself handicapped by the shortage of houses in the neighbourhood of its works. This is by no means an isolated instance.

LANCASHIRE.

The problems of reconstruction are being tackled resolutely in Lancashire, but the progress is much too slow for the eager manufacturers. There appears to be no doubt that the engineering industry, among others, is going to have almost as flourishing a time under peace conditions as it did in the war days.

Industrial activities have begun anew in the textile engineering trade. This branch suffered greatly in the war, and as the staple trade of Lancashire depends so much on a steady and even increasing output of machinery and plant, there is much leeway to be made up. The mills and the cotton trade generally are rapidly recovering from a period of comparative stagnation due largely to shortage of raw material. Textile engineering firms are therefore all the more anxious to resume their old activities again, and it is some encouragement to them that the Government have expressed their intention to apply 50 per cent. of the machinery output to the reorganization of the cotton and kindred trades in France.

In other directions reconstruction schemes are slowly emerging. It has already been found possible to re-engage thousands of demobilized war workers for the occupations of peace time. That is a process which must inevitably be subject to fluctuations, but the beginning is exceedingly promising. Alarmists on the question of unemployment are no longer to be found in Lancashire. As an instance, it may be mentioned that a large concern in South Lancashire has given a definite undertaking to practically all its demobilized war workers that their employment will be resumed and put on a permanent basis in a few weeks' time; this has been rendered possible through the securing of a very big contract for locomotives for a railway company which previously always constructed them in its own shops. Another firm, which employed during war time over 4,000 workers, or nearly double the number engaged in pre-war days, has had to dispense with only about 200 women, the works having been so to anything like pre-war figures. At the same time, there is equally a disposition on the part of prospective customers to refuse to pay the artificially inflated prices that ruled during the war.

Another factor that is holding back the expected boom in trade is the uncertainty in regard to Government control. In some departments this control has been released, but in others it still operates, and manufacturers find this state of things most confusing and hampering, especially in regard to export business. It is also felt that it is high time the Government declared its trade policy in regard to Allies, neutrals, and enemy countries. Some of the Allies seem to have different trade policies of a protective nature with which British manufacturers are quite unable to deal until the policy of this country is known. The difficulty is accentuated by the fact that the Allies are imposing their protective policy not by means of tariff, but rather by a refusal of import licences.

Labour conditions constitute another factor of some uncertainty. In Sheffield there is no lack of skilled labour, nor, on the other hand, is there any considerable surplus. Unemployment is not so extensive as the Labour Exchange officials had expected, and it is practically confined to those people who went into the works purely to meet war needs. The men who were in the shops before the war are, generally speaking, still there, and there is plenty of work to keep them fully employed for some months to come. The operation of the 47-hours, week has, however, been attended by some degree of unsettlement. The men themselves are not wholly satisfied, but they are gradually adapting themselves to the new conditions. The employers feel, however, that they have not been considered in the matter, and as a result considerable dislocation has resulted. This might have been obviated had the Government consulted with the employers, and a scheme might have been evolved in friendly conference that would have given far more general satisfaction.

Engineering firms do not at present seem disposed to launch out into new developments on any considerable scale. There is, however, plant and power available for adaptation to a great variety of products if makers are only assured of a market and remunerative prices. Nothing has yet been done in regard to the national factory erected for the manufacture of projectiles. One local firm has made an offer for it, but this was not accepted. Until the conditions of future trade are more settled local manufacturers prefer to concentrate on lines which they found profitable in pre-war days. It is for the Government to encourage a bolder and more adventurous policy. "The plant is here, and we have the skilled men; we can do anything if only we make a start" was the summing up of the situation by one of the leaders in the engineering industry.

SOUTH WALES.

Post-war problems in South Wales are made more complex by the high wages which prevailed during the war. Particularly is this so among the women workers, and demobilized munitioners dislike intensely the idea of returning to pre-war vocations, laundry work and domestic service being viewed with special aversion.

The women say they are going to draw the 25s. a week for the full period allowed by the Government before they will re-enter the old vocations, and among employers the consensus of opinion is that the payment of a weekly out-of-work bonus is a mistake. What should have been done, they argue, was to give the women a lump sum, and tell them that that was all they would get.

Dry dock owners are afflicted with a cognate trouble. The dry dock worker is at once very practical and yet impractical. If he can keep his wife and family by working only three days a week, he does not see why he should work six only a change of employment for the great majority of the workers, as there is an assured increase in the demand for sewing machines, both for home and foreign markets. As a large proportion of the company's employees have always been women demobilization should not mean the dismissal of so many workers as in the case of those engineering firms who—in normal times—employ mainly male artizans, and who must revert almost wholly to these if they are to resume their former classes of work.

Women in Shipbuilding.

In the shipyards and marine engineering shops, and also in the locomotive shops in the West of Scotland, the change-over promises to consist almost wholly of taking on additional employees, and it is expected that these works will find work for a fair proportion of those who are being demobilized from the munition factories proper. The difficulty is that the workers at the great explosives factory at Gretna, the big shell-filling factory at Georgetown, near Paisley, and the other places which depended wholly for their existence on the making of munitions for use in the actual fighting, were very largely women who were drawn from domestic service, from offices, and from home life, and who thus have no training fitting them for positions in general engineering works. Hence in order to find employment for them in peace-time industries there will have to be considerable reshuffling of male workers so that "handy men" may become more and more artizans, and so make room for women in places where division of labour has been carried to an extreme length. Even then it is doubtful if more than a small number of women can ever find work in shipyards and marine engineering shops. They have been tried on the Clyde during the war, and it has been found that, while they are quite satisfactory as workers, the number of jobs suitable for them, especially in the shipyards, is so small that very few of them can be employed.

Work in Factories.

This is the chief difficulty which has been experienced in Scotland so far—that of placing in new positions the women workers demobilized from purely war factories. Considerable numbers have been discharged, and a good deal has been said about how domestic service and office life should be made more attractive to them than either was before the war, but the situation does not seem, at the moment, any clearer than it was two months ago. Meantime the great majority of the demobilized workers are enjoying a spell of idleness—and Government pay on a modified scale—and the difficulty will only become acute when this period of time comes to an end.

Even then, however, there are many prospects of employment other than those which the women deserted when they undertook war work. The textile factories of Glasgow and the Scottish borders, for example, are likely to be exceptionally busy: and so are the jute and preserve factories of Dundee, the linen factories of Dunfermline, and the floor cloth factories of Kirkcaldy. All of these have to recover their foreign markets, and all find themselves with more capital and better plant than they had before the war, and so capable of employing more workers. The revival of the fishing industry on the east coast will provide work for many women as well as men each summer and autumn, while agriculture will call for many additional workers all the year round. Besides, there are possibilities of the utilization of some at least of the war factories for new peace-time industries, so that there should be plenty of employment once the difficult transition period is over.

The Superintendent Engineers of the Ministry of Munitions in the different munition areas of the country are prepared to give every assistance in bringing firms who have more orders on their books than they can readily deal with, and who meet with difficulty in finding suitable sub-contractors, into touch with others who have manufacturing facilities but lack orders.

Wm. Wadsworth & Sons, Ltd.,
Bolton, England.

Telegrams: "Hoists, Bolton."
Telephone: 1342 Bolton (3 lines).

FANS FOR ALL DUTIES.

HIGH PRESSURE FANS
for Cupolas, Smiths' Hearths, etc.
STEEL PLATE CENTRIFUGAL FANS
for Ventilating Public Buildings, etc.
BOX BLADE PROPELLER FANS
for Air, Dust, or Steam removal.
WRITE FOR LIST.
Makers:
STANDARD ELECTRICAL Co., KEIGHLEY.

R.A. SKELTON & CO.
Moorgate Station Chambers,
London, E.C.2.

ENGINEERING DEPT.:—Steel Structures of all kinds.
MERCHANT DEPT.—Structural Iron and Steel, Home and Export.
ALL DEPTS.:—Punctual Deliveries and Thorough Attention.

FAULTS
CAN be placed.
Compression and Ignition Pressures
TESTED in Gas, Diesel & Petrol ENGINES by using
The 'OKILL GAUGE'
Write for Booklet.
TAYLORS (Brass Founders) LTD.
All Saints' Street, N. BOLTON.
London: BROWN BROS., LTD.

The SINGER "10."

FOR COMFORT AND CONTENT.
FOR ECONOMY IN USE.
FOR RELIABILITY AS NEARLY ABSOLUTE AS MAY BE.
FOR GENERAL UTILITY.
FOR TOWN OR COUNTRY.
FOR NOVICE OR EXPERT.
FOR LADY OR GENTLEMAN.
FOR BUSINESS OR PLEASURE.

The SINGER "10."

SINGER & CO., Ltd.,

CANTERBURY STREET, COVENTRY, ENG.

And 17, Holborn Viaduct, London, E.C.

TRAFFORD PARK, MANCHESTER.

SITES FOR WORKS:

FACTORIES TO LET and FOR SALE within THE MANCHESTER DOCKS AREA; RAILWAY SIDINGS and OTHER TRAFFIC FACILITIES.

Apply: ESTATE OFFICE, TRAFFORD PARK, MANCHESTER.

LONDON OFFICE: 95, Leadenhall St., London, E.C.

HARBOUR EXTENSIONS IN SCOTLAND.

PLANS FOR THE CLYDE.

It is expected that shortly after peace is declared various harbour authorities in Scotland will revise plans for port extensions which they had worked out before the war and with which they would have made considerable progress before now but for the shortage of labour, high prices, and the restrictions imposed by the Government.

The most important schemes are those of the Clyde Navigation Trustees, who are already considering the question of making a start with the construction of large new berthing basins in ground at Shieldhall—a short distance west of Govan, on the south bank of the river. They have drawn up plans for docks which would constitute a great new harbour, larger than any of their existing docks and capable of accommodating the largest vessels which trade with the port, or which are built in the Clyde shipyards. As yet they have Parliamentary powers for the construction of only a comparatively small portion of these docks. This portion is so designed as to be an integral part of the complete scheme, and the intention is to go as far as the present powers permit, and then apply for further powers, each new section being brought into service as it may be called for by the demands of trade. At present the harbour is frequently congested with traffic, and it is not possible, with the berthing space at their disposal, for the Trustees to find the necessary accommodation at all times for the vessels trading with the port.

Advantages of the Scheme.

The extensions at Shieldhall are intended to have far-reaching consequences. They will mean, for one thing, that many of the large vessels at present berthed farther up the river will be transferred to the new basins, thus setting the upper harbour free for coasting and cross-channel trade, and for the traffic more closely associated with the city. It should also be found possible, with the grouping of many of the large ocean-going vessels in one basin or series of basins, so to rearrange all the other traffic of the port that each trade will have a section of the quayage to itself, with all its appropriate railway and other transport connexions. This has been one of the ideals of the Clyde Trustees for a long time. It was realized to some extent when the Rothesay Dock at Clydebank was opened, and was devoted specially to the ore and coal trades. But a great deal has yet to be done in the way of concentration of traffic, and not much can be done until some of the new Shieldhall basins are available.

The construction of these basins should also assist the port authority in solving some of the more difficult problems which at present confront them. It should render easier the question of cross-river communication within the harbour area, as the fewer the number of large [illegible] sions which was inaugurated some time ago by the Greenock Harbour Board. There has now been completed a new reinforced concrete deep-water berth and quay at Prince's Pier, which provides accommodation for vessels larger than any of those which have traded with the port hitherto. The quay is 500ft. in length, and the berth has a depth at low water of ordinary spring tides of 26ft. There are large sheds and warehouses adjoining suitable for sugar or general cargoes, or for any kind of shipping trade, while the cattle lairages are alongside, and Prince's Pier passenger station and wharf close by. The new berth will, it is expected, attract considerable additional traffic to the port.

Bo'ness Dock Requirements.

The decision of the Admiralty to allow all the ports on the Firth of Forth to be re-opened for ordinary traffic raises some important engineering questions at the harbour of Bo'ness. The docks there, which were constructed about 30 years ago, were suitable before the war. for the accommodation of vessels up to 2,000 tons, but since then the average size of trading steamers has been increased by the destruction of many old vessels and the addition to mercantile fleets of newer and larger steamers. In addition, the period of idleness has resulted in a marked silting up of the fairway, so that even for the former size of vessel a considerable amount of dredging would have been required.

In these circumstances, local traders have petitioned the North British Railway Company, who are the owners of the harbour, for an entirely new dock entrance, capable of taking vessels of from 3,000 to 4,000 tons deadweight. Until such provision is made they cannot, they state, compete successfully with other Firth of Forth ports. In the coal export trade, for example, a steamer sailing with 6in. or 12in. less than her loaded draught, would represent all the difference between profit and loss to her owners, and as loading to full draught is possible at Grangemouth and Leith, owners will send their vessels to these ports in preference to Bo'ness, where there is a danger of shortage of water—that is, unless they obtain higher rates to cover the risk.

The engineers of the railway company have visited the harbour and discussed with the traders the possibility of carrying on a limited trade at the port concurrently with the construction of the proposed extension of the harbour entrance.

SEWAGE AND WATER.

NEW SCHEMES AT SHEFFIELD.

Sheffield City Council has initiated two interesting schemes, more or less experimental in character, for the treatment of its sewage and for supplementing its water supply.

In regard to the former, the city is faced with the necessity of extending its capacity for treating sewage. The works must be enlarged in order to meet the needs of a greatly increased population and industries and [illegible]

The

KITSON-EMPIRE LIGHTING CO.

STAMFORD, Lincolnshire, ENGLAND.

THE "KELITE" INCANDESCENT.

NOTE—We are the originators of INCANDESCENT OIL LIGHTING, and are Manufacturers of all types of INCANDESCENT OIL LAMPS suitable for both indoor and Outdoor Lighting. We are also Manufacturers of BLOW LAMPS, BRAZING LAMPS, and "KELITE" STOVES, and similar Oil Burning Apparatus of every description. Write for Catalogues and Prices. We supply these goods to the British and Allied Governments in large quantities.

THE "KELITE"
OIL ENGINE STARTING LAMP, No. 2.
CODE WORD—Enlite.

THE "KELITE"
PETROLEUM VAPOUR STOVE, No. 1.
CODE WORD—Kelo.

ALL GOODS are BRITISH-MADE THROUGHOUT

No dealings with Huns after the War—directly or indirectly.

...e fewer ... of large ships which require to use the upper harbour the more practicable will become any scheme for erecting a bridge above the entrances to Queen's Dock and Prince's Dock. Such a bridge must come some day, but at present it is hardly practicable, because an ordinary street-level bridge would render the upper harbour useless. A high-level bridge would be of no more convenience to traffic than the present tunnel or vehicular ferry, and an opening bridge would require to be opened so frequently that its usefulness as a bridge would be decreased greatly. The westward trend of traffic will simplify this problem in course of time, and make possible a bridge under which coasting vessels could pass. The berthage of the large liners at Shieldhall will go far to accentuate this process by leaving only the smaller vessels in the upper reaches of the river.

Graving Dock.

The Clyde Navigation Trustees also have powers for the construction of a large graving dock at Shieldhall. They had these powers long before the war began, but took no steps to put them into practical effect. Whether they will do so now has not been clearly stated, but the presumption is that they will, as the dock will fit into the scheme for large berthing basins, and the Trustees are, besides, bound by a pledge to the burgh of Renfrew to construct such a dock at Shieldhall. The only reason why the position is doubtful is that there is much to be said for the contention that no graving dock of such a size—capable of taking the largest battleships and liners yet built or projected—should be situated so far up a narrow and somewhat tortuous channel, but on an open sea front.

Position at Leith.

The Leith Dock Commissioners are also considering the advisability of proceeding with the harbour improvements which they had on hand before the war began. They had originally a great plan for the enclosure of all the water area between their present West Pier and Newhaven Harbour, so as to form one large new harbour to be devoted specially to the fishing industry. It was then their ambition to make Leith the greatest fishing port on the coasts of Scotland, and they obtained Parliamentary powers for plans which included the extensions referred to, and also a number of improvements at their existing docks. Since then they have modified their immediate ambitions somewhat, and have embarked on a less extensive scheme, which will consist more of improvements at than additions to their present docks. With this scheme they wish to make progress as soon as possible after conditions become favourable, and after Government permission is obtained.

Improvements at Greenock.

Very satisfactory progress is being made with the scheme of improvements and extensions to meet the needs of a greatly increased population and industries, and even then they will not be complete, because at present they provide only primary filtration, and the Local Government Board require that the effluent shall be treated again by passage over a secondary system of beds. This work has been delayed by the war, but is rapidly becoming urgent.

Meantime Mr. J. Haworth, the manager of the Sheffield sewage works, is carrying out an experiment with a simplified and speeded-up adaptation of the bacteriological system of sewage treatment. He has devised an activated sludge process. At the Tinsley works there is a large brick tank equipped with whirling iron blades, which agitate the semi-liquid sewage, sending it up one channel and down another and keeping it constantly in motion, with the object of providing a more rapid and thorough aeration than is provided by the ordinary settling tanks and filter beds. This churning process brings about bacterial activation of the sludge so efficiently that within four or five hours the liquid portion of the sludge has become purified to a high degree. At present three or four applications of sewage per day are being made to the same mass of sludge, and the resulting purification Mr. Haworth claims to be quite beyond reproach. It is found that the solid separates from the liquid very readily, and that after an hour's standing a brilliant liquid can be decanted which is in a state of high organic purity. The effluents are said to be, if anything, of higher purity than those produced by other methods of filtration now in use for sewage purification, readily meeting the most exacting standards of river conservancy authorities, and being suitable, after due softening, for all industrial uses. If the new process proves as successful as it promises to be, a great saving of land will be effected; of the 150 acres at present in use, one-third will suffice for the treatment of the sewage by the new process, and the other land could be very advantageously sold, as it is in the centre of a very rapidly developing industrial area and is much needed for works extensions.

The Waterworks Department is seeking powers for a scheme by which the city's water supply will be supplemented at the comparatively moderate cost of something like £350,000 by substituting purified river water for some of the compensation water at present taken out of the reservoir for the purpose of complying with the statutory requirements. At present over 9,000,000 gallons of compensation water are taken daily from the gathering ground, and it is proposed as far as necessary to purify an equal quantity of river water for use as compensation water. As a matter of fact, this scheme is linked up with the new sewage treatment experiment, and it is hoped that the purified effluent will be used for this compensation water. It will thus set free for domestic purposes the equivalent quantity of water now taken from the reservoir in the form of compensation water. The need for this additional supply is shown by the fact that at present the city's available resources total 18½ million gallons per day, and the consumption is nearly 3½ million gallons per day in excess of that supply. It is estimated that in another six years the deficiency will amount to 10¼ million gallons per day. The cost of substituting for the compensation water purified river water or effluent fit for industrial purposes is said to be very much below the expense that would be incurred in providing fresh sources of supply.

Arrangements have been made for the provision of an augmented water supply for the burgh of Port Glasgow. New works are being constructed at Cunston Burn, in the parish of Kilmacolm, but these are intended to be ultimately part of a larger scheme, which will provide additional supplies to the extent of 3,000,000 gallons per 24 hours. Meantime, only the section at Cunston Burn is ... constructed.

Daily Telegraph 15.1.19

CLOSING OF STATE FACTORIES.

Over 250,000 women and a like number of men, it is stated, are affected by the proposed closing down of national factories in various parts of the country, regarding which the Labour party had been unsuccessful up to last evening in its effort to approach the Government by deputation. In turn, the War Office, the Ministry of Munitions, and the Inter-Departmental Committee on Civil Demobilisation were applied to without avail. Through the good offices of Mr. G. J. Barnes, however, there is a hope that Sir Thomas Munro may receive the deputation. The Standing Joint Committee of the Women's Industrial Organisation, which includes representatives of the Labour party, the Women's Trade Union League, Women's Co-operative Guild, and other bodies, passed a resolution yesterday urging the Government to convert the national factories to peace purposes instead of selling them and discharging the workers.

"More women are concerned in the national factories than probably any other group of munition workers," remarked Dr. Marion Phillips, secretary to the Standing Joint Committee, in an interview with a Press representative last evening. "As far back as two years ago the Standing Joint Committee urged the taking of steps to meet the difficulties which have now arisen. One big difficulty that presents itself is that many of these factories are in new areas and rural districts, where it is impossible for fresh work to be obtained. Migration to urban centres can only serve to complicate the situation. The problem is one which calls for earnest and immediate consideration."

Aberdeen Free Press 4.2.19

POST-WAR EMPLOYMENT OF WOMEN.

Sir,—It is only a year ago since the women of Great Britain were acclaimed as being most keen and helpful in aiding "the getting on" with the war. Never had they revealed such excellent qualities, such self-sacrifice and devotion, such intense patriotism and elimination of self in favour of the splendid men who were ready even to give up their own lives for the cause of right and for them.

Can we say the same for these women now? Have we been deceived as to the genuine spirit of helpfulness associated with them when the country was in peril, and we knew not what tragic news our papers would bring each day? It is a sad confession to make, but nevertheless it cannot be denied that the spirit of many women has quite changed and this not for the better. Is it impossible for them to show the fine spirit before alluded to in time of peace and reconstruction as in time of war? Surely we should hesitate to say that it is not, and yet how is it that so many instead of again settling down to work offered, and for which on account of their previous occupation they are admirably suited, refuse to take suggested employment, and prefer to loaf idly about the streets, receiving money which taxpayers have to provide, contributing towards their out of employment upkeep. By this they are doing a double injustice, taking money and so increasing the burdens of the taxpayers, and searing their own consciences by refusing to help in many cases where their assistance is greatly needed, simply because they cannot command a continuance of the same wage as that offered by the Government during the war, in a time of emergency.

What are those to do whose income through the effect of the war has been reduced by one-third? They cannot afford to double or treble wages, so that if women are so obstinately refusing work, can they expect pity when the pinch comes, and in the meantime employers have learned to do without their services?

One alternative may be that Dutch and Belgian women may come over in their thousands and eagerly accept work (for which they are well qualified, especially as domestic servants), work refused by our own country-women.

It is to be hoped that after a few weeks' holiday—justly earned—many of our women will change their minds and be brought to see that it is their duty to help rather than to hinder the difficult work of reconstruction.—I am, etc.,

ALBYN.

February 3, 1919.

Freeman's Journal
Dublin
5.2.19

WOMEN-WORKERS' COMPLAINTS

TO THE EDITOR OF THE FREEMAN'S JOURNAL.

Dear Sir—In its general condemnation of the scheme of unemployment benefit, the Press, ably assisted by numerous anonymous correspondents, has led the public to believe that the workers are all courting unemployment in order to get "money for nothing," and are not at all inclined to take suitable employment when offered to them.

Complaints are pouring in to this Federation of the "suitable" posts which are being offered to our members all over the country. For instance, one girl who, before she took up munitions, had been a school-teacher, recognised by the National Board, entered her name for a position as book-keeper two weeks ago. Last week she was curtly told that a job had been found for her as a store-keeper at 10s per week. When the girl pointed out that she was entirely dependent on her earnings and that she wanted a post which would keep her, she was informed she had been drawing the allowance long enough, and that if she did not take what was offered she would be struck off the books.

Having no option, she went to the address given, and was told that no such person lived there, but that a man of the same name lived further down, and that he wanted someone to mind a stable. Furthermore, she was the third girl sent from the Rotunda that day to mind that stable! On the other hand, a woman who had been a washer-up in a canteen was offered a post as cashier at 18s per week, a job which would have been gladly taken, if offered, by any of the girls who had signed on for clerical work.

We want work, not doles, and if the Government, instead of foisting on us this glorified outdoor relief, applied the money to the subsidising of constructive industries which would be of permanent benefit to the community, the workers would be far more satisfied, and there would be no place in the scheme for chronic idlers or malingerers. We have put up with a good deal of maladministration in this country, but it is certain now, that organised Labour is not going to allow the Labour Exchanges of Ireland to become recruiting centres for sweated labour. There are two sides to every story, and the workers, as citizens, have a right to theirs.—I am, faithfully yours,

MARGARET BUCKLEY, Sec.
National Federation of Women Workers,
Irish Office, 42 Nth. Gt. George's st.,
Dublin.

Portsmouth Evening News
13.5.19

THE PRICE OF WOMEN'S WORK.

[To the Editor of the "Evening News."]

Sir,—Much has been said lately about unemployment and the seeming unwillingness of our unemployed to work so long as they can draw the out-of-work donation. There are many, unfortunately, who are playing a bad game. So, too, are many of the employers. Just fancy, a woman being asked to toil seven hours daily, and provide her own food for less than 1s. a day. This was offered one of my war widows to-day. Then another case, whilst not quite so bad, is bad enough. A soldier's wife, whose husband is still serving his country, because she refused 8s. a week for 10½ hours daily (7 days a week), the referees at the Labour Exchange struck her off the books. I've protested, but no redress is forthcoming. May I publicly suggest that no employer's name should be entered on the books of the Exchange who offers less than 6d. an hour without food, or 4d. an hour with, and for indoor trained servants not less than 10s. a week, and 2 hours daily off? —Yours very truly,

M. CAMBIE.

Parliamentary Debates
26.3.'19

OUT-OF-WORK DONATION.

23. Sir S. HOARE asked the Minister of Labour if he will state what are the latest figures for unemployed men, women, girls and boys, and the amount of the donation that is being paid them?

Sir R. HORNE: The latest figures for unemployed men, women, girls and boys having out-of-work donation policies lodged are for the week ending 14th March, namely:—

Men	444,277
Women	486,945
Boys	26,327
Girls	31,070
	988,619

701/27

During the week the amount of donation paid was approximately £1,200,000.

Sir S. HOARE: Do those figures show an increase over the figures for the previous week?

Sir R. HORNE: They do, but I should point out for the information of the House that there has been a decrease in the number of those who have asked for a continuance of the unemployment benefit, which they have already got for thirteen weeks.

Mr. RENWICK: Is this out-of-work donation given to men, women, boys and girls other than those who were employed upon munitions work?

Sir R. HORNE: Yes. The reason is, as the hon. Gentleman will readily understand, that practically the whole effort of the country was engaged on war work of some kind. All, therefore, whether munitions workers or not, if thrown out of employment as a result of the Armistice, should have the same treatment. One is just as much entitled as the other.

Mr. RENWICK: Then all those who are out of employment from whatever cause are entitled to this donation?

Sir R. HORNE: That is so.

Mr. WATERSON: Have any steps been taken by the Ministry of Labour to prevent this unemployment, and is the right hon. Gentleman prepared to state to the House the nature of these steps?

Sir R. HORNE: I think that that would require a somewhat lengthy statement. I have no doubt that the hon. Gentleman will find other occasions for raising this question.

Colonel YATE: On what date does this benefit come to an end?

Sir R. HORNE: The date on which the original unemployment benefit would have come to an end would be the 21st of May, being six months after the 21st of November, but as the House already knows there has been an extension of the original period for another period of six months.

Captain REDMOND: Will this unemployed benefit be revived at the next general election?

Sir R. HORNE: We must wait for that occasion.

Sir J. BUTCHER: Is special attention being paid to the case of domestic servants?

Mr. SPEAKER: We must endeavour to go through the other questions.

25. Mr. LAMBERT asked the Minister of Labour if he will rearrange the payment of the out-of-work donation so that only men and women who cannot get work may receive it?

Sir R. HORNE: It is already a condition for the receipt of out-of-work donation that an applicant must be unemployed, capable of work and unable to obtain suitable employment. It is the practice of the Department to suspend donation and refer claims to Courts of Referees when it is brought to their notice that suitable employment has been refused.

Mr. LAMBERT: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that a very large number of employers in the country are asking for labour to-day?

Sir R. HORNE: I am aware that there are cases in which the unemployment donation is abused. I should be grateful to every Member of the House who would bring before my notice cases in which that is being done.

Mr. THOMAS: Is it not also true that employment is being offered to men and women at less than the current rate in the district, and often at less than the unemployment benefit, and that in these cases the unemployment donation is being refused?

Sir R. HORNE: If employment is offered at less than the prescribed rate for employment in that district I do not think that it would be incumbent upon the Employment Exchange to refuse the unemployment donation.

Sir H. CRAIK: Can the right hon. Gentleman give any instances of employés who are receiving this donation for whom employment is not waiting at this moment?

Sir R. HORNE: It is an almost impossible task for me to produce instances of persons who are receiving unemployment donation who are unworthy of it, but if the hon. Member would furnish me with cases in which the donation is given in which it ought not to be given, I shall be glad to have these instances looked into.

Sir C. KINLOCH-COOKE: Are not London dressmakers imploring young women to come to them, employers who are willing to pay them high wages, far above the ordinary ones?

Sir R. HORNE: I should be grateful if my hon. Friend would give me instances of such cases.

Mr. A. WILLIAMS: Is there anything to prevent employed who cannot get workers appealing to Unemployment Exchanges?

Sir R. HORNE: They do appeal, and we keep a constant record. So far as we can judge the figures from week to w[illegible] there is no large amount of empl[illegible]il-able in this country for those w[illegible] of work.

27. Brigadier-General CROFT asked the Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Labour whether, in view of the statement by his Department that the number of workpeople in every occupation exceeds the demand, his attention has been called to the fact that in numerous cases firms have applied for girls, who refuse employment whilst receiving unemployed benefit; whether he is aware that a large number of men are similarly refusing offers of employment; and whether he will give an undertaking that unemployed benefit will be discontinued to persons who refuse employment at wages at a greater amount than the unemployed benefit now being paid?

Sir R. HORNE: Reports have reached the Department that applicants for out-of-work donation have refused offers of employment. It is already a condition for there is, ...

Colonel

[Sir R. Horne.]

the receipt of out-of-work donation that applicants shall not refuse offers of suitable employment, and in all cases in which it is reported to the Department that such employment has been refused, payment of donation is suspended and the claims are referred to Courts of Referees for decisions whether or not donation shall be paid. It is very desirable that employers should in all cases furnish the Department with particulars of such cases.

Brigadier-General CROFT: May we take it as the fact that no unemployment benefit will be paid when wages are offered at a higher rate to the person unemployed?

Sir R. HORNE: I should not like to commit myself to an answer in the form in which the question is put for this reason, that if a man is skilled in any particular industry his wages are higher than unemployment benefit, and I do not think it could be said that suitable employment was offered to him if it were employment at a wage which was not comparable to that which he ought to earn in suitable employment. Therefore I cannot commit myself to an answer to the full extent the hon. and gallant Gentleman's question involves.

Brigadier-General CROFT: How long is the State going to find money in these kind of cases where employment is generally offered?

Colonel THORNE: Is the State prepared to put everybody in work?

FERTILISER MANUFACTURERS (HOURS OF WORK).

24. Mr. JOHN JONES asked the Minister of Labour if he is aware that the Fertiliser Manufacturers' Association have refused to negotiate with the National Federation of General Workers on a programme of reduced hours and other conditions of labour, and if he will use his good offices to bring about a conference between the parties concerned, and so obviate a stoppage of work in this industry?

Sir R. HORNE: The Ministry of Labour has been in communication with the Association and Federation in question with a view to securing a settlement between them. The hon. Member for South-East Leeds has recently discussed this matter with my Department. I am expecting a communication from him in due course, on receipt of which further action in the direction indicated by the hon. Member will be taken if necessary. I may state that the employés' representatives are at the moment considering whether it is possible for this purpose to settle the questions at issue through the machinery of the Interim Industrial Reconstruction Committee for this industry.

Colonel THORNE: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the organisations involved are now taking a vote of the men as to whether they will or will not withhold their labour, and will he use his good offices to try to bring them together?

Sir R. HORNE: What the hon. Gentleman says is a matter of which I am unaware. I understood that the matter was in the process of negotiation through the hon. Member for South-East Leeds (Mr. O'Grady), who was using his good offices, and was to give a report to me as soon as he was in a position to do so.

Mr. A. DAVIS: In the event of the employers refusing to negotiate with the workmen, what steps does the right hon. Gentleman propose to take?

Sir R. HORNE: That is a problematical question, and depends on the circumstances which arise.

SCHOOL CARETAKERS, LANCASHIRE.

26. Colonel THORNE asked the Minister of Labour whether he is now in a position to state the result of the correspondence with the Education Committee of the Lancashire County Council respecting the difference with their school caretakers regarding the conditions of labour; whether he is aware that the position in this case remains as it was over a month ago; and whether he can take any action to secure a settlement?

Sir R. HORNE: An officer from this Department has interviewed the parties concerned, and the Director of Education of the Lancashire County Council has informed the National Federation of Caretakers that certain information with regard to caretakers was being collected for the information of the Education Committee, who would consider the applica-

Daily Chronicle - 27.3.19

WOMEN'S WAGES COME DOWN WITH A RUN.

OUT-OF-WORK PAY STOPPED BECAUSE THEY REFUSED 12/- A WEEK.

LAUNDRY LABOUR AT 12/9.

Disclosures as to the poor wages now being offered to many women were made by Miss Madeleine Symons, of the National Federation of Women Workers, one of the members of a deputation who waited upon Sir Robert Horne, Minister of Labour, yesterday.

Women did not refuse occupations, she said, at anything like a decent wage of 25s. a week or over. It was true that a number of women were reluctant to take work below, and sometimes very much below, 25s. a week. At many Exchanges throughout the country women were being offered work at wages from 12s. to 25s. a week.

DOMESTIC SERVICE, OR NO PAY.

Four women in Brighton were offered work in January at 12s. a week. Their donation was stopped because they refused the work. A woman in London was offered work at a laundry. She worked for three weeks at piece rates, and found that by working as hard as she possibly could she could not earn more than 12s. 9d. a week. When she gave it up because she could not live on that sum she went to the Exchange, to find that her benefit was refused.

Mr. W. T. Kelly appealed for a more sympathetic administration of the Employment Exchanges. He declared that one official entered a room in which 40 women were waiting for offers of work, and asked, "Who is for domestic service?" As no one replied, each was handed the usual form and told they were not entitled to further benefit.

Sir Robert Horne replied that the present situation was far more difficult than any situation during the war.

If the Government started to make things in national factories which were made by private manufacturers, they would be making things for which there was no market or else they would be competing in the same market with the private manufacturers, and so forcing them to close down.

He mentioned he would be glad of all the evidence he could get about the lack of good administration at the Employment Exchanges.

Coming to something which he said would not be entirely palatable, Sir Robert said it was unfortunately the truth that a considerable number of women had preferred to take their unemployment benefit in preference to going to work. There had been innumerable instances of that, and it was true that there were not as many people in domestic service as there were before the war.

Times 28.3.19

70

UNEMPLOYED WOMEN WAR WORKERS.

DEMAND FOR FACTORY AMENITIES.

MORE EX-SOLDIERS IN WORK.

Official figures now available show that during the week ended March 14, 998,619 men, women, and young people were drawing the out-of-work donation. It may be assumed that the figures have since passed the million, but during the week under review the total number of policies lodged revealed a decline of 3,613 as compared with those for the previous week. This should not be taken as a definite indication that unemployment is now decreasing, and as a matter of fact it is not believed that the maximum level of unemployment has yet been reached.

Large numbers of policy-holders have exhausted their first period of donation, and their cases are being carefully reviewed before it is decided whether they are to be granted an extended donation policy. Further, the operation of the revised regulations with regard to the payment of donations in Ireland is reflected in a large decline of policies lodged in that country. The figures for March 14 were as follows:—

—	Men.	Women.	Boys.	Girls.	Total.
Civilian	208,540	485,784	26,327	31,070	751,721
H.M Forces ..	235,737	1,161	—	—	236,898
Total ..	444,277	486,945	26,327	31,070	988,619

The percentage of persons re-absorbed into civil occupations shows a further improvement both for men (both civilian and his Majesty's Forces) and for women. Approximately 80 per cent. of the men returning from his Majesty's Forces whose furlough has expired have already been re-absorbed at a conservative estimate.

There are special reasons why so many women discharged from war work remain unemployed. The majority of the women registering at the exchanges are anxious to be re-absorbed into industry, though there is continued reluctance on the part of many former domestic servants to return to their pre-war occupation. An important factor is that large numbers of women workers are either the wives or widows of soldiers. The wives are expecting their husbands home again and are unwilling to go to posts which would take them far away or would involve special training. In some of these cases it is probable that no extension of the out-of-work donation will be granted. Soldiers' widows are in a different class, and employers, wherever possible, might give preference to them in filling vacancies.

In the case of single women the question why they do not take up such employment as is available may be asked with more force. The answer is that they have often little skill in the occupations in which they were engaged before they transferred to the munition factories. Dressmakers are required, and dressmakers are registered as unemployed. It is found, however, that many of those seeking situations were only learners before the war and that they have forgotten the greater part of what they had learned.

FURTHER TRAINING REQUIRED.

These women must either go back to the workrooms at a learner's wage when they have passed the learner's age, or industrial training must be provided for them by local authorities, the State or employers. In some cases glove manufacturers, straw-hat manufacturers, and similar firms have offered to give the necessary training to those willing to enter the industry. A drawback is the fact that for the period of training only a low wage is offered, and girls who have been well paid in munition factories are reluctant to make a new start on these terms.

Another matter which has to be faced is that women and girls who have worked in the well-equipped establishments built during the war have grown accustomed to the softening of industrial conditions by welfare schemes. They miss in the older type of factory the rest-rooms, canteens, and cloakrooms which have been at their disposal in the munition works. There can be little doubt that, in future, employers who wish to make use of women's labour will have to realize that women must be properly treated, that adequate accommodation for meals must be provided, and that, generally, conditions must be improved.

Finally, there is the case of women workers who have become skilled in work which the trade unions regard as a close preserve for men. Here they are dependent on the decisions which the trade unions will make on the question of dilution. Many women who have become expert in acetylene welding, work in aircraft factories, and similar processes will be sorely disappointed if they are automatically shut out from employment in these industries.

01 Times 2.4.19. 701/30

£12,000,000 FOR OUT-OF-WORK PAY.

WOMEN RETURNING TO PRE-WAR STATUS.

MAMMOTH RECORDS AT KEW.

It is estimated that up to March 21 the payment of out-of-work donation had involved a total cost of £ 2,000,000. For several weeks now the payments have averaged something like £170,000 to £180,000 a day. Some relief may be expected shortly, however, as arge numbers of women who have drawn the donation for the original period of 13 weeks will not be granted a second policy under the conditions which govern the extension of the unemployment benefit.

Only 52 per cent. of the women whose first policies have expired are, as a matter of fact, applying for an extension. This seems to indicate that many women realize that they would be unable to satisfy the local Advisory Committees, as they are required to do, that they are normally in employment, genuinely seeking work, and are unable to obtain it. They may, for instance, be soldiers' wives, who have been employed on war work, but now have their husbands home again, or they may have no real need to seek fresh employment. At the time when the munition factories were discharging their war-time workers practically all the women, if they wished to do so, could take out policies and lodge them for the payment of the out-of-work donation. Now that re-registration is being carried through thousands of policies are lapsing and are not being renewed, and in other cases the applicants are being registered according to their normal employment, instead of the occupation in which they have been engaged during the last two or three years.

Th fact that a large percentage of the women who have been drawing out-of-work pay are prepared, witho t obtaining definite industrial employment, to remove themselves from the list of the unemployed may perhaps be regarded as confirmation of the view held in official quarters, and frequently expressed in these columns, that the number of out-of-work donation policies lodged was not an entirely reliable guide to the extent of genuin unemployment. The legitimate inference is that numbers of women who were not in industrial life before the war, but who went into munition factories on the patriotic impulse, have taken advantage of the fairly generous provision made by the Government for all demobilized war workers, during what they would regard as a period of tolerably well-paid rest, and now that the donation is reduced they do not think it worth while to face the testing conditions involved in qualifying for an extension of the payments, and are content to resume the state either of woman's employment proper, or non-employment, to which they were accustomed before the war.

Return to Domestic Service.

One result of the altered conditions is that many more women are returning to domestic service. Taking the country as a whole, there are now three applications for every vacancy notified for day girls, three applications for every two vacancies for charwomen, and two applications for every three vacancies for indoor domestic servants. In the case of hotel servants the applications for employment exceed the number of vacancies. Outside domestic service, the applications for employment are much more numerous than the situations vacant.

The administrative work connected with the unemployment donation policies is very considerable. It is being done by the Claims and Records Office of the Ministry of Labour at Kew. The Department is housed on the Surrey side of the Thames, and previous to June, 1916, the site was covered by orchards and market gardens. The building, which is of the bungalow type, was originally erected to provide a Clearing House for the United Kingdom of the claims and records of persons insured under the National Insurance Act. During the war the Department has been concerned, however, with the National Service Volunteer forms and the index of the Home Army. Since the signing of the armistice there has also devolved upon it the work of checking unemployment donation payments and the distribution of Army demobilization forms. The latter task involves the examination of all the forms of men dispersed and disembodied from the Army, the classification of these forms according to occupation, and the resorting of the forms under the names of some 27,000 towns and villages, grouped round the employment exchanges in the United Kingdom. During busy periods about 150,000 forms have been dispatched every day, and a point has been made of ensuring that each week's work was done within the week. All the unemployment donations are now notified to the Department, and all the coupons forming the receipts for donations are sent to Kew for the purpose of checking and sorting. The coupons are received at the rate of about a million a week, and arrive in bundles with a covering schedule. Over 10,000,000 coupons had been received up to the end of March.

6,000 John Smiths in the Index.

The permanent work of the Department is continued side by side with its new duties, and the records and claims relating to workpeople insured against unemployment may be seen there in millions. The ledger room, for example, which measures 270ft. in length and 110ft. in width, contains a separate account of each insured person's contributions and benefit since the beginning of the scheme of Unemployment Insurance. In this room alone there are about 37,000 ledgers, containing over 7,000,000 accounts, all filed according to the workers' occupation. Now that the war is ended a great strain is being put on this and other rooms of the Department, since soldiers returning from the Battle Fronts to civil life often find they have lost their insurance books containing the record of their contributions. A copy of such lost accounts is required, and the task of tracking the missing records falls upon the Records and Claims Office.

An alphabetical index, consisting of loose-leaf registers of all insured workers, is of service on such a quest, but it must be remembered that there are 10,000,000 names on this index, of which some 6,000 are John Smith. In the present problem of "missing books," the ingenuity of the staff is exercised to the utmost, and clues are searched for in the letters from the applicants by means of the signature, place of occupation, and age of the writer.

The statistical section, with its accounting and tabulating machinery driven by electricity, is also of great aid in the present pressure of work. There, figures are transferred to machine cards by means of punching machines, the punched card being finally passed through sorting and tabulating machines at the rates of thousands per hour. In this, and in other respects, it is submitted that the Claims and Records Office provides a working model for other Government Departments dealing with matters requiring organization on a large scale.

Sheffield Independent 5.4.19

WOMEN WORKERS.

THE UNEMPLOYMENT PROBLEM IN SHEFFIELD.

Nearly 700 women were discharged from Sheffield works last week, but in spite of this fact the number of persons drawing out-of-work benefit has not materially increased. Indeed, for some weeks past unemployment in the city has remained practically stationary, and it is the view of an official prominent in labour circles, that "we have reached the crest of the wave." When industrial conditions become more stabilised the unemployed in Sheffield will be quickly absorbed, he said.

The amount paid in out-of-work donations yesterday was estimated at £26,000, which was the sum distributed the previous week. The placing of women in new situations is still proving the difficulty, though under this heading it is interesting to learn that the 700 new women claimants to out-of-work benefit have been counter-balanced by the number who have obtained work and others who have lapsed. The Government have made it increasingly difficult for a large number of the original women claimants to obtain a renewal of the benefit. Everything possible is being done to prevent fraud. Applicants have now to satisfy the rota of the Advisory Committee that (1) They were in normal employment; (2) genuinely seeking work; and (3) are unable to obtain it.

A good number of women who were discharged from the munition factories have returned to their pre-war occupation in the cutlery and silver trades, but in other skilled and semi-skilled trades the men workers have shown themselves distinctly averse to the admission of women.

"What we fear to be the cause of the great increase in the number of unemployed women is that the ranks of the men workers have been closed against them," said a well-known women's leader. "Women have no wish," she declared, "to keep the positions of men returning from France, and there is no intention whatever of undercutting. In fact, they would welcome the appointment of an outside influence—an advisory board of some kind—which would decide all cases on the basis of equal pay for equal output."

701/31

Hull Daily Mail

14/2/19

WOMEN'S LABOUR & THE DEMOBILISED

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "MAIL."

Sir,—Allow me a little space [illegible] ming the fix soldiers and sailors find themselves in on returning to civil life when searching for employment. I was demobilised three weeks ago from the navy, and intended to start the next day if I could obtain work, but nothing doing, the same old cry—"Sorry, we haven't anything to offer you; in fact, we shan't have enough vacancies for our own men when they return." That is quite right, they won't; and no wonder. As long as female labour is employed there won't be enough jobs for the men.

Then you hear of a shortage of domestic servants, but they won't have that. They would sooner [illegible] a man's place while he walks about the streets looking for a right to live. I think it was one of the conditions when the war broke out, that the woman should go when the man returned. I may state I joined some years before the war, so, therefore, having no job to return to. Hoping this will catch someone's eye and make this England a place fit for heroes to live in,—I am, Sir, etc.,

A DEMOBILISED SAILOR.

February 11th, 1919.

ARMY OF OCCUPATION.—"Father of one of the D.L.I." thinks that the youths of 18½ who are to be sent to the Rhine have no cause to grumble compared with the lads of similar age who were sent out into the firing line. He suggests such should replace the place of 18½ and any A1 men between the ages of 20 and 30.

STRIKES.—"Mons Soldier," after reading our leading article on the 3rd inst., says his disgust at the discovery that certain Continental Jews were responsible for the trouble on the Clyde knew no bounds. His solution is that it is time that all foreigners in this country, whether naturalised or not, should be regarded as aliens. If not, and these undercurrent methods of creating industrial strife are not stamped out, it will merely mean civil war in the end.

BOLSHEVISM.—A lengthy letter comes from "Democrat," who suggests that Bolshevism is the national outcome of the breaking of the bond of unity after the signing of the armistice, of which selfishness, rivalry, suspicion, and distrust of each other were the predecessors. The fight is now between Democracy and honest dealing as against Bolshevism with outlawry. He hopes the British working man will take to heart the remark of another correspondent to the "Mail" that Bolshevism is out to compass the absolute ruin of industry of the vast social structure that is dependent upon it

FLAG DAYS.—A correspondent who signs himself "Repatriated Prisoner of War" thinks "Newland Resident" and "Newington" are quite right in asking for a flag day for our returned prisoners of war. In his own experience, he states he went through more in three months than a lot of prisoners experienced in four years, because many of these men were sent straight into Germany and got parcels, whilst the others, including himself, were put behind the German lines in France, and never got a food parcel from home. But whatever the good or bad treatment accorded to the British prisoners, he thinks all deserve a flag day and equal treatment.

FAIRPLAY.—This correspondent has drawn two replies. "Grateful" thinks "Fairplay" went a shade too far when he advises women to "pack up." As the mother of three children, she states she must go out to work to maintain herself and them. It is no easy matter as she points out, for a woman to go out two or three days in the week and then have to do her own housework when she returns home. In many such instances the woman goes out through necessity and not from choice. The other correspondent, "One of the Boys" is surprised to note the large number of discharged soldiers in the town who are unable to follow their former employment. He agrees with "Fairplay" that until such men are reinstated, and especially in grocers' shops, the public should decline to patronise such shops if female labour is still employed.

THE HULL BATTALIONS.—A soldier signing himself "131, 12th. E.Y.R.," writes in reply to "One of the Originals," who in Monday's "Mail" suggested that some sort of a re-union of the officers, non-commissioned officers, and men of the original four Hull battalions that still remain should be arranged. He says:—In answer to "One of the Originals," I beg to inform him that his scheme has already been greatly talked about amongst the few originals, and several ideas have been suggested. The best of these is the suggestion that a club be formed, where they could still be comrades in the true sense of the word, and run on the same lines as the "Legion of Frontiersmen." This, I feel confident, would meet with the appreciation of all, and whist tournaments, smoking concerts, etc., could be arranged with ease. Should this meet with the approval of any of the original four Hull battalions, I, for one, would help to form a committee (pro tem.) to discuss the matter more fully.

Morning Post. 7.4.19

It has been found necessary to restrict, and in some cases stop, unemployment benefit pay to demobilised munition workers in Sheffield. Three hundred women who flatly refused to accept work in domestic service have been suspended from all benefit. At the present time 12,000 unemployed are on the list awaiting their turn for work.

The Pioneer 5.7.19.

The Unemployed Woman

LOW WAGES AND THE UNEMPLOYMENT DONATION.

There is a decided tendency to attribute the amount of unemployment among women to their unwillingness to accept work of any kind as long as they can obtain the unemployment donation. The charge is frequently made that when work is obtainable at the Labour Exchanges it is refused, and the public is allowed to draw the inference that the women workers are taking advantage of the unemployment benefit arrangements of a generous and forbearing Government. This inference is wrong, the Government is not generous and the women are not slackers. The unemployment donation for women is 25s. a week for the first thirteen weeks, with an allowance of 6s. for the first child and 3s. for other children; for the second period of thirteen weeks, the donation is reduced to 15s. for women. This is not generous. But it would be tolerable if unemployed women could really get the donation when they are out of work. The following list of cases for which the National Federation of Women Workers is able to vouch shows that in many instances, which could be multiplied by the hundred, the authorities are refusing to pay the donation to women who have refused to take jobs offered by the Labour Exchanges at wages ranging from 10s. 6d. to 18s. a week. We give letters instead of names in order not to injure the women concerned. First let us take some of these which deal with domestic service:—

REAL CASES.

A.—Offered daily domestic work. The Exchange stated that the wages were 10s. 6d., the employer said 2s. 6d. The hours were 7 a.m. to 5.30 p.m. The girl refused the work and was disallowed benefit because she did not attempt to bargain with the mistress.

B.—Was offered domestic service at £22, living in. She had been a servant before the war and had had £26, and she had a mother and four younger sisters whom she helped to support. In this case she was to provide uniform, and refused the job because she had not suitable clothing for living in, and this had been destroyed by the class of work she was on during the war. Her appeal was disallowed and benefit refused on the ground that, while she was earning the inflated wage of £2 during the war, she should have supplied herself with clothing to meet the emergency.

C.—Domestic Service (living in) was refused because her husband was expected home from active service. She was willing to take daily domestic work. Her appeal was disallowed on the ground that she should have stored her furniture and given up her home.

D.—Had a temporary job as cleaning assistant to a caretaker, with a wage of 16s. for four hours a day. She gave up the work because the woman whom she had replaced during illness was better, and this woman had nine children to support. She also considered the wages were insufficient for a permanent job, as she herself had one child. Unemployment benefit was refused.

Other cases in which various jobs had been offered have some notable features. For example:—

E. was offered kitchen work at a wage of 16s., minus 1s. 6d. deducted for food, and her fares amounted to 3s. 6d. a week. She refused the work because the wage was insufficient. Unemployment benefit was refused on appeal.

F. was dismissed from a company for which she was earning 27s. 3d. to 30s. a week. She was actually sent back to the same company for a different class of work from 16s. to 20s. The appeal to the Court of Referees in this case is not yet settled, but the first appeal was lost.

G., living at Enfield, was sent to an embroidery firm in Baker-street, London, and offered 12s. a week. Her employment donation was at first refused, but later on appeal was allowed.

H. was an experienced sack mender who was offered 12s. 6d. a week, and on refusing it her unemployment donation was stopped, but her appeal has not yet been heard.

I. was refused the unemployment benefit because she was sent to do work at heavy trucking, and she had a medical certificate showing that she was unfitted for such work. This case has been heard by the Court of Appeal, and it has been finally decided against the girl.

J. was offered laundry work, and stuck to it for three weeks, but found she could not make at the piece rate more than 12s. 9d. Her case was disallowed on appeal.

TRADES BOARDS MUST COME.

We think that these instances will go far to show how important it is that women all over the country should be urging the immediate necessity of taking some action. The need for an immediate statement of wages in the laundry trade and the clothing trades is quite obvious, and it is interesting to note that the Government has taken action with regard to the clothing trade which will go far to deal with the special difficulties of the situation. The Minister of Labour has issued on Order fixing the rates of wages varying from 7d. an hour for women and 4d. an hour for girls of 15 who are engaged in the manufacture of women's and children's clothing. This was a notoriously sweated trade, but during the war the employers found that they had to pay higher wages in order to keep their girls from the more attractive munitions work. Since the armistice was signed there arose the danger that these higher wages might be broken and the Wages (Temporary Regulation) Act only protected the workers in cases where there had been general awards or orders. In this particular trade these Orders only covered a very small part, and it would have taken a very long time to get a Trade Board established and an Order issued under it. The Minister of Labour has therefore taken advantage of a provision in the Wages' Act which provided that where there was no general award or Order the rates paid to women must be the rates paid to the majority of women in the trade "unless some other rate is fixed by the Minister on the advice of the Interim Court of Arbitration." An application that a rate should be fixed was made by trade unions representing women; it was referred to the Court of Arbitration; both parties were given an opportunity of being heard; the advice of the Court was received; and the Minister has acted on it at once by issuing the order now announced." It will, however, be necessary to get Trade Boards set up in this and other forms of employment, as the measures taken now by the Minister of Labour can only be a temporary one.

Daily News - 8. 4. 19

Some Bad Cases of Sweating.

OUT-OF-WORK DONATION REFUSED.

From Our Labour Correspondent.

There may be justification for the allegation that many people are deliberately avoiding work while they can draw unemployment donation, but, on the other hand, each day adds to the accumulation of evidence which shows that the powers exercised by the Courts of Referees are frequently used in such a way as to foster the growth of sweating. It is unthinkable that what is being done can have the approval of the Minister of Labour, who, at the meetings of the Industrial Conference, has manifested an earnest desire to improve the lot of the unorganised workers, but unless Sir Robert Horne without delay institutes a thorough inquiry into the working of the Courts of Referees scheme he will bring a grave reproach upon his Department.

There is an impression abroad that the story of the stoppage of unemployment donation begins and ends with the cases of girls who refuse domestic employment. That is far from the truth, but advantage is being taken of the public indifference for which this belief is responsible to commit great injustice against women—many of them widows with children to maintain—who are anxious to obtain work at a reasonable wage

CHARRING DECLINED.

Here are a few typical instances which have been noted recently by the officials of the Women's Trade Union League at various courts of referees in London:

A woman was offered through a Labour Exchange brass cleaning and general charring at an hotel. Hours 8 a.m. to 6 p.m., seven days a week. Wages 16s., without food. She refused the work. Donation disallowed.

A skilled shirt ironer accepted work in a laundry on piece terms. At the end of two days, working from 8.30 a.m. until 7 p.m., she found she had earned a total of 4s. 6d. and 9d. bonus. As her fare was 2d. a day, and she had to pay 1s. 6d. a day to get her children cared for, she threw up the job. Unemployment donation refused by a Camberwell Court.

A woman was offered 15s. a week, with dinner and tea, for cleaning in a prosperous City restaurant. As her fares would have cost 3s. a week she declined. Donation stopped.

Three girls, anxious for work, accepted on trial an offer from a boot polish factory. They found that in addition to filling tins and fastening on lids they were expected to chop beeswax and scrub tables for 15s. a week. They gave up the work at the end of a week. Donation stopped yesterday.

SECRET COURTS.

A girl who had just recovered from a serious operation was sent to a laundry at 25s. a week She found that she could not endure work involving constant standing, and she submitted to the court a medical certificate to that effect. She was willing to accept any work for which she was physically fitted. Donation disallowed yesterday

The courts of referees sit in secret, frequently there is no woman member, even though a member of the women's panel may be present, the choice of some chairmen is unfortunate, and sufficient care is not taken to choose members who are likely to be impartial

An immediate end should be made of decisions by courts of referees which inflict great hardships on helpless women and encourage employers who wish to preserve the worst industrial conditions of pre-war days. W M.

Times 8. 4. 19

701.

701/32

RETURN TO INDUSTRY.

154,000 MEN RELEASED FROM THE NAVY.

WOMEN AND OUT-OF-WORK DONATION.

Out of 250,000 men to be demobilized from the Navy 154,000 had been released up to the end of March. The percentage of release in the Navy has been rather lower than that in the Army, but this is attributed to closer adherence to the demobilization scheme as originally planned, whereby men have been set free in accordance with the requirements of industry and commerce. The corollary of this is that the proportion of ex-Navy men out of employment at the present time is smaller than the proportion in the other services.

Of the various groups of industries which contributed men to the Navy, seamen and fishermen have had considerably the largest number of men returned to them. According to an analysis of 146,521 certificates so far examined, and excluding naval officers, the distribution of demobilization according to industries has been as follows:—

Seamen and fishermen	27,292
Engineering and metal trades	24,219
Commercial and clerical..	13,419
Railways and transport	12,491
Coal and shale mining	9,867
Brick and building trades	8,958
Agriculture	8,486
Employees of public authorities ..	8,102
General labourers..	5,722

In no other group did the number of releases reach 5,000. In the case of naval auxiliaries engaged on such vital defensive work as sweeping the seas, the greater part of the work of the trawlers and drifters has been completed, and the demobilization of vessels as well as men, is now in progress. In order that they might be used in war, the fish-holds of the vessels were taken out for the berthing of the crews, and other alterations were made. Now the fish-holds have to be replaced, and necessary repairs have to be made before the boats are ready for sea again. Industrial unrest, as previously stated in The Times, has interfered with the work of refitting, and at the end of last month 997 trawlers and 1,125 drifters were still waiting to be reconditioned before being returned to their previous owners.

Army demobilization is slackening. The highest figure was reached in the week ended February 1, when 240,641 men were released. In the last week of March 106,000 men were demobilized, as against 109,000, and 115,000 in the two previous weeks. Naval demobilization, which at one period rose to 18,000 a week, now stands at about 5,000 a week.

Training Men for Land Work.

A scheme of cooperation has been arranged between the Ministry of Labour and the Board of Agriculture, to train and place ex-service men desirous of obtaining work on the land in England or Wales. By the system adopted men not immediately qualified to earn the full district agricultural rate may, if suitable, be sent by a county agricultural executive committee to a training centre for a period of tuition, normally not over six weeks. During training the Board of Agriculture will pay the men 30s. a week, less 17s. 6d. if boarded and lodged at the centre. Married men with dependents may claim also 2s. 6d. or 1s. 6d. a day subsistence allowance, according as their dependents rely wholly or partly on them. The scheme further provides for the training of soldiers and ex-service men in tractor-driving and other farm work in a school at Brentwood.

The names of men applying at an employment exchange for agricultural work, for whom such training may seem desirable, will be submitted by the exchange manager to the appropriate official on the county agricultural executive committee.

Disputed Claims for Unemployment Pay.

In view of the growing feeling that applications for the out-of-work donation should be closely scrutinized before payments are made, it is interesting to note that up to March 20 practically 4,000 sittings had been held of the Courts of referees to whom disputed claims are submitted. The Courts during this period dealt with 73,238 cases, and no fewer than 39,906 claims were disallowed. In the case of women the unsuccessful applications represented 77 per cent. of the whole.

An important decision has been given by one of the Courts which may have a considerable effect on the return to domestic service. A young woman, 21 years of age, who had been unemployed for six weeks, was offered a situation in domestic service, where she would live in and receive £22 a year. The woman in her last employment had been paid 38s. a week, but had previously earned 12s. 6d. a week in a warehouse. She refused the offer of domestic service on the ground that the wages were inadequate, and expressed an intention of declining all offers of work where the wages were lower than 25s. a week. Her claim, however, was disallowed, as it was held that a wage of £22 a year with board and lodging was quite equivalent to the wages she would have obtained if she had remained in her pre-war employment, and was also equivalent to the 25s. a week for which she asked.

There is at present a brisk demand for women in the rubber tire industry in the South-west of England, and women net-braiders are also required in Yorkshire, owing to the resumption of deep-sea fishing.

Hull Daily Mail 30. 4. 19

THE WOMEN WORKERS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "DAILY MAIL."

SIR,—As to women workers, why is it that all the insults are thrown on the women? Why not throw some for the masters? I myself am working in a man's place, but still, if I give it up, my employer will start another girl in my place? Is it right that I should throw myself out of work for another of my sex to go to it? If our men came back, I, like others, am willing to give it up for them, as it is only fair that they should have it back again. I have been employed in this place for four years, and then have to be insulted in the street, whilst on my way to work—"When are you going to throw your — job up, and let your men come back?" I am willing to give it up TO-DAY if the men are ready to start, but my idea is this, that all the time that some of the street-corner men are drawing the out-of-work 29 shillings, they will not work themselves, and they are not satisfied with that, but they must insult a single young woman who has to help to keep four children. If these men want work, or the work I am on, why don't they visit the masters a bit oftener, instead of insulting women who have worked and tried to help, whilst our lads did their bit? If there is so much jealousy over the women workers, why not let all the men who are working where women are employed, protest to their masters, and so stop all insults thrown out to the women in the streets.—I am, Sir, etc.,

ONE WHO WORKS NIGHTS AND DAYS.

May 29th, 1919.

SIR,—Reading your last night's issue I am pleased to see the Hull Tramways Committee are moving in regard to ex-Service men being employed on cars, also I am surprised to see the number of women still left when you consider there are so many men unemployed in Hull. It certainly has caused bad feeling, but now I trust others will follow the Committee's example, as it was an understood thing that it was only for the war period. Now there is no excuse that men cannot be had.—I am, Sir, etc.,

Hull. May 29th, 1919. OBSERVER.

Daily News 19.4.'19.

WOMEN AND OUT-OF-WORK PAY

To the Editor of The Daily News.

Sir,—Your correspondent, Mr. Philip Walsh, submits a list of questions, which we repeat with the appropriate answers.

Q. "If in the cases cited, injustice was done by the Court of Referees, why were they not taken up to the Umpire?"

A. All the cases mentioned have been referred to the Umpire and are now awaiting a hearing. A favourable decision by the Umpire, however, still leaves the worker under some hardship, as when the Court of Referees disallows a case, unemployment donation is immediately stopped, pending the hearing by the Umpire. There are often delays varying from three to six weeks or more before the Umpire's decision is made.

Q. "Is it alleged that the Courts went against facts?"

A. Yes: this is exactly what we do say. We consider that on the facts unjust decisions are given, frequently in the teeth of opposition from the workers' representative. Further, women's cases are frequently heard when there is no woman representative as a member of the Court.

Q. "Is it proposed that the private circumstances of the applicants for donation should be discussed in public?"

A. Yes, certainly, in all Courts of Law the private circumstances of the parties are and must be discussed, and the presence of the public is admittedly desirable in the interests of justice

We repeat that the tendency of the Court of Referees and the Umpire is to force applicants into situations where the wage is too low, or the conditions unreasonable. Here are one or two typical cases.

Mrs. H—— applied for employment as an office-cleaner. She was sent to a situation which was to give her employment for two hours daily, Saturdays from 1 to 4.30 p.m., wages 10s. per week. Mrs. H—— discovered the building to be in a very dirty state and there was so much work to do that the work could not possibly have been completed in the time she was supposed to attend. She, therefore, demanded a higher wage for the extra time she would have to spend. This was refused so she did not accept the employment. Her claim was disallowed by the Court of Referees on the 3rd March, and the Umpire confirmed this decision on the 1st April.

Nellie M—— was offered employment as a general at 35s. per month, but refused as she had never done domestic work before and had previously always worked in a brewery. Her case was disallowed by the Court of Referees on the 12th February and this decision was confirmed by the Umpire on the 31st March.

Florence R——, of Llanelly, aged 18, was offered work as a dressmaker at Lowestoft (the extreme opposite side of the country, and a town where there are already numbers of unemployed women) but refused on the ground that she could not take work such a long distance from home. The claim was disallowed by the Court of Referees on the 12th February and by the Umpire on the 2nd April, 1919.

MARGARET G. BONDFIELD.

National Federation of Women Workers, Malet-street, W.C.

Parliamentary Debates 7.5.'18.

MUNITIONS.

— Vaccination —

NATIONAL FILLING FACTORY, HAYES.

26 and 27. Mr. CHANCELLOR asked the Minister of Munitions (1) whether any orders have been or will be issued to officers in charge of factories or of work under the Ministry, or to controlled establishments, or to contractors engaged in Government work, to use threats of dismissal or other forms of pressure upon employés which would deprive them of their legal rights as citizens, including the right to refuse vaccination or any other form of medical treatment not required by law; (2) whether Mrs. A. Fullum, 52, Hammond Road East, Southall Green, has been employed for nearly two years at the No. 7 National Filling Factory, Hayes, Middlesex; that on 26th April she received a notice calling on her to be vaccinated, and that on refusal she was interviewed by Miss Whitmarsh, the lady superintendent, and, on persisting in her refusal, was summarily dismissed with a week's pay; whether revaccination, which is not legally compulsory on anybody, is being enforced on employés in the national filling factories; if not, whether this penalising of an employé for exercising her legal right to resist an attempt to compel by order what cannot be compelled by law will be stopped, and employés under Government no longer deprived of the liberty they possess if employed by other individuals; and whether Mrs. Fullum will be re-employed without an illegal enforcement upon her of revaccination?

The PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARY to the MINISTRY of MUNITIONS (Mr. Kellaway): No general orders have been given by the Minister as suggested in question 26, nor does he contemplate giving any such orders. As regards the case at the filling factory at Hayes, the facts are substantially as stated in the question. The matter has been submitted to the Medical Department of the Ministry for consideration, and I am advised that the situation in regard to small-pox in London does not warrant the measure taken by the filling factory in question, which has been advised accordingly, and steps will be taken to offer re-employment to the worker concerned.

701/33 701

Times 20.3.19. House of Commons

OUT-OF-WORK DONATIONS.

Mr. LAMBERT (Devon, South Molton, L.) asked the Minister for Labour why £1,200,000 a week was paid in out-of-work donations while there were industries seriously crippled for want of labour and in view of the number of situations in domestic service waiting to be filled.

Mr. WARDLE, Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Labour (Stockport, Lab.), said the vacancies notified to the Employment Exchanges did not indicate that there were industries which were seriously crippled for want of labour; in fact, in practically every occupation the number of workpeople unemployed exceeded the demand. With regard to domestic service vacancies, the demand exceeded the numbers of applicants who registered for domestic work, but no opportunity was lost of offering domestic work to any applicant who, from her previous record, appeared suitable for that kind of employment.

Mr. LAMBERT.—Does the hon. gentleman really mean to suggest that there are not a very large number of employers in the country who are actually crying out for labour? Mr. WARDLE.—I mean to suggest that we have no applications from them. COLONEL ASHLEY (Fylde, C.U.).—Has the hon. gentleman never heard of the very grave shortage of labour for agriculture? LIEUTENANT-COLONEL SIR S. HOARE (Chelsea, C.U.).—Is the hon. gentleman aware that there were 30,000 applications for women in the last few weeks and only 7,000 have been placed? Mr. WARDLE.—It depends on the kind of work. In regard to domestic service there were different conditions applying. BRIGADIER-GENERAL PAGE-CROFT (Bournemouth, N.P.).—Is the hon. gentleman aware that thousands of men and women are refusing employment which has been definitely offered them? (Hear, hear.) A Labour Member.—And is the hon. gentleman also aware that in most of these cases trade union rates are not offered? Mr. WARDLE.—I have no evidence of the thousands of cases to which the hon. and gallant gentleman refers. If such evidence is forthcoming, I will certainly look into it. Mr. J. JONES (Silvertown, Lab.).—Have there been any applications for employment by the unemployed rich?

WOMEN'S CLOTHING TRADES.

Mr. WARDLE, replying to LIEUTENANT-COLONEL W. GUINNESS (Bury St. Edmunds, C.U.), stated that, in agreement with the principal associations of employers and workpeople concerned, he proposed to apply the Trade Boards Acts to the women's clothing trades, including dressmaking. The functions of the contemplated boards would be to fix minimum rates of wages, to regulate conditions of employment in the manner provided by the Acts, and to advise the Government on industrial matters affecting their trades. Expenses and subsistence allowances would be allowed to members of the boards on a scale authorized by the Treasury, but the annual cost would, of course, depend on the number of meetings which the boards found it necessary to hold.

23.4.'19

SIR R. HORNE, answering Mr. MARRIOTT (Oxford, C.U.), said:—The number of individuals who have at any time drawn donation cannot be precisely stated. The number of persons actually in receipt of unemployment donation on March 21 was 738,000 civilians and 265,000 ex-members of H.M. Forces. The amount paid out in donation up to March 21 was about £19,000,000 for civilians and £2,000,000 for ex-members of H.M. Forces. On March 26, 45,316 applications for renewal of policies had been received. Of this number 24,360 had been granted and 7,906 rejected; 13,053 were still under consideration. I am aware that there are many complaints that unemployment donation is improperly obtained. I have no statistics on the subject, but I shall welcome the opportunity of making inquiries into any specific cases which may come to the notice of hon. members if they will give me the facts. LIEUTENANT-COMMANDER ASTBURY (Salford, W., U.).—Is the right hon. gentleman aware that in Lancashire men are refusing to work after Wednesday night in order that they may receive three days' out-of-work donation, making a total of 57s. 6d. per week, with 3s. for the first child and 1s. 6d. for other children? SIR R. HORNE.—I am not aware of the facts stated by the hon. member. There is, I know, very great depression in the cotton trade of Lancashire, which is caused directly by the policy of the country. If the hon. member will give me the facts which he has observed, I will inquire into them.

UNEMPLOYMENT DONATION.

SIR R. HORNE, Minister of Labour (Glasgow, Hillhead, C.U.), in reply to LIEUTENANT-COLONEL SIR S. HOARE (Chelsea, C.U.), said:—The number of men, boys, women, and girls who drew unemployment donation during the week ended March 28, 1919, are:—

	Civilians.	Ex-members of H.M. Forces.	Total.
Men	209,486	305,251	514,737
Boys	26,461	—	26,461
Women ..	488,655	1,012	489,667
Girls	29,380	—	29,380
Grand total ..			1,060,245

During the week the amount of donation paid was approximately £1,250,000.

SIR S. HOARE.—Would it not be better to subsidize public works so as to find employment for these people? SIR R. HORNE.—I entirely agree. It would be better, and it is being done. CAPTAIN R. TERRELL (Henley, C.U.).—Is the right hon. gentleman aware that a large number of laundries are unable to get women workers? (An HON. MEMBER.—"They will not pay the proper rate.") SIR R. HORNE.—I am aware of the fact, but difficulties arise in connexion with the wages offered. Mr. MACMASTER (Chertsey, C.U.).—Is the right hon. gentleman aware that the unemployment donation has led in many instances to idleness and preying on the public purse? (Hear, hear.) SIR R. HORNE.—I am afraid it is true that there is a certain amount of abuse of the unemployment donation, and I shall be glad if hon. members will furnish me with information.

Portsmouth Evening News
9.9.'19.

CORRESPONDENCE.

"WORK FOR WOMEN."

[To the Editor of the "Evening News."]

Sir,—May I, through the columns of the "News," be allowed to comment upon your article headed "Work for Women," which appeared in your issue of August 13th. A lady of my acquaintance—a war widow—was discharged from the Dockyard and duly registered her name at the Labour Exchange. Eventually, a card from the Exchange invited her to attend a lecture at the Town Hall. This she did, and listened to a very encouraging discourse, the particulars of which were recorded in the "Evening News," as stated above.

My friend was very keen about the idea, and filled in a form there and then, asking to be trained in cooking. No mention was made of "needy cases" at any time during the discussion.

A day or two later, she received a second card to appear before the Committee. The Committee questioned and cross-questioned her in a manner which suggested she had no right to be there, and finally told her there were "more needy cases than hers"—this on the top of the statement that the demand for domestics far exceeded the supply! I really forget how many forms she has had to fill in since then, but every day's visit to the Exchange brought forth the same query, "Do you still wish to go in for the training scheme?"

She has been sent to a dozen places or more, in search of temporary employment, until the "training should begin," and, of course, nobody wanted a person who would be there about a week or so—that's quite obvious to anyone! No "out-of-work" donation has been received, and the whole business was so absurd, that she told the clerk quite frankly that she would not be humbugged about any longer, and left.

To-day, a notice was received stating, "You will not receive any further out-of-work donations"—the "any further" is too funny for words.

I can't think what the ladies forming the Committee are about, but I suppose someone has been allotted the training. If the "active trade of England" is to be "revived" by much of the discouraging business I refer to, we shan't get a move on very quickly. At any rate, a little more "do," and less "talkee-talkee" will help quite a lot! I wonder if any other ladies have had similar experiences?

Yours faithfully,
"ONLOOKER."

Times 23.9.'19

WOMEN'S CORPS.

DEMOBILIZATION DELAYS.

CASE OF UXBRIDGE.

Officially we are told that the demobilization of Queen Mary's Women's Army Auxiliary Corps and the Women's Royal Air Force is being rapidly carried out. Yet in large centres and in many towns and villages the uniformed women are so much in evidence as to cause the public to doubt whether the authorities really are pursuing a policy of demobilizing these forces. The correspondence columns of The Times show that all over the country the presence in the streets of apparently idle women in uniform is being resented.

We are within sight of the first anniversary of the signing of the Armistice, and, according to official information, there are still 8,000 W.A.A.C.'s in France. It is stated that they are doing useful work as cooks and as clerks at the salvage depôts. We learn, however, that those young women have more leisure than ever they had, and it has become necessary for the Young Women's Christian Association, which has been doing splendid welfare work through the medium of the Blue Triangle Huts, to renew its appeal for assistance to generous-hearted people to enable the hut work to be carried on in France.

A prominent official of the Y.W.C.A. informed a representative of The Times that, while there could be no doubt that the W.A.A.C.'s had done magnificent work and had justified the formation of the corps during the war, she felt that it would be a good thing if they were returned from France and demobilized. "I do not think," she added, "that the public realize the services these women have rendered. Many of the girls were pressed to join, and they did so at great personal sacrifice. Many of those in France are very anxious to get home, but the authorities consider that they are engaged in useful work, and they are being pressed to sign on till next April. There is no doubt that it is much more economical to have women doing the work than men. I do not think the women are staying in the corps because they want to."

Among the many places where the attractive blue uniform of the W.R.A.F.'s is considered out of keeping with the times is Uxbridge. Here are quartered many women in an extensive camp which, from outside appearances, must be one of the show places of the R.A.F. It is beautifully situated in Hillingdon Park. The camp buildings are of a permanent character, being constructed of bricks and concrete and roofed with blue slates. A palatial cinema which dominates the camp is now closed for alterations and improvements. The camp attractions also include tennis courts for the officers. At present the camp is described as a R.A.F. Depôt, but there are those who think that this is "camouflage." At all events, there are about 4,000 young men, who are spending their "working" hours at infantry drill. What the W.R.A.F.'s do no one knows. It was rumoured in the town some weeks ago that all the women were to be demobilized, but they are still very much in evidence.

Two miles distant one may come across scores of blue-uniformed women in the lanes of Ruislip and Ickenham. Here the R.A.F. have another interesting exhibit in the form of the Ruislip Stores Depôt. There are hundreds of W.R.A.F.'s attached to it. Unlike the Uxbridge depôt, however, it has this merit that it provides employment for a large number of discharged soldiers.

W.A.A.C.'S IN FRANCE.

OFFICIAL INQUIRY INTO NUMBERS AND WORK.

We understand that the W.A.A.C.'s now employed in France (chiefly at Boulogne and Wimereux) have forwarded to Whitehall a protest against what they term "the gross misrepresentations" which have been published in the Press as to the way in which they employ their time. The War Office has consequently asked for a detailed report as to the precise numbers now serving at the various camps and the work on which they are engaged.

On making inquiry of the military authorities at Salisbury yesterday our Correspondent there was unable to obtain figures relating to reductions in the number of women employed in military services, but was informed that it was being reduced as quickly as possible, and that it was hoped by the end of the year women's service would be done away with altogether. Those remaining were, it was stated, fully employed.

In the Winchester area a considerable reduction has been made this week at Worthy Down Flying School, practically the whole of the female staff being demobilized. Reductions have also been made at Morn Hill repatriation camp, and to a lesser extent at the Pay Office. The women left are kept fully employed on necessary work.

In reply to representations made to the War Office by the Comrades of the Great War as to the continued employment of women drivers of War Office vehicles while ex-Service men are still unemployed, the Secretary of the War Office has written stating that, in order to enable men to be demobilized in France, it was necessary to obtain 1,000 women drivers, which was arranged partly by combing out at home and partly by special enlistment. All recruiting for women drivers has now, however, ceased, and instructions have been given that they are to be replaced as soon as possible by enlisted soldiers. A considerable number of civilians are also being employed in this capacity, but these will also be replaced by enlisted men as soon as they become available.

701

701/35

Times.

10.4.19.

UNEMPLOYMENT DONATION.

SIR R. HORNE, Minister of Labour (Glasgow, Hillhead, C.U.), in reply to LIEUTENANT-COLONEL SIR S. HOARE (Chelsea, C.U.), said :—The number of men, boys, women, and girls who drew unemployment donation during the week ended March 28, 1919, are :—

	Civilians.	Ex-members of H.M. Forces.	Total.
Men	209,486	305,251	514,737
Boys	26,461	—	26,461
Women ..	488,655	1,012	489,667
Girls	29,380	—	29,380
Grand total ..			1,060,245

During the week the amount of donation paid was approximately £1,250,000.

SIR S. HOARE.—Would it not be better to subsidize public works so as to find employment for these people? SIR R. HORNE.—I entirely agree. It would be better, and it is being done. CAPTAIN R. TERRELL (Henley, C.U.).—Is the right hon. gentleman aware that a large number of laundries are unable to get women workers? (AN HON. MEMBER.—"They will not pay the proper rate.") SIR R. HORNE.—I am aware of the fact, but difficulties arise in connexion with the wages offered. MR. MACMASTER (Chertsey, C.U.).—Is the right hon. gentleman aware that the unemployment donation has led in many instances to idleness and preying on the public purse? (Hear, hear.) SIR R. HORNE.—I am afraid it is true that there is a certain amount of abuse of the unemployment donation, and I shall be glad if hon. members will furnish me with information.

SIR R. HORNE, asked by COLONEL W. THORNE (Plaistow, Lab.) whether he was aware of the practice of the Courts of Referees to disallow donation benefit to young women who declined to undertake night-work, although the Factory Acts specially provide that young persons should not be called upon to undertake nightwork, replied :—So far as I am aware it is not the practice of Courts of Referees to disallow donation benefit in the circumstances mentioned. If the hon. and gallant member will give me particulars of any such cases of refusal as have come to his knowledge, I will make inquiries and let him know the result.

SIR R. HORNE, answering MR. MARRIOTT (Oxford, C.U.), said :—The number of individuals who have at any time drawn donation cannot be precisely stated. The number of persons actually in receipt of unemployment donation on March 21 was 738,000 civilians and 265,000 ex-members of H.M. Forces. The amount paid out in donation up to March 21 was about £10,000,000 for civilians and £2,000,000 for ex-members of H.M. Forces. On March 26, 45,319 applications for renewal of policies had been received. Of this number 24,360 had been granted and 7,906 rejected; 13,053 were still under consideration. I am aware that there are many complaints that unemployment donation is improperly obtained. I have no statistics on the subject, but I shall welcome the opportunity of making inquiries into any specific cases which may come to the notice of hon. members if they will give me the facts. LIEUTENANT-COMMANDER ASTBURY (Salford, W., U.).—Is the right hon. gentleman aware that in Lancashire men are refusing to work after Wednesday night in order that they may receive three days' out-of-work donation, making a total of 57s. 6d. per week, with 3s. for the first child and 1s. 6d. for other children? SIR R. HORNE.—I am not aware of the facts stated by the hon. member. There is, I know, very great depression in the cotton trade of Lancashire, which is caused directly by the policy of the country. If the hon. member will give me the facts which he has observed, I will inquire into them.

British Australasian
11.9.19.

Women War Workers for Australia.—The women's delegation, which has come to Melbourne under the auspices of the British Government to enquire into the possibility of making arrangements for the settlement of British women demobilised from the service, on September 5 interviewed the Minister of Lands, who has assured the members of the delegation that he will give them every possible facility.—Reuter.

The British Mission, which is seeking a chance to transport English land women to Australia, is meeting with very little success, all the States declaring that the whole of their activities is required to settle repatriated soldiers. The fact is that, although there is ample land and opportunities are plentiful, the nation still does not appreciate the pressing necessity of increasing the population in order to bear the burdens created by the war.—

Sect. Mercury
23.9.19

Women Workers Departing.

Without appearing ungallant I may be permitted to place on record my unfeigned pleasure on hearing to-day that by October 3rd nearly all of the women 'bus conductors, underground, etc., in the employ of the Traffic Combine will have departed from the service. Their record of duty well done is seriously blemished by their habitual and aggressive incivility, and a callous disregard for the welfare of their passengers. Their shrewish behaviour will remain one of the unpleasantest memories of the war's vicissitudes.

Globe. Sep. 9. '19.

FEWER WOMEN GET DOLE

DOES NOT MEAN THAT MORE HAVE WORK.

BY OUR WOMAN REPRESENTATIVE.

ALTHOUGH new official statistics show, roughly, a reduction of 100,000 in the number of women who get the dole, an analysis of the numbers re-entering industry cannot be said to throw a very hopeful light on the progress of reconstruction. The actual comparative figures given as to the number of women civilians and women in H.M. Forces who have ceased to benefit under the unemployment donation scheme are :—

June	171,703
August	5,762

The decrease is accounted for in various ways.

Most important of these is the fact that unemployment donation policies cease automatically at the end of thirteen weeks; these policies are only renewed in very special circumstances.

Absorption into various industries is also responsible for the decrease, but this, it must be admitted, does not show a very bright prospect.

❖ ❖ ❖

Cotton Workers.

In cotton weaving the number of women on the "live" registers of the Employment Bureau on July 18 was 9,687. By August 15 this number was reduced to 2,682. But the main reason for this reduction is the settling of the cotton strike.

In the flax and linen trades, roughly there are about half the number of unemployed compared with July figures; and the same applies to the hosiery trade. In pottery the numbers are about the same. In the shirtmaking trade and among the seamstresses the number of unemployed has gone down considerably. Among clerks and typists there are a thousand less on the register than there were in July. This is looked upon by those who know as one of the most overcrowded of women's callings.

Shop assistants show a decrease of fifteen hundred in the unemployment figures between July 18 and August 15.

The main difficulty is where the unskilled worker is concerned; there are various training schemes, but these do not always meet the case.

There are unskilled war workers, in instances perhaps where the women are widows, who return to a domestic life and look after their children; in others they take up odd jobs, or go into another occupation.

"Domestic work is certainly being undertaken very much more willingly by women," said one official. They are beginning to realise that once we find suitable work for them they must accept the situation or lose the unemployment dole."

13.6.19.

Times

5/6/19

A Welcome Effect.

The reduction in the out-of-work pay has already had a beneficial effect upon the number of returned men seeking employment, and it is fully expected that after the holidays the gaps in the factory will begin to fill up. The greatest shortage is in female labour, and especially in the closing room. Why such is the case it is difficult to define, because any smart girl can earn her 50s. to 60s. per week. In Northamptonshire a number of clothing and blouse factories have been established, and it is given as an explanation of the shortage of female labour in the shoe trade that the girls prefer the clothing factories on account of their super-cleanliness, and further, that they utilise the knowledge they acquire in making much of their own clothing, which is, of course, very probable. As to the relative cleanliness of the factories, there cannot be much, if any, difference. The stitching room of the shoe factory to-day leaves little to be desired, and it may be that a little sentiment lies at the bottom of the matter, and that the girls think it better to be known as blouse makers than shoe operatives.

Westminster Gazette.

AUGUST 8 1919

TO RELIEVE FAMINE.

To the Editor of the "Westminster Gazette."

Sir,—The Government has invoked the help of the British people in relieving the distress from famine in Europe and Asia Minor. Lord Robert Cecil has expressed the hope that the relief agencies appealing to the public under the Government's offer to double all voluntary gifts (up to £200,000) raised in the United Kingdom "will receive response that will bring to some millions of children . . . a message of practical sympathy." "There is no doubt whatever," said Lord Robert in the Commons on the 21st ult., "that in large parts of Central Europe, including some parts of Germany, the children, the babies, are actually dying from want of food and want of milk. I do not believe that can be questioned."

Other distinguished men appeal to us. Lord Curzon sends out "an urgent call to the people of the British Empire to play their part in the great task of reconciliation and mercy." General Smuts asks us all "to exert ourselves to the utmost in the great work of saving the wreckage of life and industry." Sir William Goode, British Director of Relief Missions in Paris, writes to tell us that twelve and a half millions are being spent by our Government in Europe, and this sum will all be used up or allocated before the harvest. Still there will be urgent need, he says, for medical comforts and for supplementary food, particularly for the children.

Will you be so good as to allow us space to remind your readers that the Save the Children Fund (Hon. Sec., Mrs. Buxton, 329, High Holborn, W.C.1) has set itself the task of carrying this message to the nation? This is a central Relief Fund to be administered through the various excellent relief agencies which are at work in different parts of the famine areas. The Fund does not confine itself within the limitations of the Government grant (Germany and part of Russia are excluded from benefit) but sends help where help is most needed, irrespective of nationality. Donations, however, may be earmarked for any particular country. "What you have already done," writes Mr. C. K. Butler, Head of the British Mission to Vienna, "has been and will be of incalculable benefit to the suffering."

This great work is the first life-saving scheme of international scope, and it may prove to be the greatest mission that compassionate men have ever embarked upon. It can only succeed if people of all classes, parties, and beliefs will unite and ally their efforts with those of the Government.—Yours, &c.,

HENRY BENTINCK. MARY R. MACARTHUR.
August 7. BUCKMASTER. PAMELA MCKENNA.

EX-SERVICE MEN AND WOMEN OUT OF WORK.

EXTENSION OF DONATION PERIOD.

In consideration of the fact that among the 400,000 demobilized sailors, soldiers, and airmen who have not yet been reabsorbed into industry there are a number who have now exhausted the 26 weeks out-of-work donation provided for ex-members of the Forces without finding employment, the Government have decided to extend the donation period for these men by a further period of 13 weeks at a reduced rate. This decision was foreshadowed in The Times of Monday.

Under the original scheme, every fighting man under commissioned rank, and every mobile member of the Women's Corps attached to the fighting services, receives on demobilization an out-of-work donation policy entitling the recipient to an allowance of 29s. per week in the case of men and 25s. per week in the case of women, plus 6s. a week for the first dependent child under the age of 15, and 3s. a week for every additional child under that age, during a period of 26 weeks in the first 12 months following demobilization.

Of the millions of sailors, soldiers, and airmen demobilized to date whose furlough has expired, over 80 per cent. have been absorbed in civil employment. The balance includes men who suffer some form of disability which makes it more difficult to place them in industry. Employment is increasing, and the Government believes that it will gradually become adequate to provide places for the great majority of employable people; but at the same time the Government realizes that this condition cannot be immediate, and that the men and women of the fighting services have claims to special consideration. Therefore, it has been decided, subject to certain conditions, to extend the period during which donation may be received in the first year by an additional 13 weeks. The donation in this second period will be as follows:—

MEN	20s. per week
WOMEN	15s. per week

with the same allowances for dependent children as in the first period.

Employers are reminded that, by notifying their vacancies, existing or potential, to the nearest Employment Exchange, or, in the case of men of higher education, to the nearest District Directorate of the Appointments Department, they will assist the Ministry of Labour in finding employment for men and women who are now seeking work.

Weekly Dispatch
21. 9. '19

HELD UP BY LACK OF WOMEN WORKERS.

Trades Which Complain of Lowered Output.

50,000 STILL GET DOLES.

While the number of women receiving Government benefit is rather more than 50,000, official reports from big centres of industry show that output is in many instances handicapped by the difficulty of obtaining female labour.

According to the Board of Trade Gazette the shortage of woman labour in the factories or woollen and worsted goods, hosiery and silk, is felt principally in the West Riding of Yorkshire, Leicester, and Scotland.

The Lancs cotton trade is suffering partly from the scarcity of coal, but the shortage of weavers—a big percentage of whom are women—has caused some slackness among the other operatives. The Dundee jute trade also could find work for many more people in all departments.

As a result of the inability to secure a sufficient number of women machinists, many of the male operatives in the Northampton boot factories are working short time in some of the departments.

Employment is good in the centres where ready-made clothing is turned out in large quantities. Leeds has plenty of work for many more women.

The same applies to the shirt and collar trades. There is a marked scarcity of women machinists, especially in London and Manchester.

In all branches of dressmaking and millinery, in London, Manchester, and Glasgow, there is a demand for machinists' finishers; in fact, for every class of worker. Wholesale mantle, costume, and blouse makers are in a position to employ many more women.

A similar report comes from the corset trade. There is a demand also by several firms for more workpeople in what are described as the food preparation trades. These include the manufacture of cocoa, chocolate, sugar, and other confectionery. In some of the departments the demand is so great that overtime is being worked.

STILL REIGNS.

inspecting a British Tank Corps school South Russia. ["Weekly Dispatch."

SCORE FOR MUNITION GIRLS.

Every week, however, brings a further decrease in the number of women on the unemployment roll.

The Ministry of Labour, who have taken over from the Ministry of Pensions the task of training women, have 42 training schemes in operation, of which 19 are for domestic work. Tailoring, food manufacture, clock and watch making, glove-making, upholstering are among the occupations taught.

It has been found that munition girls who were employed during the war in handling shell-fuses are admirably suited for employment in making watches and clocks—work which requires a very delicate touch. There are so many of these girls in the Coventry area that one manufacturer has decided to transfer his large works from Switzerland to the Midland town.

701/3

Common Cause
Nov. 21. '19.

The Unemployment Donation.

The civilian dole is to cease, and the unemployment donation for ex-Service men and women to continue till March 31st, 1920, during which time a maximum of nine weeks' donation may be drawn. The rate is to be 20s. for men and 15s. for women without supplementary allowances. At present only thirty thousand civilian women are drawing pay; the civilian men receiving donation are more than three times as numerous. This is a remarkable fact, when one considers that the discharges from Government employ are in the vast majority those of women, and that the Pre-War Practices Act debars women from entering very many employments which are short of labour. The demand for men's labour is enormous and apparently insatiable, that for women's is restricted and soon satisfied by the women thrown out of employment by the return to peace conditions and the release of men from the Services. It is obvious that thousands of unemployed women have not been receiving the dole. Many refused to claim it while they had any savings left, and have now lost their opportunity. Many were put off by delay and even obstruction at the Labour Exchanges, and for them redress will come too late. Not only girls from Government factories and Government offices, but those dispensed with by banks and omnibus companies will in a week be unemployed and without resource. They no longer belong to the unions of the employment they have left, and their chances of new work may be very remote. This is a deplorable state of things. It is intolerable that young women who have supported themselves until their posts are taken from them to be given to men should be in no better position than the few idlers who claimed the donation a year ago and have not troubled to find work since. In this connection we welcome the concession made by the Government on the Industrial Courts Bill, which gives to a new arbitration and enquiry court powers to advise in trade disputes. Last week the proposal that the courts should include women was rejected, their appointment or non-appointment being left to the decision of the Minister of Labour. This was manifestly unfair in view of the disputes certain to arise on the interpretation of the Pre-War Practices Act, and after its disappearance. Though we cannot anticipate that women will form more than a small minority of any court it is to be observed that minority reports of courts of enquiry will be duly laid before Parliament.

Yorkshire Post
3. 10. '19

WOMEN AND THE UNEMPLOYMENT BENEFIT.

To the Editor of The Yorkshire Post.

Sir,—May I call the attention of your readers to the scale of unemployment benefit which has just been published for civilians thrown out of employment on account of the railway strike, as it affects women? According to this scale, whereas married men and widowers with a child or children under 15 are to receive 25s. per week, and single men 15s. per week, women, whether with or without dependent children, are to receive only 12s. per week. Thus no provision at all is being made for the dependent children of widows.

My organisation is protesting against this injustice, and is calling upon the Government not to penalise the fatherless children of women workers in this way. I appeal to the readers of your columns to give all the support which they can to this protest.—Yours, etc.,

INEZ M. FERGUSON,
Press Secretary, National Union of Societies for Equal Citizenship.
62, Oxford Street, W., Oct. 1, 1919.

Manchester Guardian
19. 12. '19.

DISPLACEMENT OF WOMEN WORKERS.

To the Editor of the Manchester Guardian.

Sir,—We are anxious to bring before the attention of your readers the increasing anxiety felt by organised women at the scale upon which women are being dismissed from every sort of employment—industrial, commercial, and professional. We fully appreciate and share in the desire to provide for discharged service men who, during the last five years, have risked their lives and in many cases sacrificed their health on active service. We recognise that their claims must stand before those of women. We emphatically protest, however, against the discharge of women in favour of men and boys who have never seen service. These dismissals are even taking place in occupations acknowledged before the war to be women's work, and we have incontestable evidence that cases are common where wage-earning widows with children to support are being superseded by young single men. No reason of less efficiency on the part of the women is given, but rather the course appears to be pursued in response to a growing demand of men to monopolise all trades and industries except those so underpaid and unskilled that no man desires to enter them.

In face of the experience gained during the war of the industrial capacities of women, we regard this tendency to segregate them in a small group of overcrowded unskilled occupations as not only a cruel injustice to them but a menace to the economic welfare of the country, which urgently calls for a greater national productivity. How can this be obtained if large sections of producers are artificially debarred from using their energy and strength?—Yours, &c.,

DOROTHY EVANS, Secretary, Association of Women Clerks.
FLORENS ROCH, President, Catholic Women's Society.
LILIAN DAWSON, Secretary, Fabian Women's Group.
L. CORBEN, Secretary, League of the Church Militant.
MAY OGILVIE GORDON, D.Sc.Ph.D., F.L.S., President, National Council of Women, Chairman National Women's Citizen's Association.
ELEANOR F. RATHBONE, M.A., C.C., President, National Union of Societies for Equal Citizenship.
GERTRUDE E. SPIELMAN, President, Union of Jewish Women.
E. KNIGHT, Hon. Treasurer, Women's Freedom League.
RHONDDA, President, Women's Industrial League.
MARY WILLIAMS, President, Women's Local Government Society.
B. M. PORTSMOUTH, National President, Young Women's Christian Association.

62, Oxford Street, London, W. 1,
December 17.

Sheffield Telegraph
5. 11. '19

YORKSHIRE.

FEMALE LABOUR.

Vague Inquiry from Rotherham that may have Results.

A number of interesting questions were discussed at a meeting of the Rotherham District Employment Committee yesterday. Mr. H. A. Longbotham presided.

Respecting the resolution passed at the last meeting calling upon the Government to extend the payment of out-of-work donations to men who were not actually on strike, a communication was read in which the divisional officer intimated that the matter had been noted and submitted to the department. It was, however, explained that the rule with regard to the payment of benefit in cases of unemployment due to trade disputes had been carefully considered by the department, and that it was realised that hard cases did arise through the operation of the statutory conditions laid down in the National Insurance Acts. The possibility of an alteration had been carefully considered, but abandoned.

Mr. W. Brook Willis was appointed a member of the Committee, on the nomination of the local War Pensions Committee. The vacancy had arisen through the resignation of Alderman W. Wormald.

The Employment Council conveyed the information that the lay-out plan of the Greasbro' Urban District Council was approved by the Ministry of Health on 6th September, and as the next step rested with the Greasbro' authority it was suggested that the Committee might use their influence with a view to getting plans for bonuses submitted for approval as soon as possible, and thus assist in remedying the problem of unemployment.

On the question of the retention of women in the postal service, a communication was read in which it was stated the postal service was not the only place where women were being retained and men dismissed. The complainant mentioned that from a business where he had had many years' experience he had recently been dismissed and a married woman kept on. He suggested that it was a wages question.

No action was taken.

A communication was read from the manager of an exchange in a textile district, who sought information as to the amount of female labour and premises available in Rotherham. It was thought the idea behind the inquiry was the establishment of a woollen textile factory in the town.

A long discussion took place with regard to the proposed co-operation between the private registry offices and employment exchanges. Several of the members thought that private registry offices should be dispensed with altogether.

With respect to the Government scheme for the settlement in industry of disabled ex-service men, the secretary reported that there had been an improvment in the number of agreements received. The Rotherham Corporation had extended the Fair Contracts Clause, which would be of great benefit.

It was reported that the Rota sub-committees appointed to interview holders of out-of-work donation policies had, in the course of 47 sessions, interviewed 1,000 holders of male civilian policies, 1,889 women, 47 disabled ex-Service men, and 66 non-disabled ex-service men. Of these 929 male civilian holders, 864 women, 39 disabled ex-service men, and 49 non-disabled ex-service men had had their policies allowed for the full period, and 14 male civilian, 64 women, 4 disabled ex-service men, and 1 non-disabled ex-service man for a provisional period. The number of cases disallowed was 67 male civilians, 861 women, 4 disabled ex-service men, and 17 non-disabled ex-service men, the latter being suspended for six weeks.

Relating to the non-acceptance of the Government scheme for the settlement in industry of disabled ex-service men by the Railway Executive Committee, strong exception was taken, and it was resolved "that this Committee expresses strong disapproval, and calls upon the Ministry of Labour to enforce its adoption."

On the motion of Mr. T. Chapman (Discharged Soldiers' Federation), it was decided "that it is the opinion of the Rotherham Employment Committee that under no consideration should the unemployment pay to discharged and demobilised soldiers and sailors be reduced or stopped until suitable employment, satisfactory to the Committee, has been found."

A further resolution adopted was to throw open the meetings of the Committee to the Press.

Manchester Guardian

The Labour Conference.

On the whole it is disappointing to find how little the Labour Conference tells us of the mind of Labour. This particular Conference has been overshadowed by the Kerensky episode. But apart from this it passed only one resolution of any special interest. We confess we should like to see the total abolition at all congresses, but particularly at Labour congresses, of all resolutions of the hardy annual type, and we should like to go on to include all declarations of wide and general principle, which sound so well that when a meeting has passed them it breaks up under the delusion that it has really done something big. It has uttered such tremendous words that it feels quite emancipated from the necessity of any deeds, and goes off to its several homes quite content to sit down to the old conditions of life until with next year comes once more the day for proclaiming the social revolution. The really important things that come up at such congresses are either points of practical detail, or they are decisions on questions of party management and strategy, or they are side issues which give indications of the real temper and spirit of a class.

Two or three interesting points of practical detail arose at this Congress. One was the demand of Miss Macarthur for a fuller equality for women workers, with which we may couple the general demand for the restoration of trade union conditions. The two points are closely connected, for if the women are adequately paid the temptation to retain them where they are displacing skilled men now at the front will disappear. The principle of "equal pay for equal work" is subject to various interpretations. If it is to be taken as a guide in reconstruction it must mean that payment, whether by time or quantity or quality of work, should be so adjusted as to afford no ground for the preference of the labour of one sex over that of the other. If a woman does as much and as good work as a man, but is paid less because she is a woman, then the employer has a strong motive for preferring the woman worker. If, on the other hand, she does less than a man but is paid the same owing to a regulation to that effect, then the employer will prefer the man. If, again, the pay is proportional to the services of each, the employer has no monetary reason for the preference of one over the other, and if this principle is established there can be no question of the undercutting of men by women, nor of any special temptation to the employer of escaping from his obligations to the returning soldiers. As to the restoration of trade union conditions, we fancy the trade unions will find themselves quite strong enough to look after that. We are by no means of the view that the position of Labour has been weakened by the war. It is quite true that the trade unions have had to surrender many privileges, but we have all of us had to give up many liberties of much longer standing and with much less compensation. On the other side, the great increases of cash wages, which will tend to remain after prices have fallen, the still larger increases in family incomes, and the absence of unemployment have caused a widespread material prosperity. There are probably fewer underfed people in this country than there have been for many a generation, just as there are certainly fewer overfed people. The war, while curtailing liberty, has enforced on this land of class contrasts a considerable measure of rough equality. The workers as a whole are in consequence better equipped physically for the economic campaign. Their position is also improved morally and politically by the extent of their services [illegible] sailors' war [illegible] ation. This is a soldiers' and [illegible] conscious ability [illegible] the apex of the social pyramid but the soundness of its base that is saving us.

The question of party management or strategy which most interested the public has, of course, been the repudiation of the party truce. In reality this would [illegible] d don't more interesting if anyone knew precisely what it meant. According to Mr. Henderson it means little or nothing except at by-elections. According to Mr. Barnes it would seem to mean that his position as a Minister will become impossible. But though the resolution was carried, no one expects Mr. Barnes to resign. Congresses in general are gatherings in which small but active minorities cajole large but indifferent majorities into voting as they want. To secure such a vote gives the minority immense temporary satisfaction, but otherwise has very little effect, for the simple reason that the majority, convinced against its will, goes on in the same old rut of practice as before. The bulk of the Labour party do not wish to displace the Coalition Government, principally because they do not know whom to put in its place, and there is in fact no keen competition for the post. For the present at any rate the resolution will have little effect. If it is to be taken as a symptom of tendencies, it makes a Conservative-Socialist union a shade less likely than ever. If, lastly, we come to the side issues revealing the feeling of the Conference, there are all the incidents of Mr. Kerensky's appearance—on the one side the very natural enthusiasm for the man who for some months held the Revolution together, on the other the readiness to resent any inequality as between representatives of different views. It is not only the pacifists who were indignant at the refusal of passports to Mr. Troelstra. It is all who recognise once again the hand of that official world which is determined to select for the people the facts which it deems good for them to know and the persons whom it deems good for them to hear. Mr. Troelstra could have given our Labour world first-hand information on the views of the German Socialists—a matter of the utmost importance. But precisely because he had true information Mr. Troelstra was not allowed to come. The views of the German Socialists must be passed through the official filter before they reach us. Nevertheless, we are still officially a self-governing people fighting for freedom and self-determination as against autocracy and officialdom.

7. 6. 18.

701

Nov 1918 701/40

D 15.

MINISTRY OF LABOUR.

OUT-OF-WORK DONATION

(CIVILIAN WORKERS).

SUMMARY OF SCHEME.

I. GRANT OF DONATION.

1. In order to make provision against the unemployment of civilian workers during the period immediately following the termination of hostilities, it has been decided as an emergency measure to extend to civilian workers, who are British subjects, out-of-work donation on lines similar to those on which it is proposed to pay out-of-work donation to demobilised sailors and soldiers. The terms and conditions of out-of-work donation in respect of demobilised sailors and soldiers are described in a separate leaflet; those applying to civilian workers are detailed below. The scheme as regards civilian workers will come into operation on Monday, November 25th, 1918, and will remain in operation for six months from that date.

2. Out-of-work donation will not be paid concurrently with Unemployment Benefit under the National Insurance (Unemployment) Acts, nor with out-of-work allowances under the special enrolment and other schemes, e.g., W.M.V.'s, W.W.V.'s, W.A.V.'s Colonial workmen, etc.

II. CLASSES OF WORKERS ENTITLED TO CIVILIAN OUT-OF-WORK DONATION.

3. Civilian workers in order to be entitled to out-of-work donation must be of 15 years of age or upwards, and if of 16 years of age or upwards must show that they became employed contributors under the National Health Insurance scheme at least three months prior to November 25th, 1918. If between 15 and 16 years they must show that they entered employment at least three months prior to November 25th, 1918.

III. RATE OF DONATION.

4. Out-of-work donation will be paid at the rate of 24s. a week (i.e., 4s. a day) to men over 18 years of age and 20s. a week (i.e., 3s. 4d. a day) to women over 18 years of age; boys and girls between the ages of 15 and 18 will receive donation at half these rates, viz., 12s. a week and 10s. a week respectively conditionally on their joining a Course of Instruction approved by the Board of Education or other Central Department concerned. In addition to the above-mentioned rates supplementary donation will be payable in respect of dependent children of both men and women over 18 years of age at the rate of 6s. a week for the first dependent child under 15 years of age and 3s. a week for each additional dependent child under that age, but supplementary donation will not be paid to more than one claimant in respect of the same children.

5. Out-of-work donation will be payable to civilian workers for a maximum period of 13 weeks (i.e., 78 days) during the six months for which the scheme is to be in operation.

IV. METHOD OF CLAIMING DONATION.

6. Civilian Workers desiring to claim donation for the first time should attend at an Employment Exchange, or Branch Employment Office of the Ministry of Labour and ask for an "Out-of-Work Donation Policy (Civilian Workers)." If over 16 years of age they will be required to produce a Health Insurance Record Card, showing that they became employed contributors under the National Health Insurance scheme at least three months before November 25th, 1918, and also the current Health Insurance Card. Unless both the Record Card and the current Health Insurance Card can be produced, only a provisional policy can be issued. If neither a Record Card nor a Health Insurance Card can be produced they will be asked to give the name of the approved Society to which they belong, or, if they do not belong to an approved Society, full particulars to enable the fact that they comply with the requisite conditions to be established; a policy will not be issued until the fact that the applicant became an employed contributor before the appointed date has been verified.

   Applicants between the ages of 15 and 16 will not, of course, be insured under the National Health Insurance scheme, and they will therefore be required to produce a certificate signed by their previous employer to verify that they entered employment at least three months before the appointed date.

7. The Out-of-work donation policy will be retained by the person to whom it is issued, except when he is unemployed and claiming out-of-work donation, during which period it must be lodged at the Employment Exchange or Branch Employment Office. When desirous of claiming out-of-work donation for a second or subsequent time, the holder of the out-of-work donation policy should attend at an Employment Exchange or Branch Employment Office and lodge his policy.

8. On attending at an Employment Exchange or Branch Employment Office to claim donation, the applicant will be required to sign a form of declaration contained in the policy. A coupon is provided for each week and constitutes both the claim for donation in respect of each day on which it is signed and a statement that the applicant is in fact unemployed, capable of work and unable to obtain employment.

9. Whilst unemployed the applicant must in general attend daily at the Employment Exchange or Branch Employment Office in order to sign the coupon in the policy as evidence of unemployment. Attendance on alternate days will be sufficient if the applicant resides more than two miles from the nearest Exchange or Branch Employment Office, and once a week if he resides more than four miles away.

10. Applicants for donation who are workmen in the trades insured under the National Insurance (Unemployment) Acts, 1911-1918, will be required to lodge their unemployment books at the time of making application for donation and when the right to receive donation is exhausted he will be entitled to claim unemployment benefit in respect of his contributions, if any, under these Acts.

701/41

V. SUPPLEMENTARY DONATION.

11. An applicant desiring to claim supplementary donation in respect of dependent children will be required to complete a form of declaration, as to the number and ages of the children in respect of whom the claim is made. This declaration will have to be confirmed by

(a) a local magistrate, or

(b) a minister of religion, or

(c) a registered medical practitioner, or

(d) a secretary of the applicant's trade union, or approved society, or branch thereof.

Supplementary donation will not be paid until confirmation of the declaration is received, but when such confirmation is lodged at the Local Office the supplementary donation will be paid in respect of the same days as ordinary donation.

VI. WAITING PERIOD.

12. Donation will not be payable for the first three days of any continuous period of unemployment; in other words, an applicant in order to become eligible for payment of donation must, in addition to satisfying the other conditions, be first of all unemployed for three consecutive working days and sign the coupons in the policy in respect of each of these days as described above. He will then become eligible for payment for each subsequent day of unemployment (subject to the usual conditions) in respect of which he duly signs the coupon in the policy, until he fails to attend and sign the coupons for six consecutive working days or more. When such failure to sign occurs a further waiting period of three consecutive working days must be fulfilled before he can again become eligible for payment of donation.

VII. ADJUDICATION ON DISPUTED CLAIMS.

13. In any case of doubt as to whether a claim to donation should be admitted the claim will be referred to a Court of Referees which sits locally and consists of an independent chairman together with two industrial members taken by rota from panels of representatives of employers and workpeople respectively. In the case of allowance of the claim by a Court of Referees payment of the donation, subject to the conditions above described, will commence immediately but the Ministry of Labour will be entitled to appeal to the Umpire, if they think fit, against the allowance. Pending the hearing of the appeal donation will continue to be paid. If the claim is disallowed by the Court of Referees, an appeal against disallowance may be made to the Umpire by the Ministry of Labour or by a trade union of which the applicant is a member, or, if leave is given by the Court of Referees, by the applicant himself.

VIII. CONDITIONS UNDER WHICH DONATION WILL BE PAYABLE.

14. In order to be eligible for donation the applicant must be capable of work but unable to obtain suitable employment. In particular he must not refuse an offer of suitable employment, but he will not be disqualified for donation by reason only that he has declined—

(a) an offer of employment in a situation vacant in consequence of a stoppage of work due to a trade dispute; or

(b) an offer of employment in the district where he was last ordinarily employed at a rate of wage lower, or on conditions less favourable, than those which he habitually obtained in his usual employment in that district or would have obtained, had he continued to be so employed; or

(c) An offer of employment in any other district at a rate of wage lower or on conditions less favourable than those generally observed in such district by agreement between associations of employers and of workmen, or failing any such agreement, than those generally recognised in such districts by good employers.

15. An applicant who has lost employment by reason of a stoppage of work which was due to a trade dispute at the factory, workshop or other premises at which he was employed is disqualified for receiving donation so long as the stoppage of work continues, except in a case where he has, during the stoppage of work, become bona-fide employed elsewhere.

Where separate branches of work which are commonly carried on as separate businesses in separate premises are in any case carried on in separate departments on the same premises, each of those departments shall, for the purposes of this provision, be deemed to be a separate factory or workshop or separate premises, as the case may be.

16. An applicant who loses employment through misconduct or who voluntarily leaves his employment without just cause, is disqualified for receiving donation for a period of six weeks from the date when he so lost employment.

17. An applicant is disqualified for receiving donation whilst he is an inmate of any prison or any workhouse or other institution supported wholly or partly out of public funds, and whilst he is resident temporarily or permanently outside the United Kingdom.

18. An applicant is disqualified for receiving donation whilst he in receipt of unemployment benefit or any sickness or disablement benefit or disablement allowance under National Insurance Acts.

IX. PAY DAYS FOR DONATION.

19. The pay week for civilian workers will be from Thursday to Wednesday, and donation will be paid on Friday of each week up to and including the previous Wednesday.

X. PAYMENT OF HEALTH INSURANCE CONTRIBUTIONS DURING UNEMPLOYMENT.

20. In order to prevent unemployed workers falling into arrears under the Health Insurance scheme it has been arranged that on presentation of their Health Insurance Cards when drawing donation they will be entitled to have the card impressed with a rubber stamp at the Employment Exchange or Branch Employment Office for the week preceding that in which the payment of donation is due, provided that they have not worked during that week and a Health Insurance contribution in respect of employment during that week has therefore not become payable.

XI. EMERGENCY CHARACTER OF SCHEME.

21. The provisions described above are solely intended to bridge over the inevitable period of dislocation immediately following the cessation of hostilities, and it must be emphasised that the non-contributory scheme is a purely emergency measure. Whilst it is in operation the existing compulsory unemployment scheme will in effect remain in suspense so far as benefits are concerned. Contributions will, however, still be payable in order to build up a reserve of benefit for contributors when the temporary scheme comes to an end. Thus the special interests of contributors are safeguarded and meantime the Government are pressing forward with a scheme for general contributory insurance and must not be prejudiced by the non-contributory scheme above described.

MINISTRY OF LABOUR,
November, 1918.

3,000M. 11/18. R. & L.

8/10/15

THE REBUILDING OF THE WORLD.

Women's Share After the War.

'REGENERATION' MUST INCLUDE THE WORKERS.

Though planned at a time when few people imagined that the war would not by now be rapidly drawing to a close, yesterday's conference at Westminster on "Woman's Share in the Work of Reconstruction After the War" produced a rich crop of practical suggestions. It may be many months before they can bear fruit, but it is still true, as one speaker pointed out, that "we must look ahead, so that we may find ourselves better prepared for the work of reconstructing the social life of our nation than we were for the sudden and tragic work of destruction which was thrust upon us."

Mrs. Creighton, the famous wife of a former Bishop of London, presided, and the members of the National Union of Women Workers, conveners of the conference, who were present included many of the ablest and most experienced leaders of feminine activity in this country. Discussion was divided into four sections—education, industry, legislation, and public health—and it soon became apparent that all four are even more closely interwoven than might be supposed.

"War," said Miss Catherine Marshall, expressing the undercurrent of thought in nearly every speech, "is pre-eminently the undoing of women's work. There is a danger that the cheapening of life may persist when the war is over. We have to see that the war does not leave us with perverted values."

Material Work.

Not only must the task of recreating new values fall very largely to the lot of women after the war, but it is they who will also have to take a major part in the rebuilding of the material world.

Miss Anderson, principal lady inspector of factories, emphasised the truth of this with regard to industry by giving examples out of her practical experience of the extraordinary ability with which the women of England are adapting themselves to new work under new conditions. "British woman labour is the best in the world for rising to emergencies and for maintaining steady output," an employer with wide American and Continental knowledge had told her. What is wanted now, she insisted, is that women shall be admitted to a larger and higher directing, as distinct from merely executant, share in the industry of the country.

The same point was taken up by Miss Margaret Ashton, of Manchester. "English girls," said Miss Ashton, "must go into the domestic business as they already do in France and America. Women must be leaders as well as paid workers. There must be very few old business houses that are not heavily hit by losing those who were taking the reins. The reins will have to be taken by women instead."

Perhaps the most brilliant contribution to the debate, so far as it concerned that rebuilding of the flesh and blood of the nation which women must also undertake, was made by Miss Alice Gregory, who is connected with a home for mothers and babies at Woolwich. It was, in form, a study of the psychology of the working-class woman, a psychology so difficult for other women to understand that "between class and class there can be no true commerce."

To establish that commerce women must work with might and main, for "there can be no regeneration of England which does not include our working women." "And England," urged the speaker, "must become regenerate, for I take it that to most of us there could be only one quite intolerable end to the war—that we should go on afterwards just the same as, perhaps even worse than, before."

To Help the State.

For young women of the upper or middle classes who are really set on doing something for their country Miss Gregory had this advice:

Leave your homes and go and live among the working people.

Choose as a profession either elementary school teaching or district midwifery.

There was much concentrated wisdom in a speech by Dr. Mary Murdoch on the same theme. She put forward as serious tasks for serious women the extermination of the housefly, the purification of the milk supply, and the cultivation of good cooking. There was also this hint of eugenics in her address, that "when so many of the healthiest and best young lives are being lost on the battlefield, and so many of the unfit remain, women will have to be very careful of the kind of men they will marry, or the whole English race will degenerate."

Daily Graphic.
4. 3. 15.

70

TRADE AFTER THE WAR IS OVER.

PROFESSOR'S CHEERFUL VIEW OF THE FUTURE.

NO REASON TO BE ANXIOUS.

"There seems no reason to be over-anxious as to employment when the war is over" is the cheerful conclusion of Professor A. L. Bowley, Sc.D. To the admirable series of Oxford Pamphlets has just been added one by him on "The War and Employment" (Oxford University Press, 2d. net), which should be read by all who would learn the view of this subject held by one of the leading social statisticians in the world.

Professor Bowley traces the movement of employment through the months of war. He points out that the total number of men completely unemployed at the end of August was less than in a month of trade depression of not unusual severity.

Coming to the present conditions, he says the older men in the luxury trades; women workers in lace, earthenware, linen, and cotton; high-class dressmakers, and many other smaller groups have lost a great deal of their ordinary work and cannot readily turn to other work. The reasons why so little actual distress is found in most districts are that in very many households there are two or more workers, and if one is unoccupied the others may be busy, and in a vast number of cases the payments to soldiers' dependants ease the situation.

LESS COMPETITION.

When the war is over, "while we shall find the purchasing power of the belligerent countries greatly diminished and exports to them slow to recover, we shall also," adds Professor Bowley, "find some slackening in their competition, both at home and abroad; and, as regards our export trade to neutral countries, it seems probable that quite soon they will be desiring more than we, with our curtailed labour force, can supply; and if such a state of things exists at the conclusion of the war there will be a brisk foreign and colonial demand. No doubt there will be temporary trouble and individual hardship, but the wonderful elasticity of production, which has been so useful for the purposes of war, will be equally available for the service of peace."

construction After the war produced a rich crop of practical suggestions. It may be many months before they can bear fruit, but it is still true, as one speaker pointed out, that "we must look ahead, so that we may find ourselves better prepared for the work of reconstructing the social life of our nation than we were for the sudden and tragic work of destruction which was thrust upon us."

Mrs. Creighton, the famous wife of a former Bishop of London, presided, and the members of the National Union of Women Workers, conveners of the conference, who were present included many of the ablest and most experienced leaders of feminine activity in this country. Discussion was divided into four sections—education, industry, legislation, and public health—and it soon became apparent that all four are even more closely interwoven than might be supposed.

"War," said Miss Catherine Marshall, expressing the undercurrent of thought in nearly every speech, "is pre-eminently the undoing of women's work. There is a danger that the cheapening of life may persist when the war is over. We have to see that the war does not leave us with perverted values."

Material Work.

Not only must the task of recreating new values fall very largely to the lot of women after the war, but it is they who will also have to take a major part in the rebuilding of the material world.

Miss Anderson, principal lady inspector of factories, emphasised the truth of this with regard to industry by giving examples out of her practical experience of the extraordinary ability with which the women of England are adapting themselves to new work under new conditions. "British woman labour is the best in the world for rising to emergencies and for maintaining steady output," an employer with wide American and Continental knowledge had told her. What is wanted now, she insisted, is that women shall be admitted to a larger and higher directing, as distinct from merely executant, share in the industry of the country.

The same point was taken up by Miss Margaret Ashton, of Manchester. "English girls," said Miss Ashton, "must go into the domestic business as they already do in France and America. Women must be leaders as well as paid workers. There must be very few old business houses that are not heavily hit by losing those who were taking the reins. The reins will have to be taken by women instead."

Perhaps the most brilliant contribution to the debate, so far as it concerned that rebuilding of the flesh and blood of the nation which women must also undertake, was made by Miss Alice Gregory, who is connected with a home for mothers and babies at Woolwich. It was, in form, a study of the psychology of the working-class woman, a psychology so difficult for other women to understand that "between class and class there can be no true commerce."

To establish that commerce women must work with might and main, for "there can be no regeneration of England which does not include our working women." "And England," urged the speaker, "must become regenerate, for I take it that to most of us there could be only one quite intolerable end to the war—that we should go on afterwards just the same as, perhaps even worse than, before."

To Help the State.

For young women of the upper or middle classes who are really set on doing something for their country Miss Gregory had this advice:

- Leave your homes and go and live among the working people.
- Choose as a profession either elementary school teaching or district midwifery.

There was much concentrated wisdom in a speech by Dr. Mary Murdoch on the same theme. She put forward as serious tasks for serious women the extermination of the housefly, the purification of the milk supply, and the cultivation of good cooking. There was also this hint of eugenics in her address, that "when so many of the healthiest and best young lives are being lost on the battlefield, and so many of the unfit remain, women will have to be very careful of the kind of men they will marry, or the whole English race will degenerate."

The discussion on educational prospects had more than a touch of gloom, due to the shadow of "economy." Bitter protests were made by several speakers against the abolition, on the score of expense, of housewifery and cooking classes. The most interesting suggestion for directed effort came from Mrs. Creighton, who insisted that less must be spent in future on buildings so that more may be available for teaching. The problem, as she stated it, became one of "plain living and high thinking."

---

cheerful conclusion of Professor A. L. Bowley, Sc.D. To the admirable series of Oxford Pamphlets has just been added one by him on "The War and Employment" (Oxford University Press, 2d. net), which should be read by all who would learn the view of this subject held by one of the leading social statisticians in the world.

Professor Bowley traces the movement of employment through the months of war. He points out that the total number of men completely unemployed at the end of August was less than in a month of trade depression of not unusual severity.

Coming to the present conditions, he says the older men in the luxury trades; women workers in lace, earthenware, linen, and cotton; high-class dressmakers, and many other smaller groups have lost a great deal of their ordinary work and cannot readily turn to other work. The reasons why so little actual distress is found in most districts are that in very many households there are two or more workers, and if one is unoccupied the others may be busy, and in a vast number of cases the payments to soldiers' dependants ease the situation.

LESS COMPETITION.

When the war is over, "while we shall find the purchasing power of the belligerent countries greatly diminished and exports to them slow to recover, we shall also," adds Professor Bowley, "find some slackening in their competition, both at home and abroad; and, as regards our export trade to neutral countries, it seems probable that quite soon they will be desiring more than we, with our curtailed labour force, can supply; and if such a state of things exists at the conclusion of the war there will be a brisk foreign and colonial demand. No doubt there will be temporary trouble and individual hardship, but the wonderful elasticity of production, which has been so useful for the purposes of war, will be equally available for the service of peace."

The Dundee Advertiser
22/6/15

WOMEN AT MEN'S WORK.

Many calculations have been made of the number of men Germany can send into the field, and in these, without exception, liberal deductions are made for the number who must be kept at home to carry on the necessary work. So far as we recollect, in none of the estimates has allowance been made for the possibility of a large development of women work, but the evidence is constantly growing that this development is taking place in Germany to an extent never hitherto experienced in a civilised country. Agriculture is now being carried on almost wholly by women, boys, and old men. In all the transport industries, including the railways and tramways, women in large numbers are taking the place of men. Clerical work is passing into female hands, and in every kind of factory and workshop, even in the iron industries, women are coming more and more to the front. In this way it is possible that Germany may be able to utilise in military service a million more men than our estimates have reckoned on. In this country the process has gone some way, but the extent of the substitution is quite insignificant compared with the case of Germany. From a note in the "Field," we learn that in one small department the Government is giving a lead in the matter, for in Kew Gardens a large number of women are at work. They are doing practically the whole of the work of two departments, and, though men are retained for the heavy work, some of the women object to the distinction, holding that a woman s quite competent to do any gardening vork than men can do. They are probably right, and we should say that this s one of the departments of male labour rom which women will not be easily ousted once they secure a footing.

The Economist
19/6/15

The Employment of Women.—The scarcity of men has been felt for some time, and is already showing itself in many ways. Women are acting as ticket collectors n many stations throughout the country, boys are doing nen's work, and girls are doing boys' work. Women are to be seen driving motor vehicles, and in country districts they are taking on a good deal of agricultural work. In all probability the milkmaid (who survives in Scotland and in a few parts of England) will again multiply. In some towns women constables have been appointed, but it is hard to see how this innovation can be a success. There is no doubt that if the war goes on much longer trade union rules will have to be modified in all directions, and, of course, there are a number of factory industries and shops where female labour is replacing male. One of the social evils of a war like this is that it will enormously magnify the evil of a great surplus population of women. On the other hand, it is all to the good that women should have more employment, especially in outdoor occupations; and we are glad to hear of experiments being made in the employment of women as haymakers. It is, of course, extremely important that the crops this year should be well harvested.

702/2 702 ~~606~~ 702

The Manchester Courier
14/6/15

WOMEN WORKERS IN WAR TIME.

ARE THEY TO GO WHEN PEACE COMES?

A MANCHESTER PROTEST.

The need for women to replace men in workshops in order to liberate the latter for military purposes will be the subject matter of a meeting to be held in the Town Hall on Wednesday, at which the Lord Mayor (Alderman McCabe) will preside, and Lord Derby will be one of the speakers. Other speakers will include a number of local Trade Union leaders and Miss Kitchener, cousin of Lord Kitchener. So far, no definite appeal has been made to Manchester employers to liberate men for war service by the taking on of women, and the meeting on Wednesday will really be the first definite public appeal of the kind. It is estimated that 2,000 or 3,000 men could be obtained for military service or the production of munitions in this way. A further appeal will also be made at the meeting for women to register themselves. A former appeal had somewhat disappointing results, few women being willing to undertake manual labour.

The effect of women's emergency labour in industry is also being investigated by the Manchester, Salford, and District Women's War Interests Committee. The object of the inquiry is to discover to what extent and under what conditions women are replacing men in industry; what is the attitude of the Trade Unions to this replacement, and whether it is likely to be permanent. A list of eleven questions has been submitted to local Trade Unions by the above committee, who, when the interrogatory circulars have been completed and returned, will compile a report giving the result of the investigation.

The subject was discussed at a meeting of the committee on Saturday, when Mr. W. Mellor, formerly of the London Fabian Research Department, indicated the occupations in which women were now engaged, which prior to the war were closed to them. The list included tramway conductors, street sweepers, railway workers, such as porters, booking clerks, carriage cleaners, station mistresses, messenger girls, telegraph girls, grocery assistants, clerks in Government and insurance offices, gardeners, commissionaires, lift attendants, motor-van drivers, taxi drivers, and women police, irrespective of the large number engaged in armament works and aircraft factories.

Mr. Mellor suggested that in dealing with this problem trade unions hitherto closed to women should now admit them, and that the women should be paid the same wages as men. A record of emergency labour should be kept by the unions, and the trade unions concerned should be notified of every emergency worker aken on by a firm, with particulars as to wages paid and work done, and for women to be admitted into each industry on the distinct understanding that they would have to go when displacements occurred through men coming back rom the war and claiming their old jobs.

Mrs. Annot Robinson said it would not be fair or practicable to ask women to give up their work and give place to men at the end of the war. Were that to be done the result would be social chaos.

The Extension of Women's Work.

THE needs both of the army and of the new Munitions Department point to the greatly increased employment of women in the near future. On the one hand, whereas the supply of recruits must not be allowed to decrease, in some industries we are approaching the point where it is inadvisable to take more men—in mining it has already been reached,—and therefore we shall need, wherever possible, to open the way for the employment of women in order to release men for the ranks. The organisation of the munitions supply leads to the same conclusion; it will certainly draw in numbers of men not now engaged in munitions work who might otherwise enlist, and it will probably itself give employment, as it is already doing both in Germany and in France, to many women. Yesterday, at Nottingham, where the Railwaymen's Union meets this week, Mr. J. H. THOMAS was discussing the substitution of women's for men's work during the war. There is, of course, opposition to it among railwaymen, as in other occupations, and at this time not altogether without some ground. The men fear lest there should be a large irruption of women holding at lower wages the jobs of men who have thrown up their work to enlist, that the lower scale will tend to reduce the status and the pay of the workman, and that, when the war is over, the returned soldier will find it hard to recover his job, which, even when recovered, may not be worth what it was when he gave it up. The remedies and safeguards to which we must look are fairly clear. The first is that a woman taking on a man's work should receive also a man's wage. If that principle be followed there will be no worsening of pay or status. The second is that which has been promised in all occupations—that men who enlist shall be placed at the end of the war in no worse position than they held when they enlisted. That, of course, cannot be done in a moment nor—let us be frank about it—without great hardship to some of the women who will have taken on the work, will have done it well, and will have come to depend on it. In all occupations it ought to be made quite clear when work is offered to women whether or not it is likely to be only for the duration of the war.

British Assn. Sept to Dec.

Manchester Evening Chronicle. 9.9.15.

WOMEN IN INDUSTRY.

Their Place After the War.

ECONOMIC PROBLEMS.

Need for More Skilled Labour.

THE BRITISH ASSOCIATION.

Questions Discussed at To-day's Conferences.

The position of women in the industrial field was considered to-day at the Economic Science Section of the British Association meeting in Manchester, the discussion centring round the report of the conference appointed to investigate the outlets of labour after the war.

Mr. E. F. Hitchcock, in an interesting address, touched upon the main features of the report—an exhaustive document of 82 pages. While there was considerable distress among women workers last August and September, he remarked, by February of this year there was a shortage of a quarter of a million men in industry, and 170,000 women had been absorbed. But still there were at the time 40,000 women still unemployed, compared with the number working before the war. The luxury trades (dressmaking, etc.), and the cotton trade were those chiefly hit by the war conditions. By April, however, 50,000 extra women had gone into trades, apart from the very large number who had taken up munition work.

So far as industry proper was concerned women could not be said to have replaced men, however, in the sense that they were doing to any appreciable extent work previously done by men. It was largely an extension of work normally done by women. The exceptions to this were clerical work in banks, etc., and on railways, where women were engaged as carriage cleaners, ticket collectors, etc. As for the banks, at first there seemed to be a preference in favour of taking on young women, but it had since been found that professional women—who had worked as governesses, etc., before the war—were on the whole much better than young women.

THE SECOND STRING TO HER BOW.

The railway companies, Mr. Hitchcock proceeded, regarded the employment of women as purely a temporary measure, for the war only. On the whole railway managers said that they preferred men.

Generally, it had been proved that women's labour was untrained labour, and the most important problem in industry to-day was the need of skilled workers.

Whatever their relative inferiority, however, women were undoubtedly underpaid. They were considered well paid even when receiving from 50 to 70 per cent. less wages than men for more or less the same work. As an exception to this, some banks were actually paying more to women who had replaced minor male clerks, because the women were offered no prospects

Woman, however, with marriage in her mind, generally regarded industry as a second string to her bow and accordingly, from the point of view of the employer, she was not so good an industrial investment as man. When trained it was quite probable that she would not stay in industry.

With certain exceptions where women were doing the work better than the young men and youths whom they had replaced—he thought that the point of view of employers was that after the war the woman worker must go.

As for trade prospects after the war, he added, he thought that orders which had accumulated during the war would carry industry on for a considerable period afterwards. He thought that if they were to maintain the output and make up for the wealth which had been destroyed during the war they would have to have more and more women in industry.

BACK TO THE LAND.

Professor E. C. K. Gonner (of Liverpool) said he was not sure that there was a prospect of any large menace of unemployment after the war, but there would be a large change of employment. He did not believe that all the men coming back from the war were going to settle down to their former work. As a nation we should have to look ahead and make provision for the particular employments into which many of the young men wished to go. He hoped to see a considerable increase in the agricultural population in this country, and this was just the time when every care should be taken to make provision for office workers, etc., to have an opportunity of settling down on the land in this country or in the Colonies.

Professor Gonner added that the great difficulty was the large amount of unskilled labour in industry. What was wanted was to make a very great difference between the wages of skilled and unskilled labour. It was one of the effective means of making people become skilled.

Birmingham Mail.
14.9.15.

WOMEN AND WAR.

THEIR PLACE IN BIRMINGHAM INDUSTRIAL LIFE.

PROBLEMS OF THE FUTURE.

The most noteworthy feature in the industrial life of Birmingham and the district is the large and increasing part which is being taken in it by women and girls. The war has brought for them a hundred new occupations, and the outlook is that the number will be substantially increased. Owing to the depletions of the staff the Birmingham Post Office officials have organised staffs of women letter-sorters, and in several offices which were formerly entirely administered by male assistants lady assistants have been placed behind the counter. As an experiment a limited number of women have been appointed letter-carriers, and in some of the urban districts the duties of postmen are being carried out by them. So far women tram conductors have proved a success. In all there are over 200 in the service of the Birmingham Corporation, and if the women can withstand the rigours of an English winter, it is not unlikely the number will be substantially increased. At Manchester the Parks Committee are organising women gardeners. Locally, nothing has yet been done in this direction, though it is apparent that the lighter branches of horticulture can satisfactorily be done by women. At the moment the work in the parks is not heavy, and it is a common practice to reduce the staff during the winter months.

It is, however, in the Birmingham industrial community that women are chiefly in evidence. Many thousands are engaged in munition works—as attendants at automatic machinery, in work on the component parts of shells, and in the warehouses—and in several of the largest factories the normal staff of female operatives has been increased by several thousand persons. Many girls who had started in domestic service are now working at high pressure in electrical engineering shops, in rubber, leather, and hosiery factories, and in the tailoring trades. It is a common experience for capable female machine operatives, by working ten hours per day, to earn 30s. per week; and thousands of young girls, fresh from school, are contributing from 16s. to £1 per week to the family exchequer.

In a variety of other occupations woman is much in evidence. She has firmly established herself as shorthand writer and typist in the administrative offices of the Birmingham Corporation, and in banks, insurance, and solicitors' offices she has found a position (this is due to the dearth of male clerks, a few years ago a drug in the labour market); more women are employed in retail shops—having invaded the sacred precincts of the grocer and provision merchant—and there are others who are rendering effective service as lift attendants, railway employees (booking clerks and ticket collectors), waitresses, and uniformed picture-house "commissionaires." Married women, who were formerly school teachers, have also returned to school duties, and many women of education are qualifying for positions as dispensers of medicine, nurses, and other workers in hospitals and in the public health service.

The war has clearly given woman her opportunity. It has provided her with the chance for patriotic service, and it has given her a new order of life of work outside the narrow limits of domestic interest. The effect will assuredly be to widen and broaden her outlook, and to give her greater independence. "But when the war is over," said a prominent Labour member in Birmingham, "there is bound to be much trouble in industry. It is clear that women cannot be ruthlessly turned out of their positions—they will be too firmly installed for that—and one of the problems will be to organise them so as to prevent unfair competition with male workers."

The Daily News & Leader. 16. 9. 15.

WOMEN'S PLACE IN INDUSTRY.

British Association Debate.

EMPLOYMENT PROBLEMS AFTER THE WAR.

The twelve sections of the British Association resumed their deliberations in Manchester yesterday.

The topics which came under review in the Economic Section included the question of the outlets for employment after the war, with special reference to the replacement of male by female labour. In connection with this question an interim re. rt was presented by an influential committee which included Sir H. Rider Haggard, Mr. C. W. Bowerman, M.P., and Archdeacon Cunningham. The report stated that the customary barriers to the employment of women having broken down the chief factors remaining were the fitness and willingness of women to undertake industrial work. The comparative shortness of women's industrial career had led employers to regard the time given to the acquisition of technical knowledge by women as wasted.

Since, unfortunately, for some time to come the female population would be decidedly more in excess of the male than even in the past, the number of women who would remain on the labour market all their lives was likely to be increased. Already it was stated in some works that during the last year promotion had been very slow because of the comparatively small number of marriages. Women in the main, however, did not regard their occupation as their life's work, and the desirability of a woman as a business investment was minimised by the probability of her marrying In any case it was stated that her attitude to marriage caused her attitude to work to be less stable than that of men. Women were less ambitious than men, and more content to remain in positions that made little demand on them.

DEVELOPMENTS IN STORE.

The question of wages was at once the most controversial as well as the most complicated question of women's employment. Roughly, women received from 50 to 75 per cent of the wages paid to men in similar occupations. Extremely interesting developments of women's employment were likely to occur within the next few months. Much, of course, would depend upon the industrial and economic position after the war and the rate of discharge from the Army.

Employers who had been seen on the subject almost unanimously stated that it was their intention to take back those of their former employees who returned after the war, not necessarily in their former positions, but in positions not inferior to those that they had left. In some cases the experience gained during the war had shown that certain jobs (i.e., lift attendants) could be more efficiently done by women than by men. In such cases employers intended to take back their particular men who returned, and as they were promoted or fell out of industrial life substitute women in their place, or else better jobs would be offered to the men, and the women kept on.

The great increase of women's employment could hardly fail to have permanent results, and it might therefore be anticipated that after the war the proportion of women in industry would be greater than before, and that the competition of men and women would increase.

To minimise the bad effect which would result emigration was suggested of men and women in something like equal proportions, as well as the better technical training of boys and girls, and an extension of the policy of equal pay for equal work, together with a minimum wage for unskilled labour, both male and female. It was also suggested that half-timers should be abolished and that widows and young children be withdrawn from the labour market.

BACK TO THE LAND.

The report having been presented and explained by Mr. E. F. Hitchcock, Professor Gonner, of Liverpool, said that after the war there was going to be a very large change of employment on the part of people coming back, and it would be necessary to look ahead to provide employment for many. Personally, he hoped to see a considerable increase in the agricultural population of the country, in which case a considerable quantity of the less skilled labour would be swallowed up. In order to get over the difficulty of such a small quantity of skilled labour he suggested that there should be a much greater difference than at present between the remuneration for skilled labour and that for unskilled If that were done it would encourage workers to become skilled.

Mr. R. Turnor, who followed with a paper on land service for ex-service men, urged that machinery for providing them with land should be created without delay. The work of settlement should be carried on by a land settlement commission composed of highly qualified men, and in some ways analagous to the existing Development Commission.

CHILDREN AND THE WAR.

The interest of children in the war at the different ages was the subject of a paper in the Psychological Section by Dr. C. W. Kimmins, of Southwark, who stated that in order to obtain the information required war essays were written by all the children in ten senior departments (five boys and five girls) of elementary schools. No preparation was allowed and no notice given. The children were told to write as much as they could about the war in fifteen minutes. In all 3,081 papers were written (1,511 boys, 1,570 girls).

The fact that emerged most clearly was the bellicose attitude of the girls of ten, the wave of depression at eleven, and the establishment of normal interests at twelve years of age. The boys, on the other hand, become more warlike at eleven, and though a period of slight depression follows upon this it is much less marked than in the case of the girls. From the age of eleven onwards great anxiety was felt with regard to the price of food.

A little girl, aged eleven, wrote: "The origin of the war was this, that when the German Emperor was at Windsor he insulted Queen Victoria, and so King Edward smacked him round the face. The German Emperor said, 'I'll be avenged,' and hence the war." (Laughter.) A boy of twelve wrote: "The advantage of the war is that the men have learned to knit;" and another boy wrote: "The main disadvantage of the war is that girls must remain old maids because there will not be any men left."

MILITARY TRAINING IN SCHOOLS.

The Educationists were concerned with military training in schools, and the High Master of Manchester Grammar School (Mr. J. L. Paton) said, very pointedly, that this war taught nothing more forcibly than the impotence of conscription to prevent war. It was conscription and military preparation which produced the war, and yet the authors of the conscription campaign in this country were prescribing a bigger dose of "the mixture as before" to cure the European malady.

Out of an interesting discussion in the Chemical Section on atmospheric pollution by domestic and industrial smoke a concrete proposal was carried to the Council of the Association to establish a special committee to co-ordinate the existing city committees who are investigating the problem, and to place the weight of the leading scientists on their side in a practical campaign for abatement.

Sir Arthur J. Evans, of Oxford, the well-known archæologist, was appointed President for next year, when the Association meets at Newcastle-on-Tyne. Bournemouth was chosen as the place of meeting for 1917.

Nottingham Express,
September 10th 1915.

WOMEN IN INDUSTRY.

Replacement of Men Labour.

Particular interest was aroused by the subject of employment after the war, in respect to which an inquiry had been conducted at the instance of the Association by a committee of which Archdeacon Cunningham and Mr. C. W. Bowerman, M.P., and Sir H. Rider Haggard were among the members, assisted by a sub-committee.

In their draft interim report, which yesterday came before the Economic section, the committee stated that the customary barriers to employment of women having broken down, the chief factors remaining were the fitness and willingness of women to undertake industrial work, since unfortunately, for some time to come, it seemed probable that the female population would be decidedly more in excess of the male than even in the past.

Women and Marriage.

The number of women who would remain on the labour market all their lives was likely to be increased. Women in the main, however, did not regard their occupation as their life's work. It was stated that in many trades her attitude to marriage caused her attitude to her work to be less stable than of man.

Extremely interesting developments of women's employment were likely to occur within the next few months. Employers almost unanimously stated that it was their intention to take back those of their former employees who returned after the war, and to place them in positions not inferior to those they had left. Most employers treated the extra employment of women as a purely temporary measure, to be dropped on the conclusion of the war, but the great increase of women's employment could barely fail to have a permanent result.

It must be anticipated that after the war the proportion of women in industry would be greater than before, and that competition of men and women would increase.

To minimise the bad effect which might result, emigration was suggested, together with an extension of policy of equal pay for equal work, and minimum wage for unskilled labour, both male and female, and finally, the withdrawal of widows and young children from the labour market by the institution of an adequate pension scheme, at the same time introducing further restrictions with regard to home work.

Mr. E. F. Hitchcock, of the Manchester Chamber of Commerce, in an address, said broadly speaking, the replacement of man labour by woman labour in industries proper was only now, after twelve months of war, beginning to assume any magnitude. Women were mainly engaged in industries for the production of goods demanded by the Government for war purposes. By July, 100,000 more women were employed in these trades than before the war. Most of these women were drawn from trades which had become slack owing to the war.

Women had not so much replaced men in industry proper as it appeared. What had happened was that the war demanded goods in the production of which women were already largely employed. In non-industrial occupations the replacement of men by women had been marked—in clerical work particularly. In banks it had been found in some cases that young women had not been satisfactory owing largely to lack of confidence, and older women had been tried with satisfactory results.

Women labour was untrained labour. The present demand was for skilled workers.

Women had not, industrially-speaking, "grown up." They treated themselves as adolescents, and were so regarded by their employers. The force of circumstances demanded a change.

Women were underpaid. They earned from 50 to 70 per cent. less than men for the same work. They had not considered their object in life to be industry. Marriage was a thing to be faced, and industry was perhaps a second string to the woman's bow.

Women After the War.

Women's work after the war must go. That with modifications was the view of employers.

But in some cases female labour was more valued than male labour.

Girls were found generally more efficient, careful, and conscientious than boys, and were much to be preferred to them, but the majority of employers considered adult women were less efficient than men.

The enormous accumulation of private and shipping orders would keep some trades in which women were largely employed busy for several months after the war—tailoring in particular.

If we were to maintain our output women must be more and more engaged in industry.

Demand for More Technical Training

Miss Anne Ashley, of Birmingham, also dealt with the report, and showed that in that city there had been a marked increase of women employed, but it was largely artificial in that the women were engaged on machinery specially constructed to suit them. A good deal of women labour would, however, be permanent. There would be an extension of that sort of work that women always have done.

She thought there was going to be a big demand to repair the ravages of war in countries which had been broken by it. There would generally perhaps be a shortage of capital, but there would also be a fair amount of capital in the hands of manufacturers who had done well during Sept June 1915.

Women's Work.

The British Association.

Mrs. Henry Sidgwick, ex-principal of Newnham College, sister of Mr. Arthur Balfour, and the first woman to preside over the Education Science Section of the British Association, opened the session of her section by giving a description of the remarkable advance in the education of women and girls during the past forty years. Passing on to a general consideration of the nature and purpose of education, Mrs. Sidgwick criticised the official and popular view of education. She confessed that she could not share a "flaming" interest in mere school and college education, nor could she believe, as some seemed to do, that the regeneration or even a great improvement of mankind was to be attained by keeping children at school a year longer. To her the provision of educational opportunities was only the means to an end—either the preparation of teachers for their work or the opening of the door to the satisfaction of intellectual curiosity, to which progress in knowledge was mainly due. The general public, Mrs. Sidgwick thinks, is disposed to depend too much on the professional educator, and allows itself to be confused by using the same word "education" in the wider sense and also in the narrower sense of book-learning. She contended that learning was of little value unless it met a desire in the learner's mind, and this desire was more likely to be inspired by parents who possessed it than by the school. She highly commended the Workers' Educational Association for the way in which it encouraged the general public to satisfy spontaneous desire to learn. In expressing a hope that care would be exercised as to how far the State was entrusted with the regulation of education higher than primary, Mrs. Sidgwick said, "bureaucratic regulation may well be adapted to produce German Kultur, but it is not the way to secure the attitude of mind which leads to freedom, independence of thought, and culture in the best sense. And it is very apt to lead to a want of independence in the teacher."

In proposing a vote of thanks to Mrs. Sidgwick, Viscount Bryce said he considered it would be a misfortune if Government control of secondary and higher education were carried any further in this country.

Later on a paper on "Instruction in Ethics and Politics" was read by Miss E. E. Constance Jones. Other notable women who took part in the discussions were Mrs. Courtney and Miss Haldane, who spoke on the education of women in relation to careers; Miss Margaret Murray, who contributed to the Anthropological Section a paper on "Royal Marriage and Matrilineal Descent"; Dr. Sarah M. Baker, Miss Escott, Miss Charlesworth, and Dr. Marie C. Stopes, whose gifts for scientific research are inherited.

Trade Union League.

In connection with the Trade Union Congress at Bristol, the annual conference of the Women's Trade Union League was held under the presidency of Miss Gertrude Tuckwell.

Miss Mary Macarthur presented the annual report, which stated that within a few days of the declaration of war tens of thousands of women were without work. Any doubts that existed as to the Government action were set at rest by the intervention of the Queen, to whom was due the establishment of the Central Committee on Women's Employment, and the opening of the Work for Women Fund. Though the steady improvement in the state of employment, due mainly to the enormous demand for war materials of all kinds, happily curtailed the scope of the committee, it would be remembered for the efficiency and sympathy of its administration and the educative influence of its various schemes. With the revival in employment attention gradually returned from the problem of relief to that of industrial conditions, especially to the question of wages. Good results had attended a campaign for the enrolment in trade unions of women employed in the manufacture of war material.

Mr. J. A. Seddon, president of the Trade Union Congress, in referring to women's labour, said that their introduction, owing to war conditions, into many trades was causing misgiving and in some cases hostility. This was to be regretted. The only course to minimise any possible danger was to insist upon equal pay for equal work. The question was no passing phase and sex antagonism was the sure way to lower existing standards. He congratulated the National Union of Railwaymen on their success with the companies in securing recognition of equal pay for women.

than before, and that competition of men and women would increase.

To minimise the bad effect which might result, emigration was suggested, together with an extension of policy of equal pay for equal work, and minimum wage for unskilled labour, both male and female, and finally, the withdrawal of widows and young children from the labour market by the institution of an adequate pension scheme, at the same time introducing further restrictions with regard to home work.

Mr. E. F. Hitchcock, of the Manchester Chamber of Commerce, in an address, said broadly speaking, the replacement of man labour by woman labour in industries proper was only now, after twelve months of war, beginning to assume any magnitude. Women were mainly engaged in industries for the production of goods demanded by the Government for war purposes. By July, 100,000 more women were employed in these trades than before the war. Most of these women were drawn from trades which had become slack owing to the war.

Women had not so much replaced men in industry proper as it appeared. What had happened was that the war demanded goods in the production of which women were already largely employed. In non-industrial occupations the replacement of men by women had been marked—in clerical work particularly. In banks it had been found in some cases that young women had not been satisfactory owing largely to lack of confidence, and older women had been tried with satisfactory results.

Women labour was untrained labour. The present demand was for skilled workers.

Women had not, industrially-speaking, "grown up." They treated themselves as adolescents, and were so regarded by their employers. The force of circumstances demanded a change.

Women were underpaid. They earned from 50 to 70 per cent. less than men for the same work. They had not considered their object in life to be industry. Marriage was a thing to be faced, and industry was perhaps a second string to the woman's bow.

Women After the War.

Women's work after the war must go. That with modifications was the view of employers.

But in some cases female labour was more valued than male labour.

Girls were found generally more efficient, careful, and conscientious than boys, and were much to be preferred to them, but the majority of employers considered adult women were less efficient than men.

The enormous accumulation of private and shipping orders would keep some trades in which women were largely employed busy for several months after the war—tailoring in particular.

If we were to maintain our output women must be more and more engaged in industry.

Demand for More Technical Training

Miss Anne Ashley, of Birmingham, also dealt with the report, and showed that in that city there had been a marked increase of women employed, but it was largely artificial in that the women were engaged on machinery specially constructed to suit them. A good deal of women labour would, however, be permanent. There would be an extension of that sort of work that women always have done.

She thought there was going to be a big demand to repair the ravages of war in countries which had been broken by it. There would generally perhaps be a shortage of capital, but there would also be a fair amount of capital in the hands of manufacturers who had done well during the war.

The shortage after the war would be of skilled labour, whether male or female, and she advocated the extension of technical education in the staple trade. Every highly skilled person, man or woman, would relieve the situation instead of aggravating it.

CHILDREN AND THE WAR.

A Striking Comparison of Interests.

Dr. C. W. Kimmins, of London, speaking in the Psychology section on the special interests of children in the war at different ages, said the fact which emerged most plainly from an expert investigation into the subject was the bellicose attitude of the girls of ten, the wave of depression at eleven, and the establishment of normal interests at twelve years of age. The boys, on the other hand, became more warlike at eleven, and though a period of slight depression followed upon this it was much less marked than in the case of girls.

Curious instances were given of the extraordinary impressions produced upon children by new experiences, and interesting sidelights were obtained of discussions on the war overheard at home. The passage from matters of local to those of general interest as the age increased was very marked. From the age of eleven onwards great anxiety was felt with regard to the prices of food, and the excessive interest taken in the operations at the Dardanelles was clearly due to the supposed connection of the free passage to the Black Sea with the price of food.

commended the Welsh [illegible] association for the way in which it encouraged the general public to satisfy spontaneous desire to learn. In expressing a hope that care would be exercised as to how far the State was entrusted with the regulation of education higher than primary, Mrs. Sidgwick said, "bureaucratic regulation may well be adapted to produce German Kultur, but it is not the way to secure the attitude of mind which leads to freedom, independence of thought, and culture in the best sense. And it is very apt to lead to a want of independence in the teacher."

In proposing a vote of thanks to Mrs. Sidgwick, Viscount Bryce said he considered it would be a misfortune if Government control of secondary and higher education were carried any further in this country.

Later on a paper on "Instruction in Ethics and Politics" was read by Miss E. E. Constance Jones. Other notable women who took part in the discussions were Mrs. Courtney and Miss Haldane, who spoke on the education of women in relation to careers; Miss Margaret Murray, who contributed to the Anthropological Section a paper on "Royal Marriage and Matrilineal Descent"; Dr. Sarah M. Baker, Miss Escott, Miss Charlesworth, and Dr. Marie C. Stopes, whose gifts for scientific research are inherited.

Trade Union League.

In connection with the Trade Union Congress at Bristol, the annual conference of the Women's Trade Union League was held under the presidency of Miss Gertrude Tuckwell.

Miss Mary Macarthur presented the annual report, which stated that within a few days of the declaration of war tens of thousands of women were without work. Any doubts that existed as to the Government action were set at rest by the intervention of the Queen, to whom was due the establishment of the Central Committee on Women's Employment, and the opening of the Work for Women Fund. Though the steady improvement in the state of employment, due mainly to the enormous demand for war materials of all kinds, happily curtailed the scope of the committee, it would be remembered for the efficiency and sympathy of its administration and the educative influence of its various schemes. With the revival in employment attention gradually returned from the problem of relief to that of industrial conditions, especially to the question of wages. Good results had attended a campaign for the enrolment in trade unions of women employed in the manufacture of war material.

Mr. J. A. Seddon, president of the Trade Union Congress, in referring to women's labour, said that their introduction, owing to war conditions, into many trades was causing misgiving and in some cases hostility. This was to be regretted. The only course to minimise any possible danger was to insist upon equal pay for equal work. The question was no passing phase and sex antagonism was the sure way to lower existing standards. He congratulated the National Union of Railwaymen on their success with the companies in securing recognition of equal pay for women.

Glasgow Herald, 8/10/18.

WOMEN WORKERS.

"RECONSTRUCTION" AFTER THE WAR.

Miss Burstall, head mistress of the Manchester High School, spoke at the conference of the National Union of Women Workers at the Central Hall, Westminster, yesterday on the subject of women's share in the work of reconstruction after the war. Dealing with the subject from the aspect of education, Miss Burstall said we should not borrow from other countries plans of education which might suit them, but were not the natural growth of our national character. We should not copy even Scotland or America, much less Prussia, which had influenced our officials too deeply, but these nations had had for a hundred years and more what we were only just beginning to acquire—a real faith in education. Schools must be wrong which were provided by one set of people for the children of another set of people—that had been the fundamental weakness of English elementary education, which would never be right till the parents were more closely associated with the government of the schools.

Lady Laura Ridding, referring to the Parliamentary representation of universities, urged that it should be increased anl extended to the modern universities.

Miss Adler, of the London County Council, who was to have delivered a paper on the subject of the conference as it related to industry, was unable to attend owing to illness. The paper prepared by Miss Adler set forth the following aims to be striven for to secure better conditions of labour after the war:—The elimination of the child under 14 years of age from the labour market, with the gradual raising of the school age up to 16 years; a better training of adolescents in the full time and part time trade school, with a wider scheme of scholarships and maintenance grants; the development of language teaching and the further training of commercial experts; an increase in the number of trades to which the minimum wage would apply, and a further limitation of the hours of work for women in shops and factories.

At the afternoon session Miss Catherine E. Marshall read a paper on the share women should take after the war in legislation. She said that women must see that the war did not leave the nation with a perverted sense of values. They must urge the supreme value of the human being apart from his value as a fighting unit, a munitions worker, or a wealth producer.

Opening a discussion on the part women will take in the future in the care of public health, Dr Mary Murdoch said that we wanted better mothers, and this applied to the rich quite as much as to the poor. Mothercraft did not come by instinct, but must be learned practically like any other profession. More attention would have to be paid to the study of eugenics in the future.

Daily Dispatch, 12. 10. 18.

WOMEN WORKERS.

Will They Remain After the War?

It is possible that the invasion by women of so many avenues of employment may have results more permanent than is generally supposed.

Though a great number of the men whose places have thus been taken while they are absent on military duty have been promised reinstatement, there is a margin where this is not the case. Unfortunately, too many men will never return to their posts, or will come home incapacitated. Will the women be kept on? Where they have proved their capacity it seems almost certain that their services will be retained.

In some of the work they have undertaken women have shown capacity superior to that of men who had previously been employed.

A Daily Dispatch representative was informed by a railway official in Manchester yesterday that the women carriage cleaners, for example, whose appointment was one of the experiments made by the railway companies to fill up the gaps, were discharging their duties quite successfully. The work was done more thoroughly by them than by men. Passengers had commented favourably upon the improved appearance of the carriages and their greater cleanliness inside.

The women tramguards, too, have given great satisfaction both in Salford and in other boroughs where they have been appointed. The fact that they are now engaged on the Manchester trams is another proof.

There are occupations, involving long hours of heavy work with continuous physical strain, where it is recognised that the employment of women is only a makeshift. But there are other cases where barriers against the employment of women have been broken down, and are likely to remain down. In banks and certain business offices women are adapting themselves so well to the routine and the mastery of detail that the end of the war may very well see them firmly established.

702/9

The New Statesman – October 9th 1915.

Correspondence

THE FUTURE DISPLACEMENT OF WOMEN WORKERS

To the Editor of THE NEW STATESMAN.

SIR,—It is not in any spirit of antagonism that I would like to refer to your article entitled "Hands Wanted," but rather in one of honest doubt and uncertainty. Since the beginning of the war, as men have been withdrawn from various industries and professions, their places have, in many instances, been filled by women workers, and the further extension of this policy you strongly advocate.

"Farmers and railway companies," you declare, "manufacturers and Government Departments alike, are, mainly for their own convenience, so as to avoid the trouble of having to train women, using all possible influence to prevent their men from going off to serve the State. . . .

"Why does not the Minister of Munitions get his colleagues to prohibit the use of motor cars by private persons—at least unless the owner drives himself and does his own repairs, or employs a woman—and simultaneously offer to each of these 50,000 mechanics employment at not less than forty shillings a week in munition factories? Similarly, there are, in the United Kingdom, about 50,000 tramcar conductors who can quite well be replaced temporarily by women. . . ."

What will happen to these women when the war is over? Are they to retain the positions for which they have qualified themselves and keep the men who return out of their original employment, or, if not, what is to be their future? A very delicate situation will be created, and it will require all the skill and tact of employers and workers as well as of politicians and public officials to solve the question. As one who has the highest opinion of women, deploring very deeply the attitude of many men towards members of the other sex, and being wholly in sympathy with the feminist movement, which has done a great deal for women and men alike, I must candidly confess that I view the future with very grave feelings of doubt and disquietude. A sex war is, of course, a phantasmagoria of overwrought pessimism, but it is quite possible that the organised bodies of male and female workers might find themselves in serious opposition, and this would be surely one of the worst things that could happen for the happiness of the country and the benefit of civilisation.

It is quite true that a considerable number of the men who went out will unhappily never return, while others will unfortunately be prevented from returning to their original positions through physical disabilities. But these will only be a minority. Again, it is highly probable that a much larger standing army than has hitherto been maintained will be retained by the Government, and this, too, will absorb a certain number of those who enlisted. But allowing for all these, there is yet a very large number of men who will return to civilian employment. In the Civil Service and in municipal offices, as well as in posts under many of the banks and private firms, their positions are being retained for them until they return, and in the meantime these are being filled in many cases by women.

In the article already mentioned, if I may make a further quotation, you say:

The necessary number of men is, however, not likely to be obtained until the nation gives certain definite guarantees as to the way in which, after the war, it will treat those who have either worked or fought for the State. What is primarily asked for is neither pay nor pension, separation allowance nor provision for disablement, but an assurance that the Government will not ruthlessly empty the munition factories and disband the Army, when peace comes, without securing employment for those who have no situations reserved for them.

Now, I feel sure that it is not through thoughtlessness or unconcern that you omit any demand for guarantees of continued employment for women workers now taking the places of men at the front, as that would be somewhat irrevelant to the subject with which your article deals, but it is a very important point. Is it possible while guaranteeing settled positions for the men when they return also to guarantee others for the women, or must the employment of the one be detrimental to that of the other? In the Great State such guarantees would be compatible, and men and women could have work according to their ability and qualifications, but when the war is over we are certain to have a Government supporting an increased army and burdened at least by £3,000,000,000 worth of national debt, either rightly or wrongly committed to a policy of economy if not of parsimony. Under such conditions it is highly improbable that they will greatly extend the scope for female clerks in Government offices, and though some little may be done to carry out the recommendations of the recent Royal Commission on the Civil Service, it is unlikely that any wide-sweeping changes will be made. The extension of clerical labour to women by Government will consequently employ only a few of the many women workers now filling the posts of men who have enlisted. Others, like the daughter of that suburban season-ticket holder whose father has "allowed" her to take a post as typist owing to temporary financial embarrassment at home, will return to their suburban villas when matters begin to straighten themselves out again. There are also a number who are filling the posts of their husbands and prospective husbands, and these will, after the war, naturally take up their positions as married women.

But allowing for all these, there are yet a very great many for whom "the unborn faces shine beside the never-lighted fire," and also those who having once tasted the sweets (as well as the bitters) of freedom will shrink from returning to domestic duties. And this is the number about whose future there is ground for disquietude. If they are to be thrown back upon the labour market, already overcrowded with regard to the clerical profession, it will be a real disservice to men and women alike, for the employers will certainly try to reduce expenditure by employing the cheapest material—the quantity of which is being continuously increased as a result of the advertisements of the correspondence colleges, who for their own profit are predicting a great trade boom after the war.

To suggest remedies is much harder than to point out difficulties I am aware, but sometimes it is of assistance to indicate difficulties so that they may be realised and to some extent combated before they arise. The Fabian Research Department is, I understand, investigating the question of "women in industry—how their condition is being altered by the war," and I hope the position of those professionally employed will not be overlooked, for it is equally important. Perhaps backed by so much intellectual ability and helped by a much wider outlook through longer experience, they may see light which is denied to individual observers.—Yours, etc.,

October 4th. HERBERT BROADLEY.

WOMEN'S WAGES

To the Editor of THE NEW STATESMAN.

SIR,—A joint Committee of the Fabian Research Department and the Fabian Women's Group is engaged on an enquiry into the new position of women in industry. Among the members are Mr. and Mrs. Sidney Webb, Miss Mary Macarthur, Miss Margaret Bondfield, Miss Susan Lawrence, L.C.C., Mr. J. J. Mallon, and prominent Trade Unionists, in addition to representatives of the Economic Section of the British Association, the Women's Industrial Council, and other bodies.

The outlook at present is grave. History shows, unfortunately, that the entry of women into trades hitherto occupied by men has often been used by employers to cheapen the cost and degrade the conditions of labour. The fact that women enter the trade on a new or readjusted process obscures but does not alter the case. The blackleg process still goes on though its operation is indirect. The unprecedented demand for female labour since the war may thus quite easily be turned into a means for the creation of new forms of sweating.

Under the Munitions Act many Trade Unions have withdrawn or relaxed their rules and customs with regard to restrictions on female labour for the period of the war. The Government and the employers have given certain safeguards in return. Even if the promise given by Mr. Lloyd George, that women employed on war munitions should be paid for the same work at the same piece rates as the men, is kept to the letter, the fact remains that women are being employed on time-rates instead of piece-rates, which bear no relation to those of the men, or else processes have been so readjusted that, although the women are accomplishing the same result as the men, no one woman is engaged on exactly the same process as any one man. Meanwhile the standards of the men's Trade Unions are thrown to the winds, while the women are employed at rates that threaten the whole position of Labour. Unless the position is understood and faced, the probabilities are that Labour will wake after the war to find itself powerless as never before, while the women may well be worse off than they were.

The objects of the present enquiry are, then:

(1) To enquire how far, and in what occupations and processes, female labour is being introduced for the first time; or is increasing; or is replacing male labour.

(2) To find out at what rates and under what conditions women are now working, and what is the cause or explanation of or justification for any differentiation between grades or sexes.

(3) To enquire how far the readjustment of processes now being made have rendered easier the introduction of female labour, and how far they are likely to secure its permanence after the war.

(4) To enquire into the rules and customs which restrict the employment of men or of women, or influence the line of demarcation between their work, and to enquire in what way any alteration is likely to affect them.

Anyone able to contribute any facts is requested to communicate them to the undersigned.

But—and here we come to the main purpose of this letter—an enquiry which entails the collecting and sifting of a vast mass of technical material from every district and from nearly every industry cannot be conducted without funds. The claims of research may appear slight in comparison with other more pressing needs. Yet surely this enquiry is one which must be undertaken now, whilst the process is going on, or not at all, and we shall need the information for the reconstruction that will follow wreckage. So that we may not fail for lack of knowledge, we appeal to readers of THE NEW STATESMAN on behalf of the Fabian Joint Committee, for means to gain some part of that knowledge now. Cheques should be made payable to the Treasurer, The Fabian Research Department, G. P. Blizard, at the following address.—Yours, etc.,

25 Tothill Street, Westminster, S.W. BARBARA DRAKE, Chairman.

New Ways - 6th. Nov. 1918.

Women in Industry

"Wherever you turn you will find Employers in Productive Industries Welcoming Women into their Factories only because they are Cheaper than Men"

By ROWLAND KENNEY

SOME weeks ago, when Mr. Lloyd George was urging upon Trade Unionists that the employment of women for war work would not be permanent and would not enter into competition with men's labour, Mrs. Pankhurst is reported to have interrupted him with the remark: "Very healthy competition!" It was an apt remark. It showed clearly what was meant by many people who were prating grandiloquently of the opportunities then offered to women to "achieve their economic independence." But it was not quite complete. One word more was needed to give it its full significance. Mrs. Pankhurst should have said, "Very healthy for competition!" For we may be absolutely certain that only those who thrive upon competitive industry are going to become more "healthy" as a result of the intensification of the struggle for jobs between men and their wives, or men and their sisters or other female relatives.

Labour Suspicious.

Now, I realise quite well that, in such a struggle as that in which we are now engaged, every ounce of energy the nation can muster should be utilised. The labour of women should be expended so as to strengthen the hands of the men. But this realisation does not blind me to the fact that, of all the concessions made by labour during the war, of all the restrictions it has had removed, of all the dangerous innovations it has seen introduced, none is giving it so much thought and anxiety as that of the introduction of more women into industry; and labour is right to be suspicious.

I hope this will not seem an unpatriotic attitude, because, like the vast majority of the workers of this country, I believe that, whatever else happens, we must come victorious out of the war; and wherever women can be useful to the nation their help should be willingly accepted by the nation. The trouble is, however, that we are not united on this point. To win we want national unity. We want the willing co-operation of all classes and creeds in labour for national ends. Unfortunately, we have not got that. In the supremest crisis of our national history we have the class struggle still in being in the industrial world, and the Government acting as if the class struggle must remain a permanent feature of our national life. We have some employers making all the profits they can extract out of the nation's needs; or the Government, where it does assume control, actually guaranteeing more than usual instead of eliminating entirely the very element of profit from controlled establishments. In short, in the midst of a world-shaking war, we have British profiteering as usual.

A Quandary: Patriotism or Cheap Labour.

The quandary in which labour is placed with regard to this matter thus becomes obvious. It is anxious for victory, and because it is anxious for victory it desires the whole strength of the nation, including that of women, to be expended on the nation's behalf. On the other hand, it knows that, under the profiteering system, employers have to keep their eyes open for cheap labour. It knows, further, that any cheap commodity introduced into the industrial or commercial world tends to cheapen or drive out higher-priced commodities if it can be made to "do." And labour to-day is simply a commodity, to be bought as cheaply as possible and used to the enrichment of the buyer. The lower the employer can depress wages, the cheaper that is he can buy the commodity labour, the wider is the "margin" between the cost of the article he sells and the price he receives for it. Therefore any element that will help him to depress wages is a helpful element.

Government Action Needed.

And one of the most helpful elements that can be found is the element of female labour. It is cheap labour. Wherever you turn you will find employers in productive industries welcoming women into their factories only because they are cheaper than men. Women have certain handicaps in the industrial race which will always make employers prefer men to women, other things being equal. But other things never are equal where production is for profit. A woman who does sixty per cent. of a man's work for forty per cent. of a man's pay, and ruins her body—and perhaps her soul—into the bargain, is infinitely preferable to the man by an employer who, as such, must concern himself neither with her body nor her soul, but with the margin between her cost and the price of goods she produces. What then, it may be asked, should have been done? The reply is: The Government, if it had not the courage to take over industries outright, and itself, as a national employer, absorb all available women for national labour, should, at any rate, have seen that no employer engaged female labour in place of male labour without entering into an agreement to displace it at the end of the war and to keep up the price of labour, male or female, in the meantime.

For the War Only—But After.

At this point another objection will be raised. Have we not been told that all these new inroads on labour's rights and emoluments are but for the period of the war? We have been told so; and most of us who are interested in labour affairs refuse to believe it. We know very well, of course we do, that jobs will be found for a certain number of soldiers who return from the war; but we know equally well that if any labour is to be displaced for this purpose, the temptation will be terribly strong to displace the higher-priced men's labour. The newly-introduced cheap women's labour will be kept on. Look at the matter how we may, we can only come to the conclusion that the further opening up of the competitive labour market for women means the permanent depression of the wage of labour throughout the industrial sphere. Thus we have the patriotic instincts of our womenfolk being used to bolster up and strengthen the profiteering system, a system that showed its weaknesses as soon as the strain of war was brought to bear upon it.

Bath & Wilts Chronicle
19/11/15

THE WAR AND SOCIAL PROBLEMS

MISS CONSTANCE SMITH'S VIEWS

FUTURE OF THE WORKING WOMAN

To further the objects of the Christian Social Union a public meeting was held at the Guildhall on Thursday evening. The Rev. R. C. L. Reade, Rector of Charlcombe, presided and among those present were the Archdeacon of Bath, the Rector of Bath (Preb. Boyd), Prebendaries M. E. Hoets, H. L. Maynard and T. L. Sissmore, the Revs. Alan Gardner, J. A. Gibson, and Dr. Preston King.

The Chairman was afraid one thing was certain whoever won this war—there must be a hard time after it. Following this tremendous boom of trade, caused by the expenditure of five millions a day on the war there must come a great dislocation of industry and a time of impoverishment. The plan of study of the Union for this year was the social and economical conditions of the war and how to meet them. This was what he believed Miss Smith would speak upon, for her address was entitled "To-day and to-morrow."

Miss Constance Smith, one of the senior lady Government Inspectors of Factories, who was welcomed as an old friend, said there were those who would deprecate calling attention at this time to the problems of to-morrow lest such consideration should weaken our concentration on the needs of to-day. But she did not think that would happen if the problems of to-morrow were approached in the right spirit. Many of these problems were already with us and it was only on those questions she proposed to speak. Social and industrial problems had been with us from the first minute of the war, they had been developing and many in directions quite other than those we expected; these would be clamouring for solution when peace came. When war broke out the thought was how to provide work for the workers, the difficulty now was to find workers for the work. The dislocation which the Chairman foreshadowed might not be so sudden or widespread as some people seemed to fear. There were many modifying circumstances which might mean that the dislocation would be gradual, and there might be time to reorganise the forces of peace, but only if we were prepared, not if we waited until the whole thing was upon us and then tried to improvise remedies.

PROBLEMS OF INFANT AND CHILD LIFE.

Some of the problems were already finding solution. Take the problem of the protection of infant and child life. It needed a European war to make the country say that the notification of births should be compulsory. Then the early shopping movement had come into being under war pressure and she could not believe we should ever go back upon it. For too many years we had been wantonly wasting the health and strength of young people. One problem which would be exceedingly insistent at peace, and concerning which it was necessary to reflect and lay plans, was what should be done about education? The whole lesson of the war and all that had led up to the war was not that we had had too much education, but had had too little and not good enough. She would be sorry to see German methods, with their rigidity, imposed in this country. There was too much child labour before the war and there was some danger in the relaxation of rules insisted on by the war. What was needed was a well-devised plan in which child labour could be, as far as possible, eliminated from our industries.

A LIVING WAGE FOR WOMEN.

Woman work was becoming every day more and more important. Many had no idea of the extent to which women were supplying the place of men in factories and workshops not under the public eye. And women were doing their work extraordinarily well to the quite naive and frank surprise, and pleasure, of their employers. After alluding to the psychological effect upon women of being taken out of the narrow routine and advanced to the turning out of the complete article, Miss Smith said women had now realised what it was to earn a living wage; in certain employments there was an agreement that the piece rates laid down for the women should be the same as those for the men whose places they had taken. Plans should be prepared by which women could get the training and the protection they needed in their work, and a public opinion should be created which would not permit women to go back, after their splendid efforts, to the old sweated wages of the past (applause).

FEMALE LABOUR ON FARMS.

The agricultural problem was one in which much headway had not been made. Some women who had gone on farms to learn agricultural work had been objects of ridicule by farmers' wives and others. But she felt that the educated women who were plucky enough to do this work must go on with it and educate opinion. In her old county of Wilts she remembered middle-aged women who were proud to undertake employment on the land, doing a great deal of weeding and hoeing and assisting in the harvest. But that ancient custom had died away. This agricultural problem needed much study and organised effort, for it was going to become extremely acute because many of the young labourers who had gone into the Army would not go back to the land. Serious sacrifice would have to be made. We did not want to turn our country women into [illegible]

The Chairman said [illegible] tain whoever won this war—there must be a hard time after it. Following this tremendous boom of trade, caused by the expenditure of five millions a day on the war there must come a great dislocation of industry and a time of impoverishment. The plan of study of the Union for this year was the social and economical conditions of the war and how to meet them. This was what he believed Miss Smith would speak upon, for her address was entitled "To-day and to-morrow."

Miss Constance Smith, one of the senior lady Government Inspectors of Factories, who was welcomed as an old friend, said there were those who would deprecate calling attention at this time to the problems of to-morrow lest such consideration should weaken our concentration on the needs of to-day. But she did not think that would happen if the problems of to-morrow were approached in the right spirit. Many of these problems were already with us and it was only on those questions she proposed to speak. Social and industrial problems had been with us from the first minute of the war, they had been developing and many in directions quite other than those we expected; these would be clamouring for solution when peace came. When war broke out the thought was how to provide work for the workers, the difficulty now was to find workers for the work. The dislocation which the Chairman foreshadowed might not be so sudden or widespread as some people seemed to fear. There were many modifying circumstances which might mean that the dislocation would be gradual, and there might be time to reorganise the forces of peace, but only if we were prepared, not if we waited until the whole thing was upon us and then tried to improvise remedies.

PROBLEMS OF INFANT AND CHILD LIFE.

Some of the problems were already finding solution. Take the problem of the protection of infant and child life. It needed a European war to make the country say that the notification of births should be compulsory. Then the early shopping movement had come into being under war pressure and she could not believe we should ever go back upon it. For too many years we had been wantonly wasting the health and strength of young people. One problem which would be exceedingly insistent at peace, and concerning which it was necessary to reflect and lay plans, was what should be done about education? The whole lesson of the war and all that had led up to the war was not that we had had too much education, but had had too little and not good enough. She would be sorry to see German methods, with their rigidity, imposed in this country. There was too much child labour before the war and there was some danger in the relaxation of rules insisted on by the war. What was needed was a well-derised plan in which child labour could be, as far as possible, eliminated from our industries.

A LIVING WAGE FOR WOMEN.

Woman work was becoming every day more and more important. Many had no idea of the extent to which women were supplying the place of men in factories and workshops not under the public eye. And women were doing their work extraordinarily well to the quite naive and frank surprise, and pleasure, of their employers. After alluding to the psychological effect upon women of being taken out of the narrow routine and advanced to the turning out of the complete article, Miss Smith said women had now realised what it was to earn a living wage; in certain employments there was an agreement that the piece rates laid down for the women should be the same as those for the men whose places they had taken. Plans should be prepared by which women could get the training and the protection they needed in their work, and a public opinion should be created which would not permit women to go back, after their splendid efforts, to the old sweated wages of the past (applause).

FEMALE LABOUR ON FARMS.

The agricultural problem was one in which much headway had not been made. Some women who had gone on farms to learn agricultural work had been objects of ridicule by farmers' wives and others. But she felt that the educated women who were plucky enough to do this work must go on with it and educate opinion. In her old county of Wilts she remembered middle-aged women who were proud to undertake employment on the land, doing a great deal of weeding and hoeing and assisting in the harvest. But that ancient custom had died away. This agricultural problem needed much study and organised effort, for it was going to become extremely acute because many of the young labourers who had gone into the Army would not go back to the land. Serious sacrifice would have to be made. We did not want to turn our country women into beasts of burden, but there could be some conbination of field work, a most healthy occupation, with ordinary vocations. Speaking of the greatly altered conditions that must obtain after the war—for there was bound to be a different social system—Miss Smith said it was clear that if we were to build a better world it must be on a foundation of sacrifice.

A vote of thanks was accorded Miss Smith and others who had helped to make the meeting a success, on the motion of the Archdeacon of Bath, seconded by Dr. Preston King.

702/12 702

Daily News & Leader - 14. 12. 15.

A Sex Warfare: WOMEN AND THE FUTURE OF INDUSTRY.

By MARION PHILLIPS, D.Sc. (Econ.)

WOMEN who are not themselves closely connected with industrial life show great optimism as to women's future position in industry. They rightly congratulate the working woman upon her adaptability, her capacity for hard work, and her readiness to offer personal sacrifices for the nation's good. The situation would then seem of good augury for women. All that they have done in this time of stress and struggle, all the splendid power which they have shown to take up new tasks, and often harder tasks than in the past, the wonderful cool bravery with which they have worked in the hospitals and even on the field of battle, seem to point to a new recognition of their importance in national life, and give rise to a natural feeling of certainty that after peace has come women will readily receive those full rights of citizenship for which they have fought so long.

THE COMING DANGER.

But the industrial changes of to-day bear with them a real and a great danger. Their result may well be the opening of a most acute phase of sex antagonism.

The demand for women's labour is at present unprecedented, and it is a demand which is greatest in the heavier and rougher classes of factory employment. The demand is almost non-existent in the light, highly-skilled work of the luxury trades, and greatest in the very wide field of munition employment. The demand is not so much for women to take men's places in new kinds of work, as it is for more and more women to do the work which has always been done by them, but in which an enormously increased output is now needed. In addition to this, there is the demand for women to do skilled, but chiefly unskilled, work in factories where formerly no women, or very few women, were employed. There are also thousands of women who are taking the place of men in trades such as that of the ticket collector, the shop assistant, and so on—trades in which women have always been occupied in some directions, though not in such large numbers as now. In the clerking world also the increase of women and decrease of men is fairly marked.

EQUAL PAY FOR WOMEN.

In some directions this employment of women can be directed by the trade unions, and the railway unions, e.g., have already interfered to see that the rate for women shall be equal to that for men. Again, in the controlled establishments the position may be regulated by the Munitions Act on trade union lines after the war. That is, wherever the trade unions are strong enough, they can determine the employment of women and so regulate it as not to endanger the position of the wage earner.

But it must be remembered that throughout the country women are being employed in such a way as to displace men in establishments which are now occupied both on war and peace work, uncontrolled by any outside authority, and with one desire—that of cheapening so far as possible the cost of labour and production.

Moreover, we have in some directions a failure on the part of trade unions to grasp the need of organising women; and we find the old ideas prevailing and reluctance shown to accept the woman worker on equal terms, a reluctance which has its historical background in the fact that the introduction of women has almost without exception led to a cheapening of labour.

WHEN PEACE COMES.

As peace draws near the war industries will slacken their production. Factory after factory will reduce its output; factory after factory founded for war needs will close down. In the poverty which will succeed this time of stress, normal industry will be crippled, and trade will fall into a depression probably greater than any we have known. The staffs which will have been swollen to an enormous size during the war will be cut down to the barest minimum. Where the controlled establishment is concerned and the trade union is strong, the women will cease to be employed on men's work; and men will be taken back—so far as there is need for them. Enormous numbers of women employed at women's work in munition factories, etc., will be discharged. Many will have lost their skill for their old trades, and many who have not done that, will find that unemployment is rife amongst those also. Outside the controlled establishments there will be other establishments which gave more or less vague promises to take back enlisted men. These will keep them in some cases. In others they will have replaced the men by cheap women; and they will keep the women.

More than that, we must consider the changed proportions of the industrial market. Whatever our hopes of a speedy end to the war, we cannot look forward to a wastage in men of less than one million. For there is not only the wastage in the trenches; there is the wastage due to over-pressure of work upon the people at home. And this wastage means a lower rate of marriage and a consequent large increase in the number of women who will have to seek work outside their homes instead of within them.

A DREARY OUTLOOK.

The scene we have set forth is a gloomy one enough. A horde of men and women, many wasted by the hard work of these years of trial, a trade depression, a general wave of poverty and exhaustion. Men returned from the wars to find their work gone from them; women displaced to make way for men; women displaced because war work has ceased and peace work is not there for them; women displaced because they have lost their skill at the only trade now open to them, and men displaced because the employers driving the hardest bargains open to them have found women cheaper and no less efficient than the men they drew their wealth from in the old days. The very efficiency and adaptability of the woman is in itself a danger, so long as it is not combined with the industrial pride which demands a fair return for the labour given.

In this scene are all the elements of sex warfare in industry of a very terrible nature—a sex warfare in which the male workers and the women dependent upon them are ranked against the women who must work or die.

THE ONLY REMEDY.

The warfare can be prevented, but it can only be prevented if action is taken quickly and with intention to succeed. The basis of that action must be Trade Unionism. The organisation of women is essential. Thus ranked together, men and women, the demand must be made for the regulation of the wages of workers throughout both the controlled and uncontrolled industry of the country. A minimum wage for time as well as piece, based upon the standard rates for men, must succeed the present chaos, and place women definitely upon a basis of equality with men. But behind all this must come the responsibility of the community, through the Government, for every displaced man and woman when the war ends. That responsibility can alone stave off the cruellest of labour struggles, lead the way to future industrial as well as military peace and effectively prevent the pitting of men against women and the degradation of the whole industrial population of the community.

General article with photo 1915 702

Daily News & Leader — 18. 12. 15.

SWORD AND PLOUGHSHARE.

THE WAR AND THE LAND.

By A. G. G.

I rarely go into the House of Lords, and when I do I usually feel those damps of the grave that were the point of Beaconsfield's great jest on his elevation to the Upper House—"I feel as though I am dead and buried." Then, seeing the look of horror on his fellow peer's face, he added: "And awaiting a glorious resurrection." But occasionally the stately tomb vibrates with startling echoes from the world above ground, and then the very novelty of the experience gives it emphasis. That was the case with the remarkable debate this week on the subject of the resettlement after the war.

The urgency of that question can hardly be exaggerated. The war is only a stupendous interlude. It may continue for months, but it cannot be measured by years, and there are abundant signs that it may end as swiftly as it began, and at no distant date. And when that end comes we shall need the Peace Book of which Lord Haldane spoke as much as we needed the War Book of which he was the chief author, and which played so wonderful a part in saving Europe from the first shock of the German attack.

Back from the Battlefield.

For consider the situation. The whole nation has been violently swept into new channels of activity. Four million men have been or are being turned from citizens into soldiers, from producers of wealth into consumers of wealth only. Even the men who have remained behind have lost their industrial identity and have been turned into feeders of the gigantic instrument of war. There is hardly a tithe of us engaged in the work which we were doing when the tragedy burst on us. When the fever subsides there will be a task of readjustment unlike anything in history. It is impossible that the fabric that has been suddenly pulled to pieces will come together in its original shape. Millions of men, torn from their familiar settings, will have acquired new tastes, new ambitions, new views which will govern their future and ours. "No more office stools for me" is the familiar cry of the clerk turned soldier. No more drudgery on the land on the old terms, is the thought which must be fashioning itself in the mind of many a labourer who has learned what good food and good clothing mean and has discovered that society ultimately rests on his thews and sinews.

The Woman's Victory.

Nor is this all. I am not sure that in this vast displacement the emergence of woman will not be found in the end to be the biggest fact of all. She has established her independent industrial life with startling authority. Everyone who has seen anything of the munitions activity is full of astonished praises of the work she is doing, and in a large measure she has superseded the man in the general activities of the nation. Socially she can never return quite to her old place and industrially she cannot be expected to disappear with the end of the war. She has occupied new territory and she will hold it.

In these circumstances the problems we shall have to grapple with to-morrow are as great as they are complex. What is being done to solve them? The most constructive minds of the nation, minds like those of Lord Haldane and Mr. Sidney Webb, captains of organised industry, like Sir William Lever, great trade unionists like Mr. [illegible] and Mr. Smillie, women of [illegible] to stay at home. This is not a question of sentiment, but of necessity. It is a necessity for two reasons: because as a State we need our vigorous manhood and because we can no longer afford the wasteful handling of our most precious inheritance, the soil. We have allowed that inheritance to be the spoil of the rich man, and even to-day we hear of foxes being turned down to ravage the fields that should feed us. What is the strength of France? It is its six million small cultivators, with their labour, their thrift, and their wholesome independent life. Against that solid phalanx of rural strength we cannot put a quarter of a million of smallholders, and labour on the land has been diminished to its lowest terms. Splendid soil that should employ multitudes of happy workmen is converted into solitudes of pasture; inferior land that industry and money would make rich is left rank and unprofitable or applied simply to the amusements of a selfish sporting class.

Co-operative Settlement.

Let us see this as a national question as much as the war. We have to beat the Germans in battle to-day; but we have to beat them in the development of our country to-morrow if we are to have the final and enduring victory. And it is in the field more than in the factory where we are imperilled. How is the thing to be done? It cannot be left to casual, independent action. Men cannot create a career for themselves on the land unaided no matter how much they desire to do so. The experience under the Small Holdings Act has shown the difficulties of breaking down the monopoly of landlordism in the interests of the smallholder. Moreover isolated action is futile. The smallholder must have a co-operative basis or he cannot live: as an individual he perishes. Only the nation can save the nation—and I say "Save the nation" in the literal sense. We may hope that the Verney Committee will realise this and that they will report in favour of a big scheme of co-operative settlement.

How It Works.

The idea of such settlements is well understood. That enthusiastic agricultural reformer, Mr. Christopher Turnor, has done much to popularise it. The root of the idea is that the small farmer cannot live alone either socially, economically or industrially. He must live in a community which will give him co-operative facilities without which he is helpless. The ideal is an estate of some 2,000 or 3,000 acres. In the centre will be an experimental farm under the control of an expert farmer who, with his assistants will educate the smallholder, manage the co-operative bank, buy the stock wholesale and market the produce for the growers much on the principle of the great Danish system which has converted a poor, sandy soil into a very treasure house of wealth. Around the experimental farm will be the small holdings, each with its farmhouse. They will vary from 100 to 300 holdings according to the character of the farming, the maximum holding being about 25 acres, the minimum five acres for the market gardener. Co-operative jam-making, dairying etc. will be associated with the scheme and there will be common pasture and a common use of utensils.

The Cost.

It is calculated that the scheme will cost £1,000 per settler. Do you shrink at the price? You will not shrink if you remember that we are spending five millions a day on the war, and that two months of expenditure on that scale she cannot be expected to disappear with the end of the war. She has occupied new territory and she will hold it.

In these circumstances the problems we shall have to grapple with to-morrow are as great as they are complex. What is being done to solve them? The most constructive minds of the nation, minds like those of Lord Haldane and Mr. Sidney Webb, captains of organised industry, like Sir William Lever, great trade unionists like Mr. Shackleton and Mr. Smillie, women of affairs like Mrs. Creighton and Miss Macarthur, in short all the best available capacity of the State should be engaged upon the momentous task of preparing for the resettlement of society. It is the gravest indictment of the Government that no comprehensive step of this sort has been taken. We are leaving this great matter to this department and that, each working in its own water-tight chamber wholly indifferent to the essential unity of the problem. Or we are trusting to private action or such well-meaning charities as the Patriotic Fund or the Soldiers and Sailors Society.

The Tragedy of the Soil.

In only one direction that I can see has there been any real appreciation of the gravity of the business before us. The committee which has been sitting on the subject of land settlement after the war is about to report. It is to be hoped that it will report in a spirit of courage equal to the emergency. The question of the land is the keystone of reconstruction. If the war has taught us nothing else it has taught us that our national life depends on the manhood of the nation. In the final ordeal nothing else matters. And the roots of manhood are in the soil. "That nation is strongest," said Froude," which has the largest proportion of its people with a direct interest in the land." Judged by this axiom we have the most perilous tenure of any great people. There is hardly any tragedy like that of our village labourer, robbed of his common lands, housed worse than the animals, denied any possibility of a career of hope, turned adrift into the towns to make way for sport, solitary, unorganised, servile. In the last half-century, while the population of the country has doubled, the agricultural population has decreased by a million.

What Shall We Offer?

Is this terrible rot to continue or are we at last awake to its tragic meaning and determined at all costs to apply drastic remedies? There is a banal song of these days which has a refrain about "keeping the flag flying till the boys come home." But where are they going when they come home? Are we to offer them the old fourteen shillings a week on the land and when they refuse that, as they will, send them with millions of others to the desolation of the docks and the slums to revive all the old horrors of unemployment? Are we going to point with magnanimity to the plains of Canada and Australia and invite them to leave the country they have saved and find a living elsewhere? There will doubtless be an impulse to emigration, but we must remember that, after the enormous loss of our manhood in the war, we cannot afford a great drift of our most vigorous blood away from our shores.

When "the boys come home" we must see that we make it worth their while for the market gardener. Co-operative jam-making, dairying etc. will be associated with the scheme and there will be common pasture and a common use of utensils.

The Cost.

It is calculated that the scheme will cost £1,000 per settler. Do you shrink at the price? You will not shrink if you remember that we are spending five millions a day on the war, and that two months of expenditure on that scale would settle 300,000 smallholders on the land. And is it not as urgent a national task to build up England as it is to blow down Germany? Every soldier we send to the trenches costs this country £500 a year in the loss of his productive service and the cost of his maintenance. Is it not worth £1,000 to make him a soldier of the ploughshare and a profitable citizen for life? And think of the credit side. This money will not be blown into the air. It will be invested in the best security in the world, the lives of our people and the soil of our country. Every penny that is spent will come back. And it will come back with an enormous increment in the prosperity of the people, the productiveness of the soil, the development of a new peasant race in the rural solitudes of our land. It will readjust the balance between the town and the country and revitalise the blood of the race. It is the biggest piece of constructive work to which a nation was ever called by the stern compulsion of events.

And the Labourer.

But, it will be said, we cannot secure small holdings for all that we need to return to the land. What of the rest? What of the labourer? He will not return for his old pittance and yet he must return. How is he to be induced to do so? Only by better wages and better prospects. Here the Verney Committee will come up against the stumbling block that brought the Milner inquiry to grief. Give us Protection, says the farmer, give us stable prices, and we will give the labourer a living wage. We may hope that the Committee will be warned not to coquet with this vain thing. The thing that is wrong with agriculture is not prices, but the restraints of landlordism and the lack of organisation. The way for the State to help the farmer to pay a decent wage for his labour is to release him from the anti-social restrictions of his calling, especially "sport,' to organise his transport and his marketing, to help him with the credit he needs and which, with the disappearance of the old private bank, he has largely lost, to give him easy access to the best machinery of farming—in a word to stimulate his industry, not to give it the narcotic of protection. This is no time for toying with the antiquated folly of artificial food prices

Nor must we forget that sweated labour is not cheap labour in agriculture any more than in any other industry. The heresy that it is has been at the root of the miserable lot of the labourer. Let the nation deal with agriculture, as it has dealt with nail-making, shirt-making and other industries, as a sweated trade, let it fix minimum wages, deal with housing, set the alternative of the small holding at work, facilitate the marketing of produce and get the landlord off the back of the farmer and there will be no need to make the townsman pay dear for his bread in order that the peasant may earn a decent living on the soil.

F02/14 F02

Illustrated Sunday Herald. 19. 12. 15.

"THE WOMEN WILL NOT GO BACK."

Girls Who Have Filled Men's Place During The War: What Is To Become Of Them After Peace?

By Edward Cecil.

Wherever one goes nowadays and two or three people are gathered together they talk about the war. If not the war they get on to some aspects of the new phenomenon in our midst, and of these the wholesale employment of girls and women in all sorts of occupations, many of them quite new to women, is among the greatest. Apart from the war, the great question of the hour is the woman question.

MR. EDWARD CECIL.

On the whole there is more profit to be gained by discussing the woman question than by wasting one's breath about the war. For almost all our war talk is utterly useless. We are for ever discussing situations which have really passed, or the advisability or the inadvisability of this or that course of action, in which the irrevocable step has already been taken or delay has rendered it impossible to take it. But the woman question is made up of certain essential issues and a number of minor questions which we have got to settle for ourselves.

Does anyone really think that the women being employed to-day in all the manifold varieties of work now thrown open to them will cease to be employed in these new fields of labour "when the war is over"?

We hear so much about the temporary employment of women. It doubtless sounds pretty to talk about the woman keeping the man's job warm for him while he is away fighting for her and his King and country.

But to me it seems unlikely that the newly-employed women will go back into their unemployment. It is not in the least probable, once woman knows what she can do, and employers of labour find out what good work she can give them, that she will go back, or be allowed to go back, into her pre-war obscurity. And there are many reasons why it is probable that the employment of women will be permanent.

A large number of men will not come back at all, or will come back disabled. Many more will remain in the Army. Many a man, once used to a free, open-air life, will not go back to a clerk's stool. For the days when the black coat was a fetish of respectability are quickly passing, and in the future the male clerk will be the exception and the female clerk the rule. Consequently the supposed temporary employment of women will in very many cases be permanent, for the very simple reason that the gaps in the labour market will be permanent, and not temporary.

That many women are already doing the new work well is undoubted. All, perhaps, are not a success in all their new callings.

But much of the work is of proved excellence. Such work can never be thrown aside. Every post well filled is prima facie a post which may be considered permanent.

For many years education, both primary and secondary, has been fitting girls for clerical and office work in vast numbers. These girls and young women have been trained for anything but the domestic virtues. They are hungry for the work which is now at last open to them on all hands. They will do it permanently, in so far as they prove they can do it satisfactorily, for one reason because there will be a permanent stream of supply created by the type of education we have been giving our daughters in all classes of the community.

Woman's Reward.

The work will be permanent, lastly, because women themselves, finding their powers, enjoying the money they earn, appreciating the value of a new freedom, will demand that it shall not be taken away from them. What they like they will keep. They will urge that they have helped the nation in a time of need, and, as a reward, they will feel entitled to a right to do work they have proved they can do. I see no reason against such an argument

Face to face with the employment of women being permanent one has to decide whether one approves of it or not, whether one will help it or hinder it, whether the new conditions it gives rise to are good conditions or bad conditions. It requires some courage to accept all that is involved. But that should not be wanting. Courage will be needed after the war, when we shall have many problems to face which must be solved and not slurred over. I accept the prospect of women having ample opportunities to earn their living with unfeigned delight.

If they do women will be much happier and more free. I do not like to see a bird in a cage, much less a woman. And thousands of women live in cages. Some of them are gilded; most of them are not.

After the war, as a nation, we shall not be rich enough to support a large body of unemployed women, as we have done in the past. In many households providing for unmarried daughters and other female dependants (who probably would be only too glad to earn their living, given the opportunity and the training) simply means a starved life. Children's education, reasonable amusement, good and necessary food and clothing have to take second place to the demand of the ever-insistent insurance premium.

Our views about marriage will get altered. They need altering. One thing which would alter them would be the greater economic freedom of women. I have no respect for the married life which the woman tolerates simply because if she left it she would starve.

Our lower middle class, heavily hit by the war, cruelly handicapped by the increased cost of living which will not go down when peace is declared, with the sudden fall which many hope for, will gain a veritable door of escape from financial hardship as it became a recognised thing for its women to have opportunities of earning money thrown open to them.

A Libel On Working Girls.

Life, in fact, will be eased generally. Already in the industrial classes it is the commonly accepted practice for girls to go out to earn their living. In future better openings will be at their disposal. The better education of the rising generation will fit them to take these openings, and the better money earned will give more to be contributed to the household expenses.

It is a libel on the girls of the industrial class to say that they waste their money on clothes and finery. As a whole they do not do so. There are fools among them, and in the long run they pay the penalty of their folly in various ways, as for instance, in impaired health. But that greater opportunities for the increasingly well-educated girls of the industrial class to earn better money will help to raise the standard of comfort in their homes seems to me indisputable.

For these reasons I welcome the increased opportunities now being given to women to earn their own living, and I am glad that I am able to think that these opportunities will not be withdrawn when the war is over.

If the new employment of women be permanent we shall all be the better for it, and let the men who are ousted from work which women can do be encouraged to seek the work which women cannot do. There will be plenty of that to be done in the days after the war.

EDWARD CECIL

Industrial Problems in Industry
The Contemporary Review
12/1915.
702/15

WOMEN'S INDUSTRY AFTER THE WAR.*

THE inquirer who seeks to envisage industrial conditions, as they may exist after the war, has few economic precedents on which to base conclusions. Economic prophecies made at the outbreak of hostilities have proved to be singularly incorrect. Last year, during the early autumn, we were in the throes of endeavour to mitigate an impending prolonged period of industrial dislocation and unemployment. This year unemployment in the insured trades has shrunk from 6·28 to 0·96 per cent., while 60,000 fewer persons are in receipt of poor relief than in the best month of our most prosperous year, 1913. The last issue of the Board of Trade Labour Gazette chronicles a serious shortage of labour in many industries, not only among men but among women. Half-a-dozen small workrooms under the Central Committee for Women's Employment are still open, but they are the refuge of elderly women of the most helpless and unskilled type. The number of children receiving free meals in London has shrunk from 74,201 in September, 1914, to 14,168 in September of this year—a reduction of 60,000. To the poorer sections of the population, in spite of the high cost of living, the war has brought a measure of prosperity which peace has failed to confer on them. Separation allowances for the wives and children of soldiers, who before enlistment were in fluctuating trades, have produced a certainty in the weekly budget, the results of which are visible in the improved appearance of hundreds of school children. When we remember the poignant, personal anxiety that must yet be suffered in so many homes, there is a tremendous indictment of pre-war conditions in the assertion made by a poor woman to a friendly visitor in one of our greyest and most hopeless districts: "If them "that runs this war can keep it up another couple o' year, I shall "be on my feet again."

Certain points for consideration seem to issue from these facts:—

1. Are the industrial transfers now in operation likely to be of long duration?
2. If the present conditions are of a temporary nature, can any

* Prepared for the Conference of the National Union of Women Workers, October, 1915.

702/16

measures be suggested which may prevent the inevitable dislocation at the end of the war?

3. Can we hope to improve on pre-war conditions in any steps taken in the work of industrial reconstruction?

It may be well at the outset to meet the inevitable criticism by stating at once that the rapidly changing conditions in industry and commerce have not yet attained a sufficiently static position to enable us to put forward suggestions of any permanent value. Although we have now realised the protracted nature of the struggle for national existence on which we are engaged, it is doubtful whether the lay mind can foretell in the slightest degree the extent to which our industrial and economic resources must be taxed before we can hope for a lasting and honourable peace. We know that nearly three million men have joined the forces of the Crown, but we do not know how many more may be required, nor can we gauge the toll of human life which may be involved. Recognising, therefore, the difficulties of all forecasts, it is probable that many of those present will sympathise with the point of view of friendly critics, who see a somewhat futile beating of the air in endeavours to poise the mind on what will happen "afterwards," an "afterwards" shut out from our gaze by an iron curtain, which has scarcely begun to lift.

There are, unfortunately, no complete official figures available proving the extent to which boys and girls below and above school age, and adult women, have been transferred to industries hitherto regarded as peculiarly the province of men. A Return issued in May by the Board of Education showed that 3,705 boys and 106 girls normally liable to attend school were excused attendance between February 1st and April 30th, 1915, for employment in agriculture. From September 1st, 1914, to January 31st, 1915, 1,388 boys and 49 girls received similar exemption. Among those set free in the second quarter were 49 boys between eleven and twelve years, 22 of whom belonged to Worcestershire, 12 to Somersetshire, 8 to Hertfordshire, and 4 to Gloucestershire. Two thousand one hundred and fifty-six were between twelve and thirteen years of age.*

The number of partial exemption scholars, or half-timers as they are usually termed, demonstrated a tendency to increase before the war, the number of those on whom grant was paid having been 71,718 in 1912-13 against 70,074 in 1911-12.† The demand for juveniles has increased so much that negotiations have recently

* School Attendance and Employment in Agriculture. Cd. 7,937. 1915. Pp. 4 and 5.

† Report of the Board of Education for 1912-13. Cd. 73,011. 1914. P. 82 (price 11d.).

702/17

taken place between the master cotton-spinners and trade union organisations with the view of asking the Home Office to permit children not exempt for full time labour at thirteen, to be employed all day at the mill. It is also suggested that operatives should be permitted to work overtime at seventeen instead of eighteen years. Meanwhile appeals are being made by hard-pressed traders for relaxations of educational regulations on the ground of patriotism. Industrial activity has produced a claim on the labour of little children, which if not carefully watched may prove to be an insidious danger for the future welfare of the nation. Consequently many local authorities, hitherto backward in framing regulations, have been forced by conditions to take action. In Manchester a recent inquiry revealed a total of 6,081 school children working for wages, of whom 2,128 were under twelve years of age. Of the total number 2,324 boys and girls were engaged for more than twenty hours weekly, 1,061 working for more than ten hours on Saturdays.* 1,851 children were shown to be occupied on Sundays, of whom 30 per cent. were under twelve years of age.† In other districts of industrial Lancashire, boys who are engaged in half-time employment in the mills work at other occupations in their free time. This is done in direct contravention of Section 3 (sub-section 3) of the Employment of Children Act. The war has also brought an increase in street trading. In London the utmost vigilance was required to combat the evil, and to deal drastically with the undesirable adults who were in many cases employing boys of tender years. It is therefore not surprising to find the Chief Constable of Liverpool in his Report for 1914 expressing regret at the increase in juvenile crime. Figures are given showing that 877 street trading licences were in force on December 31st, of which no fewer than 675 were granted to children of school age. In London our bye-laws have succeeded in driving off the streets boys under fourteen and girls under sixteen years.

The high wages now offered to boys and girls leaving school, more especially in work which may prove to be of a temporary character, only call for increasing care from local authorities. At the outbreak of the war and for three or four months afterwards, great difficulty was experienced in finding work for children who were exempt from school attendance. In London an experiment was made in the establishment of day classes in commercial subjects, needlework, and general education, maintenance grants from the National Relief Fund being obtained in some of the poorer districts. The classes were all in close touch with the Juvenile Advisory Committees of the Labour Exchanges, the

* Manchester Guardian, September 25th, 1915.
† The Herald, August 7th, 1915.

702/18

Secretaries of which notified all suitable vacancies at frequent intervals. The experience gained was of considerable value, and will be of use in the event of further activities in this direction being needed after the war. Briefly, the results obtained tend to show:—

1. The importance of providing a practical training in craft work as well as in subjects of general education.
2. That a maintenance grant is essential, otherwise the poorer boys and girls drift off in order to pick up odd jobs in the streets.
3. That there must be the closest co-operation between the National Fund which gives maintenance grants, the Labour Exchange which notifies vacancies for employment, and the Local Education Committee which provides the teaching and also organises the machinery by which the After Care Committees are in friendly touch with the homes of these young people.

In London too, recent developments of the work of Children's Care Committees will enable the Local Authority to build up and maintain a complete register of the school career of each boy and girl, their future occupation, the type of continued education recommended, and details of progress both at the evening institute and at work, at least up to the age of seventeen. Three agencies will be responsible for the welfare of the adolescent. The Care Committee will appoint the friendly volunteer to keep in personal touch with him, and to make this pleasant work effective hundreds of visitors will be needed. The Juvenile Advisory Committee will find employment in any case notified for "action." A free place at an evening institute will be given whenever there is immediate enrolment on leaving school, and the responsible teacher will be empowered to arrange for a personal visit to the employer when irregular attendance at the continuation school is said to be due to protracted hours of labour.

It will be seen that machinery in London which can enable the Local Authority to preserve contact with 70,000 children leaving the elementary schools, presents opportunities for the development of continued education which may have far-reaching results. The war has shown that the country has an insufficient supply of skilled labour. This is partly due in London to the unwillingness of employers to train young people, and to the ease with which they have been able to recruit skilled workers from the country. That this is a short-sighted policy has now been recognised in many industries, and there is an increasing willingness on the part of employers and trade unions to co-operate with the London Education Committee in securing facilities for time off during working hours for general education, for trade theory, and also for the more skilled operations of the industry. Joint Advisory Committees of employers and craftsmen have given practical help in the printing, furnishing, and silversmith trades. There is a general disposition on the part of gas companies and engineering firms to take advantage of educational facilities for their apprentices, and since the outbreak of war their example is being followed by a cable telegraph company, by firms of piano makers, and by an organisation representing all the more important hotels and restaurants, which is organising the training of British lads as waiters.

While the full-time Trade School which provides a thorough initial training in every branch of certain skilled industries, coupled with general education, is undoubtedly the best method of securing the maximum of intelligence, adaptability, and resource from the individual student, at the same time safeguarding moral and physical development during the most important years of growth, questions of accommodation and of expense may render their extension less rapid than the part-time course. But certain essentials in training can only be effectively dealt with in the full-time trade school, and the experience gained there may be of vital importance in dealing not only with problems of reconstruction after the war in relation to adolescents, but also in the transfer of women from work on war equipment to the arts of peace.

The sudden commercial upheaval following upon the declaration of war produced a contraction of employment amounting to 10¼ per cent. in the case of men and 8½ per cent. in the case of women.* Women were mainly affected by the decline in the dressmaking trade, by the abrupt stoppage of production in furniture, by the shortage of sugar in the confectionery trade, and by the limited output in the cotton industry, which had begun some months before August, 1914. By December a marked recovery was apparent; there was increasing difficulty in finding men to meet the demand for labour in many industries, and the number of women and girls on overtime had nearly doubled.† The action of the Government in regard to the purchase of sugar had prevented disaster in the confectionery trades. By February employment was normal in the cotton towns and Government contracts in tailoring and shirt-making had mitigated the difficulties of women in dressmaking and skilled industries. The simplification of the khaki tunic enabled the smaller contractors to undertake work. The increase in the number of women employed was especially noteworthy in the leather trades, which showed an expansion of 36·6 per cent., with 55·2 per cent. working overtime, and in engineering with an expansion of 12·3 per cent., with 39·2 engaged on overtime. In the boot trade 22 per cent., and in the clothing 17·3 per cent., were similarly employed.* By February, too, the enlistment figure among the employees of banks and insurance figures was between 20 and 25 per cent., and the returns showed an increasing tendency to secure the services of women to fill vacancies.† During the past six months this movement has advanced rapidly. But it must be remembered that the trend towards the employment of women in industries usually regarded as the province of men has been gaining in impetus in recent years. The Census returns of 1911 show, for instance, that 117,057 women were engaged in that year as commercial or business clerks, against 55,784 in 1901. In insurance work 4,626 women are recorded, compared with 1,375 in 1901. There were 2,159 law clerks in 1911 against 367 in 1901. Even in the tramway service 607 women were found, as compared with 72 in 1901, and on railways 2,636 against 1,441 at the previous census.‡

* Report of the Board of Trade on the State of Employment in the United Kingdom in October, 1914. Cd. 7,703, 1914. Pp. 5 and 6 (price 4½d.).

† Report of the Board of Trade on the State of Employment in the United Kingdom in February, 1915. Cd. 7,850. P. 4 (price 2½d.).

702/19

In banks, the increase in the number of women employed is very large. One agency alone has trained, tested, and passed on 973 women to positions of various kinds. Hitherto the work given has not been of a very responsible type, but the calculations to be made need quickness and accuracy. The experiment must be regarded as still in the initial stages, but there seems a likelihood of permanent work for women in the pass book and coupon departments. The salaries given do not compare unfavourably with those obtained by the more competent among women clerks.

The Board of Trade Labour Gazette for July, 1915, points out that there is in the boot trade a demand for women workers in departments hitherto exclusively in the hands of men. In London the opportunities available for women in the leather machining trade led to the establishment of short courses of eight weeks' duration at the Cordwainers' College. The women in training came from the more depressed branches of the stationery and printing trades, a good many being folders and sewers. All those who took the course secured good positions on its completion at wages which advanced rapidly. Certain firms have introduced their own training schemes, one firm having taught leather stitching to nearly a thousand women since the beginning of the war, paying them 2d. an hour while learning.§

A scheme for the training of women as assistants in the grocery and provision trade has been organised by the London County Council with marked success, and has again emphasised the value

* Report of the Board of Trade on the State of Employment in the United Kingdom in February, 1915. Cd. 7,850. P. 7.

† Ibid., p. 15.

‡ Census of England and Wales. Summary Tables. Cd. 7,929. 1915. P. 274 (price 3s. 5d.).

§ Draft Interim Report of the Conference to Investigate into Outlets for Labour after the War. British Association, Section F., Manchester. 1915. P. 59.

702/20

of the short full-time course for the training of adults. An intensive scheme, by which teaching is given by highly-qualified trade teachers under circumstances as nearly as possible approaching workshop conditions, offers a possible solution to the problem of the transfer of women to other openings after the war.

It has been generally admitted that women have shown much resource and adaptability and a high degree of capacity in accommodating themselves to the changed conditions of industry. The investigators who conducted inquiries for the Report to the British Association on outlets for labour after the war point out that in the metal trades, and especially in the manufacture of projectiles, women are doing "work demanding intelligence of a high degree "and involving intricate operations."* They are being employed in complicated processes on shells, on difficult forging work, and on the delicate manipulation needed in producing time fuses.

These women have been mainly drawn from such trades as jewellery, clock, and barometer making, silversmith's work, and even from dressmaking. The possession of craftsmanship involves as a rule adaptability. Similarly the great expansion of work in the clothing trade (coupled, it may be noted, with an increase of wages of 56 per cent. as compared with June, 1914),† has been met by the influx of women from kindred industries such as baby linen making, juvenile clothing, wholesale and retail dressmaking, bespoke tailoring, underclothing, and the millinery trades. Government demands are so great that factories engaged on private work cannot obtain hands. One of the largest and best wholesale garment-making firms, employing 900 hands, has vacancies at this moment for 200 girls and women. In the boot trade the requirements of the retail firms cannot be dealt with at all. In fact the difficulty of meeting the normal needs of the population appear to be increasing daily, and may, therefore, lead to a period of industrial expansion after the war, drawing back large numbers of women to their usual trades, provided always that we have not reached a time of great financial stringency.

The question of transfer will be a matter of graver difficulty in the case of women employed on railways, on bookstalls, and in driving and distributing goods. Their work involves no hand training, there is more freedom than in the workshop, and the out of door life is likely to render them unwilling to take up the monotony of domestic service in towns. Possibly for these women emigration may prove an attractive solution.

In the commercial world the increase of women workers may probably be permanent. After the Boer War many men preferred emigration or other more interesting occupations to a return to the desk and the ledger. Unfortunately, in this far deadlier struggle there will be many who, alas! can never return, and women, in a greater degree than ever before in the history of the world, must therefore seek economic independence. The lighter positions in warehouses, counting houses—general commercial effort—are peculiarly suitable for them.

* Draft Interim Report of the Conference to Investigate into Outlets for Labour after the War. British Association, Section F., Manchester. 1915. P. 12

† Board of Trade Labour Gazette, July, 1915.

702/8

On the other hand, it may be hoped that the end of hostilities may see considerable developments in our commercial and industrial activities, more especially in trade with our over-sea dominions and with our Allies. A series of more than one hundred pamphlets was published some months ago by the Board of Trade, showing the opportunities existing for new markets for our wares, and the need for greater care and initiative in making known our resources, in pushing our manufactures, and especially in supplying the actual requirements of the market. Extracts are quoted from Reports of His Majesty's Trade Commissioners, and from consular officials, which are a surprising revelation to those who, like myself, were believers in the capacity of the British man of business. Instances are given telling how we have lost ground in Australia in the supply of agricultural machinery because, unlike the Canadian and American manufacturers, our firms are not represented by competent salesmen and travellers. American and Canadian firms, says His Majesty's Commissioner, think it worth while to have huge establishments for the sale of their manufactures in the agricultural line, officered by an experienced and thoroughly capable staff, and to employ each of them, it is understood, over one hundred experts who demonstrate their manufactures in Australia.* Without damaging the markets of our friends there appear to be, according to these pamphlets, innumerable directions in which the products of our skilled workmen should reach the ends of the earth. But better methods of business need to be adopted, more especially in the systematic use of foreign languages, in the setting up of price lists in foreign translations, and above all in foreign currency (it is astonishing and almost incredible to be told that firms quote for orders in English money). In the extension of English houses abroad, and the employment of technical experts to sell articles of British manufacture there seem to be possible openings for young men more attractive than the casting up of rows of figures or the typing of documents.

The appointment of waitresses in clubs and restaurants has denuded still more the ranks of domestic service. While it is probable that a simpler style of living may be the result of the drain on the national wealth, it seems unlikely that the supply of trained domestics will meet the demand, unless the conditions of work are made more attractive, and domestic service is regarded as a highly skilled industry on a par with dressmaking and the other skilled needle trades. Better teaching in the domestic trade school, the keeping of fewer maids, and those better paid and better equipped, combined with less onerous service, may prove one method of dealing with the problem.

* Competition with Germany and Austria-Hungary in Neutral Markets. No. 80, p. 11. Commercial Intelligence Branch, Board of Trade, 73, Basinghall Street, E.C. October, 1914.

702/22

Finally, to secure better conditions of labour after the war, we ought to strive for:—

1. The elimination of the child under fourteen from the labour market, the gradual raising of the school age with regulation of the hours of work and education in the hands of the local education authorities up to eighteen years.
2. A better training of adolescents in the full-time and part-time trade school, with a wider scheme of scholarships and maintenance grants.
3. The development of language teaching and the further training of commercial experts.
4. An increase in the number of trades to which the minimum wage will apply.
5. A further limitation of the hours of work for women in shops and factories. A measure of factory legislation is long overdue.

N. ADLER.

The Nineteenth Century 12/1915

702/23

WOMEN AND THE RECONSTRUCTION OF INDUSTRY

SINCE the outbreak of war many changes have taken place in our industrial and commercial life. Some are of a passing character, others have the appearance of permanency. As to what will happen when peace is restored no one can say, but it is generally accepted that a considerable period must elapse before the economic conditions of the country can reasonably be expected to revert to pre-war times. Meanwhile it is interesting to watch the changes that are being made in various directions to meet the altered situation. In this article I propose to examine one of these changes—namely, the extended employment of female labour. The new order of things in this respect offers a wide field for investigation and suggests many possibilities to the student of political economy; more especially is this the case in connexion with the problems that arise out of the displacement of men by women.

During the early months of the War there was much depression in those trades which mostly depend on female labour, due mainly to the sudden falling off in the supply of raw material, the closing down of Continental markets, and the placing of large contracts in America. Then again, people began to spend less money and to do without things hitherto regarded as indispensable. The natural sequence of these adverse circumstances was to throw out of employment a considerable number of women workers, and the larger the industry the greater the dislocation. In the cotton and linen trades alone thousands of female operatives found themselves unemployed. At this crisis the Queen's 'Work for Women' Fund came into being, and there is no doubt that the large sum raised by Her Majesty and the practical way in which the Fund was administered did much towards warding off distress among women workers in many parts of the country. It was not long, however, before matters began to improve. Not that peace trades revived—that could not, and cannot be, until the War is over—but the increasing demands of the Navy and the Army as regards material and equipment, combined with the appearance in the home market of the Government as buyers on a considerable scale, caused old industries to be resuscitated and new industries to be started. Particularly was this the case with undertakings where female labour had been and could be largely employed. Then came the Ministry of Munitions, resulting in the taking over by the Government of ordnance factories and workshops, and the placing of a considerable number of private engineering works under State control. All this gave a further impetus to the employment of unskilled labour, especially that of women. Two difficulties, however, remained to be overcome, the shortage of skilled men and the lack of technical knowledge among women. Indeed it is not too much to say that the indiscriminate enlistment of so many skilled men, and the impossibility of obtaining skilled women to take their place, seriously interfered for a time with the progress of munition work.

702/24

With the object of securing the services of women, skilled and unskilled, the Board of Trade instituted a War Service Register for Women, but although up to the 15th of October 116,998 names had been recorded, only 50 per cent. were effective entries; and of these, owing in no small measure to the difficulty of finding overseers possessing the necessary skill and training, only one tenth were given employment. At the same time it should be mentioned that during this period employment in connexion with war work had been found for 183,000 women from the ordinary register. Meanwhile numbers of artisans have been brought back from the Front, and for some months past a commission has been going up and down the country for the express purpose of inducing skilled men stationed at the various camps to return to their old jobs or take up new posts. Much of the work formerly done by men has been subdivided and new processes, better suited for women, have been introduced, Home Office restrictions have been relaxed and Trade Union regulations suspended. Moreover, a number of centres have been opened under the auspices of the London County Council where women may obtain a knowledge of munition work. The course extends to six weeks,[1] at the end of which period the pupils are regarded as partially skilled and can earn enough money to maintain themselves, although it would be a mistake to describe them as skilled or even as semi-skilled workers. The remainder of their training is taken in the factory or the workshop, where the progress of the individual depends on capacity and opportunity. Mention should also be made of the introduction of what may be termed the 'dilution of skilled labour,' which means that a percentage of skilled workers, instead of devoting the whole of their energies to their own special tasks, spend a portion of their time in supervising and training the new hands. The result of all these efforts has been not only to enable many more women to be employed, but materially to increase the output. Indeed, so rapidly are women being absorbed in war industries that a general feeling prevails in well-informed circles that before many months are over every woman who wants industrial work, and can do it, will be able to find employment more particularly in connexion with one branch or other of munition work. The same may be said with regard to non-industrial occupations.

[1] 144 hours.

702/25

Some people argue that, as far as industrial work is concerned, no very great displacement of men by women has occurred. All that has happened, they say, is the transference of women from one occupation to another and a more considerable employment of female labour in special industries, such as the engineering and metal, leather, tailoring, and boot and shoe trades and their kindred occupations. Admittedly, it is difficult to form any accurate estimate in the matter, and this difficulty is increased by the absence of official figures. Invited to make a statement on the matter, the President of the Board of Trade replied: 'It is not possible to say to what extent the increase in the number of women employed has been due to women taking the place of men, as at the same time there has been an extension in the number employed in certain women's occupations.'[2] On the other hand, we learn from the same authority that since the War began the number of women employed in industrial occupations has increased by nearly 150,000, or roughly 6 per cent., while 'the substitution of women for men in clerical and commercial occupations is known to be considerable,' a statement endorsed by the fact that, during the thirteen months ended October 15, the Labour Exchanges alone had placed 342,242 women in employment.

Table Showing Number of Women over 17 Years of Age placed from the Ordinary Register in the Undermentioned Occupations during the Thirteen Months ended October 15, 1915.

Trade or Occupational Group	Number Placed
Insured Occupations.
Engineering	19,193
Cabinet-making, etc.	157
Making of Vehicles	566
Uninsured Occupations.
Manufacture of metals, metal goods	7,402
Textiles:
Cotton	14,001
Wool and worsted	3,544
Silk, flax, linen, etc.	11,176
Dress:
Boot and shoe workers	1,045
Tailoresses	7,428
Dressmakers and milliners	6,876
Others	14,268

[2] Parliamentary Debates, Official Report, October 14, 1915.

702/26

Trade or Occupational Group	Number Placed
Conveyance of men, goods, etc.	4,429
Agriculture	11,762
Paper, prints, etc.	5,833
Wood, furniture, etc.	2,219
Chemicals, explosives, oil, grease, etc.	9,240
Brick, cement, pottery, etc.	1,573
Food, tobacco, drink, and lodging:
Bread, biscuit, etc., makers	2,517
Waitresses	8,495
Tobacco manufacture	869
Others (jam, cocoa, mineral, etc., manufacture)	13,719
Skins, leather, hair, etc.	4,879
Precious metals, jewels, etc.	2,587
Commercial and clerical occupations	14,065
Domestic service:
Laundry and washing service	19,074
Others: Indoor (in hotels, etc.)	31,094
,, (in private houses)	15,128
Outdoor (charwomen, day servants, etc.)	86,652
Shop assistants	5,959
Government and professional	5,799
All others	10,688
Total	342,242

Whatever view may be taken of the matter as regards industrial occupations, there can be no doubt that a steady and increasing displacement of men by women has taken place in non-industrial occupations. Exactly how far the movement will go no one can say; a good deal depends on the length of the War and the number of men required for the New Armies; but that it is destined to extend very far beyond its present dimensions there can be no doubt whatever. From the very beginning of the War, men engaged in clerical and commercial occupations have enlisted in large numbers, and since Lord Derby's scheme came into being thousands of additional recruits have been drawn from these sources. In some cases older men or men unfit for service have taken their places, but the majority of the vacant positions have been filled by women. In the Government Departments a large proportion of what are known as minor posts, hitherto occupied by men, have long since passed into the hands of women, and the view is entertained in certain quarters of female activity that women may yet enter the higher positions of the Civil Service. As far as clerical work goes, the War Office, the Admiralty, the India Office, and the Board of Agriculture are all utilising the assistance of women, while in the Post Office women have replaced men as sorters, telegraphists, telephonists, collectors, and postmen. Practically the whole of the clerical work in the new Department of Munitions is done by women, subject to the supervision and instruction by male officials of long standing. Similar changes have taken place in the offices under the control of local authorities.

702/27

In banks and insurance offices women clerks were employed, to a limited extent, before the War. Now, however, the employment of women in both these branches of business is general throughout the country. In most cases women employed for the period of the War have replaced men who have joined one or other of the fighting forces; in others, as in banks doing business with military men, where fresh departments have been opened necessitating large additions to the original staffs, women have been taken on to meet the demands of new business. The ages of the new female clerks vary between 20 and 30; some, however, are older, others younger: much depends on the nature of the post to be filled. I am often asked how the selection is made, a difficult question to answer as requirements differ according to district and employment. I can, however, say that every care is taken to observe traditions, and while merit plays the more important part, the suitability of applicants is very carefully considered.

So far the supply has easily met the demand, every vacancy bringing with it a fairly long list of inquiries, some from women of University education, others from women possessing a commercial training, while not a few women have entered the competition and been successful without any business experience at all. In many instances preference has been given to relatives of the existing staff or to daughters of retired servants; other sources of supply are the Civil Service Commission, the Labour Exchanges, and the Trade and Technical Schools. In view, however, of the further inroads now being made in the ranks of young men engaged in Government departments, municipal offices and business houses, for recruiting purposes, a very large number of additional vacancies may soon be expected.

In order to be prepared to meet any possible shortage in the supply of substitutes when the time arrives to fill these vacancies the Home Secretary, on October 16, appointed a Committee to consider the conditions of clerical and commercial employment with a view to advising the Government as to what steps should be taken 'by the employment of women or otherwise,' to replace men withdrawn from these occupations for service in the military forces. That Committee, over which Mr. Cecil Harmsworth presided, has now reported, and few persons, if any, will be inclined to oppose their ruling, that if the business community and indeed the country itself are to avoid a situation of considerable gravity in the near future, no time must be lost

702/28

'in mobilising the reserves of possible clerical labour and especially of woman labour.'

The Committee give 300,000 as the number of men of military age engaged in clerical work in England and Wales, but nothing is said about Ireland or Scotland, and the omission seems to call for some explanation in view of the wider ground covered by the terms of reference. Nor is it clear whether this figure represents the number of men of military age engaged in these occupations at the beginning of the War or whether the reference is to the position at the date the report was signed and circulated.[3] Taking the more limited field, England and Wales, as their guide, and leaving unexplained the question of date, the Committee infer, and no doubt correctly, that 'one half and possibly more of the total number' will be available for military service. But if the uncertainty with regard to the premises makes it difficult for the public to form any accurate estimate as to the number of substitutes that will be required, there is no doubt the Committee are right in their conclusion that the number will be very large.

From the facts cited in the previous pages it will be seen that the number of men above the military age, and women trained in clerical work, unemployed at the beginning of the war, must now be very greatly reduced. Side by side with this reduction is the knowledge that many lads doing men's work in connexion with clerical occupations will by lapse of time soon become eligible for the Army. Two classes, and two classes alone, therefore, remain from which vacancies can be filled—sailors and soldiers previously employed in clerical work invalided out of the services, and women without clerical experience and not at present employed. With regard to the first of these classes the Committee offers what seems to me a very pertinent suggestion, namely that all invalided men should be returned as quickly as possible to civil employment. Pending, however, a decision on this matter they are of opinion that 'the bulk of the substitutes must be drawn from the ranks of women not at present employed.' And with this finding all who have studied the question will be in accord.

In these circumstances considerable interest attaches to the suggestions made in the Report for organising and training rapidly a supply of women clerks sufficient to meet the emergency. After stating that substitutes will be needed for many different types of work some of which will be of a routine or mechanical character, the Committee proceed to say that 'women of intelligence and education will be required to fill openings of a kind involving a considerable degree of responsibility.' Accordingly, they recommend that every effort should be made to attract this class of woman and make a special appeal to women who have passed through the Secondary Schools and Universities, and women who have had other educational advantages, to take this opportunity of rendering national service. Mention is also wisely made of the possibilities thus afforded to wives and relatives of men serving in the New Armies whose pay and allowances are inadequate to meet their domestic responsibilities.

[3] November 9.

702/29

Obviously, no very elaborate commercial training could be attempted in the time available, but the Committee believe, and their belief is founded on a conference with business men of considerable experience, that 'a short whole-time training, lasting from one to two months, will go some way towards familiarising women with business routine and business requirements.' To bring about this result the Home Secretary has addressed a letter to the Lord Mayors and Mayors of County Boroughs in England and Wales and to the Chairman of County Councils, in which the following passage occurs :

> The Committee recommend that arrangements for organising the supply and training of substitutes should be made locally in each commercial centre, and that for this purpose a body should be formed in each district which would be representative of the local education authority and of the commerce of the district. Such a body might take the form either of a sub-committee of the education committee reinforced by representatives of business firms, and other interests involved, or a special committee appointed ad hoc or any other form which may seem best adapted to local arrangements. It will be desirable that the local body should include women members.

Consultation and co-operation are essential for the success of the scheme and the local committees are reminded of the necessity of linking up with the Labour Exchanges. Nor has the matter of private enterprise been forgotten, and the Home Secretary points out in his letter that 'it will probably be desirable to take into account the work being done by local private agencies for giving commercial training and to encourage them to work in co-ordination with the local committees or at any rate on similar lines.' Indeed, co-ordination in this respect is very necessary if friction is to be avoided. For instance should the local committees fix too low a fee for the tuition (and fees, of course, will be paid, for the scheme is to be self-supporting), the private agencies would obviously be placed at a disadvantage unless able to make up the difference by extending the period of training or giving more individual attention. Again, I understand that some local committees, which have already started work, are sending their agents round to obtain orders from employers and that already an association of assurance companies has placed a large order with one committee on the understanding that the women trained to fill their vacancies should receive instruction from a special syllabus. While agreeing that it is only fair for the pupils to know beforehand that if they prove themselves efficient they will find posts awaiting them, I suggest that a better plan would be for the employers to go to the committees and not the committees to the employers. I fear the present system is likely to lead to difficulty, it is sure to lead to competition, and in a case of this kind anything like competition should be carefully avoided. I have not space to deal with the kind of training suggested by the Committee for general clerical work, but I may perhaps say that the period is not supposed to extend beyond a month. As to the Committee's observations with regard to the training necessary for shorthand-typists I shall have something to say later on.

702/30

In the distributing trades, wholesale and retail, the displacement of men by women is very marked. In many shops the salesman has disappeared altogether, even the shopwalker has gone, but so far women have not been employed to any great extent in the heavy trades, nor have they yet, as far as I have been able to ascertain, been given positions of responsibility over men. The female lift-attendant is everywhere, women commissionaires are now employed at several of the principal shops and stores, and much of the cleaning formerly done by outside porters is now performed by women. At the bookstalls boys have given place to girls, and girls are replacing boys as messengers and pages. In clubs and hotels the domestic staff is mainly supplied by women, no man of military age and fit for service, other than subjects of neutral States, being employed. Women are making their appearance as conductors on trams and motor omnibuses. They are also driving motor lorries and delivery vans, and although, at any rate in the Metropolis, they have not yet been placed in control of taxi-cabs, in many cases they have taken the place of chauffeurs as drivers of private cars. Some local authorities have even gone so far as to accept the services of women as street sweepers. On the railways, female ticket collectors and examiners are the rule rather than the exception. At country stations women are doing porters' work, and at main stations girls are acting in various ways as platform attendants.

Last summer farmers readily took advantage of the offers made by women and girls to assist in gathering in the harvest, and before next spring, if rumour tells truly, we may expect to see female labour very generally employed in agricultural work of all descriptions. The other day I came across an inquiry for a 'farmeress,' while the Minister of Agriculture recently observed that 'he had seen women ploughing in the West of England.'

702/31

In dairy work, more particularly in milking and cheese-making, there are excellent openings for women. 'A capable girl,' said a Midland dairy instructress at the recent London Dairy Show, 'living in can earn from 30*l.* to 50*l.* a year, living out 60*l.* to 120*l.*, with allowances in the way of milk, butter, coal, and light.' Provision has been made in one of the English counties for training women in milking and dairy work, and it is expected that this movement will extend throughout the country, so that it may soon be possible to release some of the young men now employed on dairy farms, and to replace them by trained women. An instance of what women can do was quoted the other day by a Somerset dairy-farmer. 'Two girls, well educated, and of good family, qualified for farm work. They are now living in a cottage in Shropshire and working for a neighbouring farmer. They are a great success, and are earning from 15*s.* to 1*l.* each per week.' A society has been started for the purpose of promoting the employment of women in agriculture, and a number of landowners and farmers have very generously come forward and undertaken to have women trained in practical work on the land. The head of this movement is Mr. Henry Chaplin, M.P., and it need hardly be said that no more happy choice could have been made.

The shortage of doctors and the falling-off in the numbers of male students at the various hospitals have provided new openings for women in connexion with medicine. In the last six years the annual entry of students at the London (Royal Free Hospital) School of Medicine for Women has ranged from thirty-five to sixty. This session 110 new students have entered the school. Apart, however, from general practice there are certain well-defined directions, we are reminded by the Lancet, where women can meet with congenial occupations, assured income and opportunities for the recognition of their scientific work, such as the superintendence of children's clinics, the inspection of child-life, the treatment of diseases of children and women, and practice overseas, more especially in India. With the further advance of Lord Derby's recruiting scheme, a fresh sphere of employment presents itself for women in connexion with hospital work. Hitherto the duties of clerks, storekeepers, dispensers, and cooks at military hospitals have been carried out by men. In future these duties will be performed by women in all cases where the man is of military age and fit for service. Applicants for these posts do not require to possess first-aid or nursing certificates, but they must be members of the Voluntary Aid Detachment of the Red Cross Society. Dispensers have to be fully qualified, and cooks possess the necessary experience. Clerks are not required to have a knowledge either of shorthand or typewriting, but must be prepared to make themselves generally useful in the routine work of the hospital. There are no age limitations. Except in the case of cooks, who will receive three meals a day, the new women helpers will be required to feed themselves, and a scheme of hostels is under consideration where board and lodging may be obtained at a reasonable charge. The women, as was the case with the men, will be under the control of the War Office.

702/32

For some time past women attending the institutes under the control of the London County Council have been taught to mend their own children's boots and shoes and do small jobs about the house, such as the reparation of blinds, doors, water and gas fittings, and electric bells. Since the War started the number of women attending these classes has, I understand, greatly increased, with the result that, in many homes in the poorer districts of London, repairs that often depended upon the skill and time of the wage-earner are now readily and easily carried out by wives or daughters, as the case may be. Young women have also been trained at the Trade and Technical Schools to fill various callings in connexion with commercial and business life, and lately, to meet the new demands for female helpers, additional schools have been opened. Again, the services of women who have retired from the teaching profession are being requisitioned to meet the expected shortage of male teachers as the result of enlistment.

But not only has the War provided an incentive to women's work on a scale never dreamt of in times of peace, it has caused women, more particularly those engaged in new occupations, to realise, as they have never done before, their own capacity. Whether, in some callings they have entered, women are not doing a little too much and working excessive hours is a phase of the movement that requires watching. This matter has not escaped the notice of Parliament, and has engaged the attention of those members who devote themselves specially to problems connected with the social welfare of the working classes. Not many weeks ago, the Minister of Munitions was invited to appoint a Committee of Women possessing industrial as well as medical knowledge to advise and assist his department. The inquiry was based on the ground that women employed in munition works, if they were to maintain their health and efficiency, required to be protected against the dangers and complications arising from exhaustion, overstrain, and unhealthy conditions. The Minister, however, was able to satisfy the House of Commons that the points raised had already received his attention, for he had appointed a Committee on Industrial Fatigue on which were sitting two women possessing special experience in matters of this kind. This Committee had made proposals to him with respect to fatigue arising from continuous work and Sunday labour, and these proposals were under consideration. One would like to suggest that the scope of the Committee's labours be extended so as to include other occupations in which women are employed in connexion with work for the War. Neither the causes of public health, public utility, or public economy, can be assisted by allowing women to work too hard.

702/33

To return, however, to the question of capacity. Before the War women were employed in the engineering trades, but their work was almost entirely confined to manual operations and the manipulation of automatic tools requiring little skill and no physical strength: in other words, to what is called repetition work. Recent events, however, have widened their opportunities in this respect, and, as the editor of the Engineer[4] observes in the course of an interesting article on the subject, 'some of the most delicate operations, necessitating the exercise of great skill and high intelligence,' are now undertaken by women. In support of this contention he cites the case of a screwing operation, in which it was customary to rough the thread out with the tool and then to finish it off with taps. 'Some trouble having arisen owing to the wearing of the taps, the women of their own initiative did away with the second operation and are now accurately chasing the threads to gauge with the tool alone.' Women are also carrying out the arduous process of forging, and, 'with the possible exception of the heaviest tools—and their inability to work even these has yet to be established—have shown themselves quite capable of performing operations hitherto exclusively carried out by men.' Dealing with the same question, the engineering correspondent of the Daily Telegraph[5] expresses a similar opinion. After pointing out that employers before the War were ready enough to utilise the labour of women in fuse-making and light electrical work, but declined to entrust them with heavy machine tools, he goes on to say that the experiment has been tried in the Midlands and on the Clyde, and that in each case the results have exceeded expectations. 'The women do their work with an exactitude, thoroughness, and conscientiousness that could not be excelled, and in one factory, where the workers consist entirely of women, the output from the machines has far surpassed that for which they were designed.'

And this brings me to the question of wages, always a thorny subject and one not easy to deal with without going into details. This one can hardly do in an article of this kind. I must therefore confine my observations to broad principles, and chief amongst these is that of 'equal pay for equal work.' From the testimony quoted and the evidence given it is clear that women employed in the engineering trades can and do perform operations that before the War were undertaken exclusively by men.

[4] August 20. [5] September 27.

702/34

This fact, however, does not, of necessity, imply that the woman gives the same output as the man or that her work is done in the same time. To prove equal work not only must the woman be engaged upon the same operation as the man, she must also give the same output and in the same time. Where this combination is shown to exist, it follows conclusively that the work of the woman is equal to that of the man, and to equal work the natural and necessary corollary is equal pay. Where, however, the woman's work fails in either of these particulars, any claim for man's pay cannot, in my opinion, succeed. It is also clear from the same testimony and the same evidence that a factory staffed since the War solely by women can and does turn out the same amount of material as was the case before the War when the same factory was staffed solely by men. But no mention is made of time or the number of women employed. Yet these are matters which primarily affect the wages bill. If the output be the same and the wages bill not increased in spite of extra time or the extra hands employed, undoubtedly the same amount of money that was expended in wages in the case of the men should also be expended in the case of the women. Any other course would mean that the employer was taking unfair advantage of the change in personnel to cheapen production.[6]

It was doubtless to prevent anything of this kind occurring, as well as to maintain the rates of pay for skilled work in the engineering trades, that caused the men, when agreeing to the introduction of women for the period of the War, to insist upon recognition by employers of the principle involved in 'equal pay for equal work.' 'To this principle' Miss Mary Macarthur,[7] whose knowledge and experience in regard to all matters connected with the employment of women need no demonstration from me, tells us 'lip service, at any rate, was given on all sides, and it was affirmed in the Crayford Agreement in November 1914, in the Shell and Fuses Agreement in March 1915, and in a modified form in the famous Treasury agreement.' And she adds, 'the principle was supposed to find legal expression and legislative sanction in the Munition Act, but here its only safeguard is found in the somewhat vaguely-expressed phrase, Section 2-5, that the "admission of semi-skilled or female labour shall not affect adversely the rates customarily paid for the job."'[8]

Addressing a deputation of women on the subject last April, the President of the Board of Trade indicated that the Government intended to follow the practice usual in private industry. 'In the replacing of men by women,' he said, 'we have provided that under Government contract the same piece rates are to be paid for women as for men, but in regard to time rates no special conditions have been laid down.' Since that date, however, the Munitions Labour Supply Committee have had the whole matter under their consideration, and a few weeks ago they made certain recommendations to the Government. These recommendations the Government accepted, and decided not only to adopt them in the munition factories for which they were directly responsible, but to commend them to other employers engaged in similar work.

[6] This argument is used without prejudice to wages having risen since the War.

[7] Woman member of the Munitions Supply Committee.

[8] Daily News and Leader, October 26.

Under the new regulations women employed in munition factories and workshops under Government control, if they have reached the age of eighteen years, and are employed on time and on work customarily done by men, will receive 1*l.* a week, 'reckoned on the usual working hours of the district in question for men in engineering establishments.' In the case of women doing work ordinarily performed by fully skilled tradesmen, the women will be paid the time rates of the men whose work they undertake. Overtime and night-shift and Sunday and holiday allowances payable to men are also to be paid to women. If prevented from working owing to breakdown, air-raid, or other cause beyond their control, the women are to be paid for the time lost.

Other changes have reference to piecework and premium-bonus systems. In neither case are women to work these systems until they are sufficiently qualified, but in the matter of shells the period of qualification should not, as a rule, exceed three to four weeks. Women employed on piecework will be paid the same piecework prices as are paid to men. This has always been the case, and can hardly therefore be regarded as a new regulation. Where women are engaged on premium-bonus systems, the time allowed for a job is to be that usually allowed to men for the same job, and the earnings of the women are to be based on the man's time rate. But where the job in question has not hitherto been done 'on piecework or premium-bonus system in the establishment, the piecework price or the time allowed is to be based on a similar job previously done by men, on piecework or premium-bonus system as the case may be. Again, in cases where there are no data from previous operations to enable the parties to arrive at a piecework price or time to be allowed, the price or the time to be allowed is to be so adjusted 'that the women shall receive the same percentage over the time rate of the class of man customarily employed on the job, as such man would have received had he undertaken the job on piecework or premium-bonus system as the case may be.'

Piecework prices and premium-bonus basis times are to be fixed by mutual agreement between the employer and the woman or women who perform the work, but this provision relates to individual adjustments, and must not be held to prejudice the principle of collective bargaining. On piecework every woman's time rate will be guaranteed irrespectively of her piecework earnings. On premium-bonus systems a woman's time rate will in all cases be paid. Overtime and night-shift and Sunday and holiday allowances are to be paid to women employed on piecework or premium-bonus system 'on the same conditions as now prevail in the case of men in the district in question for timework.' Piecework prices and premium-bonus time allowances, after they have been established, must not be altered unless the means or method of manufacture are changed. It only remains to be said that the principle upon which the recommendations proceed is that on systems of payment by results, 'equal payment shall be made to women as to men for an equal amount of work done.'

702/35

These changes mark a distinct advance on the Government programme as laid down by the President of the Board of Trade last April. As Miss Macarthur says, they are 'an attempt to apply in practice the theory of equal wage for equal work.' It must, however, be remembered that these recommendations are only mandatory in those munition factories for which the Government are directly responsible. Similarly with regard to the 1*l.* a week. Unfortunately an erroneous impression got abroad that the Government had fixed a general minimum wage for all women engaged in the production of munitions. The report was the more unfortunate as it gave rise to expectations which the Government had no intention to realise; at least that is the only conclusion to draw from the official contradiction made by Mr. Lloyd George in the House of Commons.[9] Where, however, the recommendations are adopted, a time wage of 1*l.* for a normal working week will be guaranteed to all women, of eighteen years of age and over, learning to do any part of a job previously done by men, or employed on piecework or premium-bonus system, in cases where their earnings fail to reach the standard amount.

In railway employment efforts have also been made in the direction of equal pay for equal work, and last August an understanding was come to between the railway companies of Great Britain and the National Union railwaymen by which the companies agreed that 'the pay of women employed in grades in which they were not employed prior to August 1914, shall, for the duration of the War, be the minimum pay of the grade.' Not long afterwards a number of women employed in cleaning railway carriages declined to work the same number of hours as the men they were replacing in order to qualify for the same rate of pay. I do not pretend to any knowledge with regard to the merits of the case, but I have no hesitation in saying that it would be better for these women to work fewer hours for less money than be placed in a position which apparently carries with it the condition, at any rate on the part of the employer, that to secure the same rate of wages the women must work the same number of hours as the men. A far better working arrangement is that suggested by the London County Council regarding the employment of women conductors on the Council's tramcars. If their suggestion be adopted, the same principle will be in force as in the arrangement with the railways, but instead of the women being compelled to work the men's hours to get the men's pay, they will be paid proportionately for the time worked, at a rate equivalent to the present minimum daily rate of pay of male conductors with the usual increments according to length of service. They will also receive the War bonus of 3*s*. a week.

[9] October 28.

702/36.

In business houses and in clerical work generally, it has been the custom to pay women less than men. Nor does a woman entering non-industrial occupations expect to get the same wages as a man. Everything depends on the kind of work the employer requires and the nature of the services the woman renders. Moreover it should always be remembered that in dealing with rates of wages, especially in clerical work, matters such as training and continuity of service have to be taken into consideration. For instance, while an employer may reasonably count upon retaining a man's services as long as his health lasts and the chances of promotion are good, with a woman the position is different: the employer has always to face the fact that sooner or later marriage may end her business career.

The question of wages in clerical occupations has not been lost sight of by the Home Office Committee, and, as was the case with the Munition Labour Supply Committee, the Report makes it clear that the employment of women 'brought in to act as substitutes during the present emergency under the scheme suggested is intended to be temporary, for the period of the War only.' An obvious difficulty, however, attaches to the possibility of an over-supply of women substitutes, and, with this end in view, the Home Secretary has impressed upon the local committees the importance of avoiding any risk 'of depressing wages below a fair rate by bringing into the market a greater number of workers than is needed.' So far, so good, but I would point out that while the local committees can, and no doubt will, exercise a useful discretion as regards supply, they will find it difficult to place the same restrictions on the activities of private agencies.

The Committee also follow the line taken by the Ministry of 702/37

Munitions as to the principle of 'equal pay for equal work,' and suggest 'that in the present emergency the scale of wages payable to women should, as far as circumstances permit, and as the work deputed to them reasonably justifies, be based on the rate of wages paid to the men who have been engaged in similar duties.' But while the Ministry of Munitions can command, the local committees, set up for the purpose of working the Home Office scheme, have no control over employers. In these circumstances the suggestion made in the Report, while it may serve its purpose as a concession to Trade Union intervention, can in reality make no possible difference with regard to the terms of employment. As a matter of fact, things in this respect should right themselves. The female clerks trained by local committees will be required mainly to replace junior male clerks, and their wages may be expected to range, on entry, from 20*s*. to 30*s*. a week, with the usual increments as time passes on. In other words, they will receive the same emoluments as male clerks on probation, and, like them, proceed gradually on the upward scale. Where women replace men of more experience it may be assumed that their wages will approximate in similar proportion to the wages of the men displaced. In any event care must be taken to see that the payments to women do not interfere with the scale of payments allowed by employers to men who have enlisted. I do not say women of high attainments will not be required in clerical occupations, but I join issue with the Committee on the statement that women are likely to be wanted in any numbers to fill openings 'involving a considerable degree of responsibility.'

With regard to the distributing trades, from time to time movements have been promulgated for the purpose of raising the wages of women but, so far as I have been able to ascertain, the women who have replaced men in these callings are receiving satisfactory pay, and there has been no concerted effort to compel employers to give them men's rates, although I believe in some cases this is done.

Complaints, however, have been made that the wages paid to some of the temporary women clerks employed in the Government departments do not compare favourably with the rates paid for similar work outside. Nor is the case met by the fact that the Government are not only paying the women they engage but are also paying the salaries of the men for the time displaced. Many business houses, banks, and insurance offices are doing the same thing. In connexion with the pay of young women in the Government service I recall an incident which occurred when the late Mr. Fawcett was Postmaster-General some thirty-three years ago. At that time the employment of girls in the postal service was in its initial stage. One morning Mr. Fawcett, who always took a kindly interest in the welfare of Post Office employees, inquired of Miss Smith, one of the few women then on the permanent staff, how the work suited the health of the girls under her charge. Her reply revealed much; it was to the effect that the health of the girls would become much better if their salaries allowed of their dining more frequently.

702/38

My own experience in the matter of women's work has only been on the clerical side, but I have no hesitation in saying that taken as a whole, whether for accuracy, patience, or assiduity, women are to be preferred to men. As a rule I have found managers of banks and insurance offices to whom I have talked on the matter well satisfied with the women clerks in their employ, and this notwithstanding that the work in many cases has to be further subdivided, and that it often requires the services of three women to perform the work formerly done by two men.

Opinions differ as to whether or not it is better to set apart a room for the exclusive use of female clerks, or to mix them up with the men. Where only a few women are employed perhaps the latter plan is the better, but I am inclined to think, and in this view I am supported by many heads of large corporations, that where numbers of young women are employed in the same building as men it is better for the female clerks to work apart. An excellent example of organisation in this respect is that of the Munitions Ministry. There everything goes like clockwork. So many young women are placed under the superintendence of an older woman, the whole staff being under the control of a few permanent officials. In this way a kind of general training may be said to be always in progress, with the result that, as time goes on, greater proficiency is attained and no waste of time or energy takes place.

A woman, unlike a man, does not always trust to her memory, she makes a note, with the result that things are not forgotten. She is also more methodical and more careful of her time, and does not get behind with her work. For sorting and filing a woman's services are invaluable, but I would suggest to typists and stenographers that more is required of them than the mere act of typing and taking down a letter. It is too often supposed that typing is nothing more than a mechanical act. This is not so. Training and education enter the profession of a typist just as they do in any other profession. And so it is with stenographers. A woman who cannot take down accurately or transcribe her notes without mistakes is of little use in business life. Speed is nothing like so necessary as accuracy and an attentive mind. And here let me say that the training for shorthand typists suggested by the Home Office Committee leaves much to be desired; it will, I am afraid, if carried into effect, tend to flood the market with inexperienced women. The average time taken by women to learn shorthand thoroughly and to typewrite from dictation is six months. What the Committee propose is a full-time course extending over eight or ten weeks. This period, in their opinion, should 'enable suitable students to attain to a serviceable degree of skill in both shorthand and typewriting.' And they add, 'some instruction in office routine' may be usefully introduced at the same time. It is, I think, unfortunate that so valuable a Report should have been marred by so crude a proposal.

702/34

It is often said that young women do not take the same interest in their occupations as men, that they are more frivolous, and allow their thoughts to wander from the work in hand. This is not the experience of the heads of departments where women have been introduced to take the place of men. The general opinion is, and I do not speak without knowledge, that the woman who has entered business since the War began takes her position seriously; even the younger women seem to regard their new life as carrying with it responsibilities which necessitate close attention and careful thought. I do not say that the failings of women do not come out in business girls in the same way as the failings of men, but as far as my inquiries go, and I have taken care to make them as wide as possible, the women who have replaced men in clerical work are a steady, earnest, and well-disciplined class. There are, however, two points in which women are not the equal of men. They have not the man's initiative, and cannot work long hours; at hurried work they are also at a disadvantage. But taking women's work as a whole, and provided it is not of too strenuous a kind, it may, I think, safely be said that the majority of women are quite up to the standard of the majority of men.

And this brings me to what perhaps is the most important problem of all. What will happen after the War? Will the woman, who has been doing man's work and doing it well, be content to relinquish her post and return to her occupation, that is assuming she had an occupation, of pre-War days, and if she be content to make the change, will her employer be willing to release her? Discussing the first of these matters with a lady holding decided pro-suffrage views, she brushed aside any forebodings I might have had on the subject, by asserting at once that 'of course every woman now occupying a man's place will give it up when the man comes back.' Her reply, however, if I may venture to say so, does not touch the real issue. I can well understand, and believe that if an employer promised to keep a place open for a man, should he return, the employer will redeem his promise. I am also aware that Schedule II. of the Munitions of War Act, among other matters, provides that 'in any readjustment of staff which may have to be effected after the War priority of employment will be given to workmen in the owners' employment at the beginning of the War who have been serving with the Colours, or who were in the owners' employment when the establishment became a controlled establishment.' But my point is not what will happen if the man returns, but rather what will happen if he does not return. What will then be the woman's position? Will the employer dismiss her for the sole purpose of taking on a man? I do not think so. Neither do I see any logical reason for the woman resigning her post. On the other hand I see very good reasons for her remaining where she is.

702/40

Many men whose places have been kept open have already fallen on the field of battle, others are incapacitated by wounds, and the number of casualties is increasing daily. Then again, a large percentage of men, who before the War were ready enough to follow indoor occupations, will have no desire to return to the counter or the desk. I refer more particularly to single men, as for obvious reasons married men may have no alternative. Indeed, the possibility of many young men not returning has not been lost sight of by the managers of business houses, banks, and insurance offices, and not a few of the 'temporary' women assistants and women clerks are destined for the permanent staff when peace is concluded. And it is the same with the distributing trades. For instance, men who have faced the perils of war, and endured for two or three years in succession the life in the trenches, are hardly likely to return to the draper's shop. When these men enlisted they left behind for ever the effeminate duties of measuring out yards of silk and satin and unwinding ribbons and laces. Ninety years ago last month an editorial note in the Sunday Times observed 'That the sedentary, or rather stationary, business of shops is not very generally entrusted to women. Why should men intrude at all into modes of industry which those of the other sex are equally capable of exercising? It is a sort of robbery of destitute females.' My own views on this subject so entirely agree with these sentiments that to me it is gratifying to find that a reform, which the Crimean and South African Wars failed to secure, bids fair to be accomplished at the close of the present one. I do not, of course, mean that no man will be, or ought to be, employed in the drapery business. For heavy work they are essential, and will remain so, but as a career for young men I think one may safely say that its days are numbered.

Some critic will probably ask, 'If, as you say, these men will not return to the desk or the counter, what occupations are they to follow?' My answer is, they will emigrate. I call to mind what happened after the South African War, and history repeats itself. The conclusion of peace, in my opinion, will see a rapid rise in emigration statistics, and the rise will be a continuing one for some time to come. If I might venture to make a suggestion, it is that the Government would do well to take time by the forelock and give this matter their prompt attention. Some joint understanding should be arrived at between the Home and Dominion Governments, some imperial scheme formulated. I use the word imperial in its broadest and correct sense, that of Empire. I warn the Government this is not a case of 'wait and see.' Everything points to a period of emigration following close upon the War. Not only will the men wish for a freer atmosphere than is possible in the Homeland, they will desire to avoid the fall in wages that must inevitably come with the cessation of hostilities, they will desire to escape the burden of the heavy taxation which awaits this country no matter how complete the victory may be. And if a further incentive to emigration is wanted, it will be found in the imperial character of the War itself. The higher pay our oversea kinsmen are receiving for their services in the field is not likely to be lost upon the private soldier hailing from the British Isles. Countries that pay their soldiers so liberally may also be expected to pay men in civil employment on a similar scale. Then the openings on the land in the Dominions are practically unlimited and, if farming is a bit of a struggle in the early days, steady work and careful living ensures in the long run an eventide of contentment and success.

Nineteenth Century Dec 1915 (an incredible article)

702/4

On the other hand, that a large number of women will be displaced by men after the War goes without saying, and the question naturally arises what will become of the women thus thrown out of employment? Many, no doubt, will transfer themselves again to their old occupations, that is, assuming those occupations to be still in existence and that the women can arrange the wages problem to their satisfaction. But, even allowing for considerable absorption in this way, there must still remain a large surplus of women workers for whom no work will be available, and in this surplus will be found women who have been doing skilled work and receiving men's pay. Will these women sit down with their hands before them and remain idle, or will they enter the open market by placing themselves in competition with men? For myself, I have no hesitation in saying they will choose the second alternative, even though it may result in an overcrowded labour market and the consequent dangers of unemployment and low wages.

Nor do I see that the organisation of women workers on their own account will solve the difficulty; in fact, a movement of that kind might bring them into conflict with the men's unions.

[illegible] sooner this car-
[illegible] fact is recogn[illegible] concerned the sooner will the situation right itself. To [illegible]e matter in other words, in business the male clerk of the future will have to compete with the female clerk, in the distributing trades the male assistant with the female assistant. And so it will be in industrial occupations. The whole economic position of labour will be changed after the War, and for that change both employers and employees should prepare themselves without delay.

Nor must one forget that thousands of women have found an outlet for their energies in Red Cross work and kindred occupations. With the cessation of these activities many, no doubt, will return to their place in the home or the hospital; on the other hand not a few will desire to find employment in other directions. How that employment can be secured is a problem yet to be faced. In many cases marriage will settle the difficulty; another solution is emigration. Untrained women the Dominions do not want; but trained women are always welcome, and can find plenty of work to do in Canada, Australia, or New Zealand. Then there is the land at home. Much can be done in this direction by women with health and youth on their side, and who are not afraid of hard work.

The question of women's employment after the War needs the closest attention, not only of economists, but of the Government itself. And what I should like to propose is that an inquiry be undertaken by a Select Committee composed of members of both Houses of Parliament, that the reference be made as wide as possible, and the proceedings conducted in public and carried on from day to day. If this course were taken, I feel convinced that some at least of the difficulties touched upon in this article, and others that I have not been able to deal with, would be well on the road to solution when peace is proclaimed.

CLEMENT KINLOCH-COOKE.

Manchester Guardian
7.2.16

WOMEN'S WAR WORK.

PROBLEMS WHICH WILL ARISE LATER.

DEMOBILISATION DANGERS.

A conference was held in Manchester on Saturday to consider the position of women in the readjustment of labouh after the war. It was called together by the Manchester and District Women's War Interests Committee.

Miss Margaret Ashton, who presided, drew attention to two dangers which would arise at the end of the war out of the fact that so many women had been brought into industrial employment in place of men. One was the danger that women might be retained in factories as cheap labour to do work which men had done before, and the other that an enormous number of would probably be thrown suddenly out of employment to drag down the whole industrial market. A scheme was being debated by the Demobilisation Committee for dealing with the soldiers before they got drafted back into ordinary industry. The Committee was discussing things solely from the point of view of the men who would return after serving the nation in the war, but the case of the women who had been doing national service by taking the men's places at home ought also to be considered. The Women's War Interests Committee felt, therefore, that the Demobilisation Committee should be reformed so as to make it capable of dealing with the women's problem as well of the men's.

In addition to the official proposals laid before the conference, Miss Ashton made one suggestion of her own for meeting the situation. She said there was a distinct tendency for women to work more rapidly than men, but they broke down under the strain. Her proposal was that women should be paid at exactly the time sates as men, but that they should work only half time.

"Come to Stay."

Mrs. J. R. Tomlinson laid before the conference a series of proposals drawn up by the War Interests Committee. The chief proposal was that a woman displaced at the end of the war should receive, if a member of a trade union, adequate out-of-work benefit until she found work or for an agreed period; that a woman who was not a trade union member should receive a weekly money payment conditional upon registration at a special bureau connected with the Labour Exchange. Attached to this proposal was a subsidiary one, that while women are in receipt of this maintenance they should be given opportunities of training for new occupations or acquiring greater skill in that which they have been following.

Another proposal was that "no woman be retained in work done by men before the war at less than a wage of £1 for a week of 48 hours."

Mrs. Annot Robinson, speaking in support of these proposals, expressed her belief that in many industries women had come to stay. In some trades new machinery and new divisions of processes had been introduced in order to make the work suitable for women. It was impossible to conceive that that new machinery would be scrapped at the end of the war.

The Conference accepted the principle of the proposals, but some alterations in detail were made. Objection was taken to the clause in the first-mentioned proposal in favour of a grant to unemployed women who were not members of trade unions. Mr. George Titt, the representative of the National Federation of Women Workers, said that such a practice would have an injurious effect upon the trade union movement, because it would give to the non-member for nothing the same benefit as to the member who had been paying contributions.

Eventually the first proposal was amended as follows:—"That a woman displaced at the end of the war should receive through a trade union adequate out-of-work benefit, either until she gets other work or for a period to be agreed upon, and that the Government should subsidise the trade union to enable it to meet the increased unemployment benefit."

The Need of the Vote.

Speaking at the Caxton Hall last night, Miss Sylvia Pankhurst touched on many aspects of the women's movement in the light of the present war. She asked her hearers to realise the condition of labour after the war. Incidentally Miss Pankhurst described "the political truce" as one in which conscriptionists and protectionists were working as hard

Yorkshire Herald
3.2.16

702

7

WOMEN AND THE WAR.

A REVOLUTION IN WORK.

LADY PARSONS' SUGGESTIONS.

Speaking on the subject of "Women's Work During and After the War" at the Society of Arts, last evening, the Hon. Lady Parsons said the extremely businesslike management of the voluntary workrooms, and the high standard of the work produced in them, suggested the lines on which a factory, run by women for women, might be carried out on economic lines.

Lady Parsons said that attracted by the stirring outdoor life, and the movement and change, hundreds of healthy young girls were taking the place of boys as messengers, telegraph and errand girls. They rode on vans and delivered parcels, and sometimes drove the vans themselves; they conducted trams and drove taxis; they mounted ladders and cleaned windows and street lamps; they punched your tickets and carried your luggage. That many of these occupations were blind alleys did not disturb the joyful young spirits, who found them an easy and congenial task; and, once escaped from dressmakers' workrooms, they would not be easily shut up again in these respectable sanctuaries. (Hear, hear and applause.) Coming to the professions for women that the war has brought into special prominence, and describing the medical as the most important of the professions open to women, she said the Scottish Women's Units in France had set up a standard of efficiency that astonished the French authorities. In the absence of so many medical men called to the service of the Army, and so few young men taking up the medical profession at present, the woman doctor was becoming a very real necessity to the country. (Applause.) The training and employment of women in agriculture and gardening, and their absorption in clerical Government work, releasing hundreds of young men to join the colours, was also described by Lady Parsons, who went on to say that a new field for women's enterprise was likely to develop in the important industrial profession of engineering. In the munition areas new factories were springing up and old firms were changing their plant and adapting their machines to munition work. In all of the larger factories thousands of women and girls were employed. The aeroplane factory possessed great advantages for the training of women, and in the motor industry several enterprising firms were holding special classes for women. It would be well, the lecturer added, if women could specialise on making some of the innumerable articles we bought from Germany before the war, such, for instance, as motor cars and cycles, sewing machines, and cheap clocks and watches. (Applause.) While young men were using their best energies in fighting the enemy, and elder men were using their brains on inventing machines for his destruction, it should be made possible for women to begin a careful study and preparation of the business methods to be followed after the war was over. (Applause.)

was called together by the Central Women's War Interests Committee.

Miss Margaret Ashton, who presided, drew attention to two dangers which would arise at the end of the war out of the fact that so many women had been brought into industrial employment in place of men. One was the danger that women might be retained in factories as cheap labour to do work which men had done before, and the other that an enormous number of would probably be thrown suddenly out of employment to drag down the whole industrial market. A scheme was being debated by the Demobilisation Committee for dealing with the soldiers before they got drafted back into ordinary industry. The Committee was discussing things solely from the point of view of the men who would return after serving the nation in the war, but the case of the women who had been doing national service by taking the men's places at home ought also to be considered. The Women's War Interests Committee felt, therefore, that the Demobilisation Committee should be reformed so as to make it capable of dealing with the women's problem as well of the men's.

In addition to the official proposals laid before the conference, Miss Ashton made one suggestion of her own for meeting the situation. She said there was a distinct tendency for women to work more rapidly than men, but they broke down under the strain. Her proposal was that women should be paid at exactly the time rates as men, but that they should work only half time.

"Come to Stay."

Mrs. J. R. Tomlinson laid before the conference a series of proposals drawn up by the War Interests Committee. The chief proposal was that a woman displaced at the end of the war should receive, if a member of a trade union, adequate out-of-work benefit until she found work or for an agreed period; that a woman who was not a trade union member should receive a weekly money payment conditional upon registration at a special bureau connected with the Labour Exchange. Attached to this proposal was a subsidiary one, that while women are in receipt of this maintenance they should be given opportunities of training for new occupations or acquiring greater skill in that which they have been following.

Another proposal was that "no woman be retained in work done by men before the war at less than a wage of £1 for a week of 48 hours."

Mrs. Annot Robinson, speaking in support of these proposals, expressed her belief that in many industries women had come to stay. In some trades new machinery and new divisions of processes had been introduced in order to make the work suitable for women. It was impossible to conceive that that new machinery would be scrapped at the end of the war.

The Conference accepted the principle of the proposals, but some alterations in detail were made. Objection was taken to the clause in the first-mentioned proposal in favour of a grant to unemployed women who were not members of trade unions. Mr. George Titt, the representative of the National Federation of Women Workers, said that such a practice would have an injurious effect upon the trade union movement, because it would give to the non-member for nothing the same benefit as to the member who had been paying contributions.

Eventually the first proposal was amended as follows:—"That a woman displaced at the end of the war should receive through a trade union adequate out-of-work benefit, either until she gets other work or for a period to be agreed upon, and that the Government should subsidise the trade union to enable it to meet the increased unemployment benefit."

The Need of the Vote.

Speaking at the Caxton Hall last night, Miss Sylvia Pankhurst touched on many aspects of the women's movement in the light of the present war. She asked her hearers to realise the condition of labour after the war. Incidentally Miss Pankhurst described "the political truce" as one in which conscriptionists and protectionists were working as hard as ever, and a Board of Trade Committee had now recommended a system of preferential tariffs. We had seen how the capitalists had forced up the price of bread. At the outbreak of war the Government was behind the banks and the money-makers; it had never been behind the people of the country. Women ought to be enfranchised, especially working women, who were the greatest sufferers by this exploitation. There must be votes for all women, and their only chance to wield political power was for the majority of women to line up with the men, to join the trade unions and fight the forces of oppression that were getting stronger every day.

Lady Parsons said that [illegible] stirring outdoor life, and the movement and change, hundreds of healthy young girls were taking the place of boys as messengers, telegraph and errand girls. They rode on vans and delivered parcels, and sometimes drove the vans themselves; they conducted trams and drove taxis; they mounted ladders and cleaned windows and street lamps; they punched your tickets and carried your luggage. That many of these occupations were blind alleys did not disturb the joyful young spirits, who found them an easy and congenial task; and, once escaped from dressmakers' workrooms, they would not be easily shut up again in these respectable sanctuaries. (Hear, hear and applause.) Coming to the professions for women that the war has brought into special prominence, and describing the medical as the most important of the professions open to women, she said the Scottish Women's Units in France had set up a standard of efficiency that astonished the French authorities. In the absence of so many medical men called to the service of the Army, and so few young men taking up the medical profession at present, the woman doctor was becoming a very real necessity to the country. (Applause.) The training and employment of women in agriculture and gardening, and their absorption in clerical Government work, releasing hundreds of young men to join the colours, was also described by Lady Parsons, who went on to say that a new field for women's enterprise was likely to develop in the important industrial profession of engineering. In the munition areas new factories were springing up and old firms were changing their plant and adapting their machines to munition work. In all of the larger factories thousands of women and girls were employed. The aeroplane factory possessed great advantages for the training of women, and in the motor industry several enterprising firms were holding special classes for women. It would be well, the lecturer added, if women could specialise on making some of the innumerable articles we bought from Germany before the war, such, for instance, as motor cars and cycles, sewing machines, and cheap clocks and watches. (Applause.) While young men were using their best energies in fighting the enemy, and elder men were using their brains on inventing machines for his destruction, it should be made possible for women to begin a careful study and preparation of the business methods to be followed after the war was over. (Applause.)

The Daily Dispatch Leader 19/5/16

Darlington Times 5-5-16

6

WOMEN WAR WORKERS.

Restoration Committees to be Appointed.

Mr. Runciman, President of the Board of Trade, received yesterday the members of the Parliamentary Committee of the Trade Union Congress in regard to a number of resolutions passed by the Congress held at the end of last year at Bristol.

The resolutions, amongst other matters, had relation to women as war workers in engineering trades and the extension of the Trade Boards Act to those engaged in the making of women's clothing in the tailoring industry.

Mr. Runciman listened sympathetically to the views placed before him on the various topics. In regard to the position of women war workers, he stated that he and his colleagues had anticipated the visit of the deputation by agreeing among themselves the desirability of establishing what would be known as Restoration Committees, so that when the war ended some machinery should be available for dealing with questions which might arise owing to the return of men and women to their normal occupations. The committees, when established, would, he hoped, be fair and impartial, and of such a character as to prevent any suspicion arising in the minds of workers that pledges given by the Government would not be carried out in their strictest sense

As to the request for additional inspectors under the Trade Boards Act and the extension of the Act to the women's clothing industry, Mr. Runciman said he was unable to give any assurance to the deputation, but added that when the Trade Boards were first seriously discussed and established those of the Manchester school of thought, and he was one of them, felt very grave doubts as to the wisdom of such a step, but in the light of experience he and others had come to the conclusion that those fears were groundless, for the Boards had fulfilled a useful function and had been very helpful to the workers. That being so, any request for an extension of the Boards at the proper time would receive his support and encouragement.

Bradford Daily Telegraph 21-5-16

One of the questions that working men are thinking hardest about is that of the future of the women who have been drafted into industry in such large numbers to take the place of men, and the effect on men's wages and the general standard of living. On this subject (writes the London correspondent of the "Manchester Guardian") a series of conferences was started by the Women's Labour League yesterday. A very large and interesting gathering was called together at the Kingsway Hall. There were delegates from 127 societies, and among them were representatives of all the most important federations of women's societies, such as the National Union of Women Workers, and federations of trade unions, suffrage societies, and organisations like the Women's Tariff Reform Association. They all represented bodies deeply interested in the future of "women in industry after the war."

Mr. Bramley, who represented men trade unionists, expressed the belief that the women newly come into skilled trades have come to stay, that the Government will not be able to keep its promise that the men returning from the front will find their places open. His expectation was that employers will do their best to retain this cheap labour, and he urged that women should organise to protect both their own interests and those of the men.

WHEN THE MEN COME HOME.

Dr. Marion Phillips committed herself to a startling prophecy. She thought that at least two millions of the men who had gone to the front will never return to their old positions, and that women will refuse to be excluded from the new work which they find so much more attractive and profitable than their own dull employments. She instanced the woman who used to go out washing to support a sickly husband and three children, who now draws a separation allowance (after all, a good many sickly men have been taken by the army), and earns 26s. shillings a week on a large and lively railway station, and the other case of a girl typist, who now, dressed in becoming garb, drives a milk cart all her happy day. Men, she thought, are at last beginning to realise that women are permanent competitors, and the trade unions must make some provision to protect the women and themselves.

WOMEN WAR WORKERS AFTER THE WAR.

One of the questions that working men are thinking hardest about is that of the future of the women who have been drafted into industry in such large numbers to take the place of men, and the effect on men's wages and the general standard of living. On this subject a series of conferences was started by the Women's Labour League on Saturday. A very large and interesting gathering was called together at the Kingsway Hall, London. There were delegates from 127 societies, and among them were representatives of all the most important federations of women's societies, such as the National Union of Women Workers, and federations of trade unions, suffrage societies, and organisations like the Women's Tariff Reform Association. They all represented bodies deeply interested in the future of "women in industry after the war." Mr. Bramley, who represented men trade unionists, expressed the belief that the women newly come into skilled trades have come to stay, and that the Government will not be able to keep its promise that the men returning from the front will find their places open.

WHEN THE MEN COME HOME.

Dr. Marion Phillips committed herself to a startling prophecy. She thought that at least two millions of the men who have gone to the front will never return to their old positions, and that women will refuse to be excluded from the new work which they find so much more attractive and profitable than their own dull employments. She instanced the woman who used to go out washing to support a sickly husband and three children, who now draws a separation allowance (after all, a good many sickly men have been taken by the Army), and earns twenty-six shillings a week on a large and lively railway station, and the other case of a girl typist, who now, dressed in becoming garb, drives a milk cart all her happy day. Men, she thought, are at last beginning to realise that women are permanent competitors, and the trade unions must make some provision to protect the women and themselves. The questions and discussions which followed suggested that the Women's Labour League would do well to hold similar conferences in all parts of the country, so many and so complicated were the problems which the various speakers raised. Perhaps the question that aroused most interest was that of the right of the married woman to keep, when peace comes, the work which she has taken up during the war.

People 28-5-16

At a conference representing 127 societies, held at Kingsway Hall yesterday, convened by the Central London branch of the Women's Labour League, to discuss the position of women in industry after the war, Dr. Ethel Bentham, who presided, said that of all the problems which had been roused by the war this was probably one of the most difficult. After the war, and even possibly before the war ended, it might be necessary that women should come into full citizenship, and women's responsibilities would be very greatly increased thereby, but she did not think that many of these questions could wait for that solution. So far as she had been able to see, most of the married women who had gone out to do hard physical work were in health the better for it.—Mr. Fred. Bramley, organiser of the National Amalgamated Furnishing Trades Association, said he believed there was a great danger of a conflict between employers and the men's uion respecting the employment of women, and a conflict in which the interests of women would not be looked upon as of primary importance, and there was also the danger of a conflict between women now employed in industries and the men who would come back to these industries.—Dr. Marion Phillips said the leading trades' unionists and trades unions should consider what was the best policy to pursue on the presumption that women remained in positions they had taken up during the war. There would be no objection to her remaining where she had proved her capacity.

Manchester Guardian
22.2.16

702/44

WOMEN'S WAGES AFTER THE WAR.

At a meeting of the Manchester Branch of the Women's International League in the Onward Buildings yesterday, Miss Ellen Wilkinson spoke on women's wages, and emphasised the importance of women being organised in the same trade unions as men. It was hoped that this would be a means of preventing women who had learnt new trades from being thrown after the war on the scrap-heap of sweated industries, to lose the valuable experience they had gained, and to work for wages infinitely lower than those of men.

Yorkshire Post Leeds
18.2.16

WOMEN'S WORK AFTER THE WAR.

To the Editor of The Yorkshire Post.

Sir,—I have been reading with much interest the articles in your columns and elsewhere on the subject of the work of women and their opportunities during this national crisis. I read somewhere that the war has proved our women and girls splendid, and our methods of education wrong both at school and at home. Now, if this be so, will the rush of women to do the work of men in factories, on trams, etc., really benefit the national life after the war is over? There will be the great problem of displaced men, the lack of employment, and all the evils which come in its train. My point is this—would it not be better if we could divert some of this keenness into domestic channels? One urgent need is to rebuild the home life of the nation. I have been chairman of a committee to deal with unemployment among women and girls formed at the outbreak of war, and scores of cases have come under my notice in which girls, who have been thrown out of work, absolutely refuse to do anything of a domestic character; the work may be anything but the tasks of household details. Cooking is no longer an occupation they will tolerate, and the cases I allude to showed also an utter ignorance of such womanly work as sewing or knitting. Now, with these facts before us, what is to become of the science of home life, motherhood, and wifely care? I am almost daily entreating women and girls to use the opportunities offered to-day to learn something that will be useful to them after the war is over.

In connection with the matter of work on farms, which we hear so much about, I am informed by one farmer of a large farm, that the same spirit is manifest there; they will do the man's work, or try to do it, but when asked to do purely women's work, such as cooking (and where could our girls learn this art better than in one of our Yorkshire farm kitchens?), or mending of clothes, they reply that they came out to do farm work.

I am confident that if our homes are to become, what I am old-fashioned enough to still desire, places of training of the next generation, it can only be done by the future mothers being educated in the best school of learning, viz., the home of one who herself has learned the noble science of mothercraft. I would appeal to all who in any way agree with the ideal I have feebly tried to voice to do their utmost in these difficult days to prepare the future mothers of our land to fulfil the noblest destiny and to uphold the loftiest ideal of our national conscience, and that is to rebuild the broken walls of the home life of old England.—Yours, etc.,

ARTHUR C. ENGLAND,
Vicar of St. Mary's, Sculcoates.

Hull, February 17, 1916.

Evening News
19.2.16

WOMEN WAR WORKERS.

Trade Unions and Their Position After the War.

At the Board of Trade yesterday Mr. Runciman received the members of the Parliamentary Committee of the Trade Union Congress in regard to a number of resolutions passed by the Congress held at the end of last year at Bristol.

Among the matters discussed were the position of women workers in engineering trades after the war and the provisions of a Bill to facilitate the amalgamation of trade unions.

Mr. Runciman listened sympathetically to the views placed before him on the various topics. In regard to the position of women war-workers, he stated that he and his colleagues had anticipated the visit of the deputation by agreeing among themselves the desirability of establishing what would be known as restoration committees, so that when the war ended some machinery should be available for dealing with questions which might arise owing to the return of men and women to their normal occupations.

Speaking of the amalgamation of trade unions, the president said he recognised the difficulties of obtaining a satisfactory vote under present provisions, and he suggested that if the law could be modified so that it would only be necessary for four-fifths of the membership to vote, and that a two-thirds majority of that number would be sufficient to allow amalgamation, perhaps that would meet the views of the committee and ease the present position.

STATE AND WOMEN'S WAR WORK.

MR. RUNCIMAN ON TRADE BOARDS.

The President of the Board of Trade yesterday received a deputation representing the Trade Union Congress Parliamentary Committee, which presented resolutions passed at the recent congress at Bristol. These dealt, among other things, with the position of women as war emergency workers, the extension of Trade Boards to women employed in tailoring work, the appointment of additional inspectors, and the extension of the unemployment section of the Insurance Act.

Mr. RUNCIMAN said that however much the Government might desire to do so, it was impossible for them just now to deal with questions involving legislation, but he expressed the hope that when normal times returned the broader view on labour matters which actuated his department to-day would be seen in the facilities which would be granted for labour measures.

In regard to the position of women war-workers, he and his colleagues had anticipated the visit of the deputation by agreeing among themselves as to the desirability of establishing what would be known as restoration committees, so that when the war ended some machinery should be available for dealing with questions which might arise owing to the return of men and women to their normal occupations. The committees, when established, would, he hoped, be fair and impartial, and of such a character as to prevent any suspicion arising in the minds of workers that pledges given by the Government would not be carried out in their strictest sense.

THE MANCHESTER SCHOOL.

He went on to deal with the request for additional inspectors under the Trade Boards Act and the request for the extension of the Act to the women's clothing industry. He was unable to give any assurance to the deputation, but said that when the trade boards were first seriously discussed and established, those of the Manchester school of thought—and he was one of them—felt very grave doubts as to the wisdom of such a step. But in the light of experience he and others had come to the conclusion that those fears were groundless, for the boards had fulfilled a useful function and had been very helpful to the workers. Any request for an extension of the boards at the proper time would receive his support and encouragement.

Speaking of the amalgamation of trade unions, Mr. Runciman said he recognized the difficulties of obtaining a satisfactory vote under the present provisions, and suggested that if the law could be modified so that it would only be necessary for four-fifths of the membership to vote, and that a two-thirds majority of that number would be sufficient to allow amalgamation, perhaps that would meet the views of the committee and ease the present position. He could not hold out any hope of legislation on these lines meantime.

On Clause 87 of the Insurance Act the Congress sought an explanation as to whether unemployment benefit should be paid to men thrown out of work owing to a strike in another part of the works in which they were engaged. In view of this interpretation of the section he felt that legislation would be required to alter it, and he invited the Parliamentary Committee to draft such a provision.

Among those present were Mr. Harry Gosling (chairman of the Trade Union Congress Parliamentary Committee), Mr. Will Thorne, M.P., and Mr. C. W. Bowerman, M.P.

Daily Mail
19.2.16

WOMEN & TRADE UNIONS.

AFTER-THE-WAR RESTORATION OF RIGHTS.

Mr. Runciman told members of the Parliamentary Committee of the Trade Union Congress yesterday that he and his colleagues had agreed as to the desirability of establishing what would be known as restoration committees, so that when the war ended some machinery shall be available for dealing with questions arising from the return of men and women to their normal occupation.

The Common Cause 25/4/18. 702/45 Westminster Gazette

Restoration Committees.

On Friday last the President of the Board of Trade received a deputation representing the Trade Union Congress Parliamentary Committee, which presented resolutions passed at the recent Congress at Bristol. Among the issues raised was the employment of women as war emergency workers in the engineering trades and their replacement by men after the war. Mr. Runciman stated that in regard to the position of women war workers the Government had anticipated the deputation, and the Board of Trade had already under consideration the setting up of Restoration Committees, so that when the war ended some machinery should be available for dealing with questions which might arise owing to the return of men and women to their normal occupations. The Committees, when established, would, he hoped, be fair and impartial, and of such a character as to prevent any suspicion arising in the minds of workers that pledges given by the Government would not be carried out in their strictest sense.

It is essential that a considerable proportion of women should be placed upon these Committees. The restoration, after the war, of trade union restrictions, which has been definitely undertaken by the Government, may mean that thousands of women will be thrown out of skilled employment which they have only just been allowed to enter by a temporary suspension of union rules. We hope that, having grown accustomed to working with women, men in the engineering trades will take a more broad-minded view than in the past. But it would be folly to count too much on this. Plans must be made in advance for drafting women into other trades, and, where necessary, for providing training. Much is being written about capturing German trade, and in this future industrial competition women can play as important a part as they are doing now in keeping our troops supplied with munitions. But if full use is to be made of their services they must be trained and organised.

ER

The value in a well-established name is in the Honour and Good Faith for which it stands.

Firestone

TYRES

are stamped with a name which represents all that is best in Tyre service.

Write for our brochure "What's What in Tyres."

FIRESTONE TYRE & RUBBER CO., LTD.,

216, Tottenham Court Road, W.

PRICE ONE PENNY.

being cut down by the officials of the Ruhleben camp, and that this is being done in a vindictive spirit of which we have the strongest right to complain.

The best practical remedy for the moment is to continue to send supplementary food in as large quantities as possible through the Prisoners of War Help Committee, and at the same time to press incessantly for the exchange of these prisoners, on the plan proposed by Lord ROBERT CECIL. We should have supposed that the German Government would have been ashamed to let it go out to the world that it was either unable or unwilling to maintain its prisoners according to the standard usual among civilised Powers. We should have supposed that it would have taken special pains to avoid the implication that it was not to be trusted in this respect. The discrimination between civilian and military prisoners, to the disadvantage of the former, is specially indefensible, according to the usually accepted standard, for many of the civilians are elderly men in indifferent health, and those who are of military age are only prevented by their detention from doing their duty to their country in arms. The idea of reprisals in kind upon interned civilians in this country is extremely distasteful to Englishmen. Whatever comes, we do not desire to lie under the imputation of behaving harshly or inhumanly to innocent people. But there are other ways than starving interned Germans of bringing home to the German Government that we are determined to protect our people.

INDUSTRY AFTER THE WAR.

A SUGGESTION.

BY ARTHUR PATERSON.

The war is reaching its final stage, and there are indubitable signs that in a few months peace may be in sight. This gives no cause whatever for relaxation of effort on the part of the Allies—indeed, quite the contrary. Nations, like men, fight hardest and most furiously when they are beginning to despair. But to us as a people who have taken out of our industrial life and thrown into military service or training five million men, and who have engaged in munition work or other Government employment, probably from five to ten millions of persons of both sexes and all ages, it must surely mean that we shall seriously take in hand preparation on a systematic basis for the day when our sailors and soldiers return to civil life, and our munition and other emergency workers are dismissed from their present work and will have to find their way back to their former occupations, or, if those do not need their services, to new work altogether.

The Government, its hands full of the responsibilities of the war, has done nothing in this direction beyond the appointment, it is understood, of one or two inter-Departmental Committees of officials who, in their very scanty spare time, meet to consider the administrative machinery which may have to be put in motion to provide opportunities of employment for the men from the Navy and Army upon their return home.

This does not, and cannot, meet the need to which the nation is gradually awakening, and which must be met without delay if the issues with which the country will be faced upon the arrival of peace are to be dealt with with any chance of success.

The main issue we have to face is that this war and the consequences arising out of it have caused upheaval in the industrial world.

The men belonging to skilled and organised labour are earning in most cases higher wages than the most sanguine trade unionist, before the war broke out, had ever hoped to attain. Able-bodied persons of any age and of both sexes who can endure the strain of sustained labour find work at twice or three times the wage of pre-war days.

Then the men in the trenches. They are told that the services they are rendering are to receive recognition of the fullest and most generous kind from a grateful country when they return to its shores. These men read the daily papers, and are as well aware as any of us of the wages their fathers, their brothers, their sisters, and their wives are earning at the present and in this future industrial competition women can play as important a part as they are doing now in keeping our troops supplied with munitions. But if full use is to be made of their services they must be trained and organised.

either unable or unwilling to maintain its prisoners according to the standard usual among civilised Powers. We should have supposed that it would have taken special pains to avoid the implication that it was not to be trusted in this respect. The discrimination between civilian and military prisoners, to the disadvantage of the former, is specially indefensible, according to the usually accepted standard, for many of the civilians are elderly men in indifferent health, and those who are of military age are only prevented by their detention from doing their duty to their country in arms. The idea of reprisals in kind upon interned civilians in this country is extremely distasteful to Englishmen. Whatever comes, we do not desire to lie under the imputation of behaving harshly or inhumanly to innocent people. But there are other ways than starving interned Germans of bringing home to the German Government that we are determined to protect our people.

INDUSTRY AFTER THE WAR.

A SUGGESTION.

By Arthur Paterson.

The war is reaching its final stage, and there are indubitable signs that in a few months peace may be in sight. This gives no cause whatever for relaxation of effort on the part of the Allies—indeed, quite the contrary. Nations, like men, fight hardest and most furiously when they are beginning to despair. But to us as a people who have taken out of our industrial life and thrown into military service or training five million men, and who have engaged in munition work or other Government employment, probably from five to ten millions of persons of both sexes and all ages, it must surely mean that we shall seriously take in hand preparation on a systematic basis for the day when our sailors and soldiers return to civil life, and our munition and other emergency workers are dismissed from their present work and will have to find their way back to their former occupations, or, if those do not need their services, to new work altogether.

The Government, its hands full of the responsibilities of the war, has done nothing in this direction beyond the appointment, it is understood, of one or two inter-Departmental Committees of officials who, in their very scanty spare time, meet to consider the administrative machinery which may have to be put in motion to provide opportunities of employment for the men from the Navy and Army upon their return home.

This does not, and cannot, meet the need to which the nation is gradually awakening, and which must be met without delay if the issues with which the country will be faced upon the arrival of peace are to be dealt with with any chance of success.

The main issue we have to face is that this war and the consequences arising out of it have caused upheaval in the industrial world.

The men belonging to skilled and organised labour are earning in most cases higher wages than the most sanguine trade unionist, before the war broke out, had ever hoped to attain. Able-bodied persons of any age and of both sexes who can endure the strain of sustained labour find work at twice or three times the wage of pre-war days.

Then the men in the trenches. They are told that the services they are rendering are to receive recognition of the fullest and most generous kind from a grateful country when they return to its shores. These men read the daily papers, and are as well aware as any of us of the wages their fathers, their brothers, their sisters, and their wives are earning at the present time. They think about these things and they discuss them.

Next, the women. The clever and the strong ones have forced recognition, economically and industrially, from employers which will be a far more formidable weapon in the upholdinterest; that he holds his opinion by right of reason and not through bigotry.

---

* * *

There ought to be a code of rules drawn up for all who administrate affairs, a fixed cross-examination through which a man should go each morning to himself before his judgment is put to the test. This reminder that no human being is infallible should hang over his desk. And people suffering from his bias should have the right to point to the text which warns man of his love for preconceived ideas!

If this was made a general rule an employer's or an official's pride would prevent him running the danger of thus having his good judgment rebuked. . . . He would take good care to have a satisfactory reason for his veto every time, or else give way with grace.

* * *

I speak from personal experience when I say that those in control at Selfridge's fight deliberately against reactionary feeling. There is no place where new ideas are so freely welcomed, or where there is more open invitation to state one's case and air one's views. And that attitude of mind is largely responsible for the character this House of Business has for progressiveness and gain. If ever that were lost all forcefulness would vanish from its ng of the rights of women to be placed on a level with men politically than anything the Suffragist agitation could accomplish before the war. The women will refuse to be displaced.

Lastly, our juvenile workers. From a social and moral standpoint this part of the demobilisation problem is going to be the most serious of all. Everywhere our lads and lasses, to meet the immediate needs of the nation in its time of industrial stress, have been forced forward and upward, and sometimes downward, into occupations, into the receipt of high wages, into habits and an outlook upon life which are likely to gravely prejudice their future.

The nation must realise, in short, that workmen everywhere are prepared to strike and agitate aggressively for a continuance of their present rates of pay, or of as much as can possibly be squeezed from their employers with or without the aid of the Board of Trade and that our soldiers have not the smallest intention of allowing their claims to preferential treatment over ordinary industrial workers to be neglected when they return home. They will not be a pitiful handful of a few thousands, unorganised for agitation, thankful for any sort of work which will bring in enough for bare existence; they will be millions strong, with thousands of capable organisers among them. A very considerable number of soldiers are members of the most powerful trade unions in the country, who are determined that the men coming back from the trenches, and the workers coming out of munition factories, women as well as men, shall join hands at the critical moment so that as far as numbers and labour—and votes—can secure it, the nation shall pay the highest price for the labour it will need to compete for world markets.

The employers must also be considered. They have benefited undoubtedly even more than the men where their goods have been required by the Government, or have been so necessary to the maintenance or comfort of consumers that double prices have been paid for them. In spite of taxes and of investments in Exchequer Bonds and the like, therefore, there may well be in the country a vast amount of capital available for the creation of new industries and the reintroduction of former industries, and the money required for production after the war be found. But it is useless to expect that employers can then pay the wages they are now paying in addition to all the extra expenses involved in the reconstruction of machinery, the purchase of new plant, &c., and yet compete successfully against America and other neutral countries who have not undergone any abnormal inflation in the value of labour or enormous losses of capital in the production of munitions and other waste product, involving very heavy taxes on all property and business. Still less can they compete against the dumping of German goods into China and the South American Republics, and other neutral countries. With the return of the Army and the rush into the labour market of munition workers all employers will look for labour at far cheaper rates than are current at the present time. If they do not get such labour, they will declare they cannot launch out into productive operations on a scale sufficiently large for national needs, nor take the risks of a small profit upon a large output if they have to anticipate extensive and bitter labour troubles.

There is, of course, in addition, the cross-currents of women's labour and industrial position in the future, the weighty question of the outlook for juvenile labour, and the immense field, which requires treatment I have not space to give here, of the social welfare of the elderly and partially unfit, and those men returning from the front who, from moral and physical reasons, will be a drug in the labour market of the most serious kind.

In these circumstances it is plain that anything like adequate or effective preparation for our industrial future at the end of the war must rest on a wider basis than any administrative measures the wisest of Departmental Committees can suggest. The basis we need on which to build an organisation and combination of forces powerful enough to secure industrial prosperity and peace in this country after the war is nothing less than an agreement upon how to meet these issues of the best minds in the kingdom drawn from the ranks of Capital and Labour, from women, and from those who stand for juvenile workers, and those who know best what will be needed for men and women who, with the return of peace, will, if unaided, fall back upon the support of charity or the workhouse. This agreement can only be obtained by national effort of the most strenuous and sustained kind. As a first step, a Committee should be appointed by the Government composed of well-known and representative men and women drawn from the classes above mentioned, presided over by a chairman of commanding personality, experienced in both military and industrial conditions, and above suspicion in the eyes of all honest men, whether employers or workmen, as one who will set the welfare of the nation as a whole above that of any class or party.

The functions of such a Committee would be (1) to inquire and report to the Government the facts and the needs of all classes upon demobilisation, the plans or schemes put forward by experts, whether from labour or from capital, from commercial men or from departmental officials, and, having given full and fair consideration to all plans and suggestions, recommend to the Government the course which should be pursued in the interests of the industrial community and the nation, and the actual machinery of administration or organisation which should be set up to carry it out. (2) To arrange in each industrial centre throughout the country conferences of an entirely friendly and informal character between employers and representative workmen, the set purpose of such conferences being to promote agreement between employers and workmen upon the main principles which must guide national action, so as to place this country in a commanding position among nations after the war. (3) To secure through these local conferences and by all other possible means mutual goodwill and confidence among employers and workmen, and by so doing effectively promote the industrial security of the country.

The Committee, in addition to representative men and women from the various sections of the industrial community, should include among its members selected experts on emigration, agriculture, the care and training of the disabled, and social welfare. In this way the Committee would carry out its functions without overlapping with bodies already at work [illegible] on hands at the critical moment so that as far as numbers and labour—and votes—can secure it, the nation shall pay the highest price for the labour it will need to compete for world markets.

The employers must also be considered. They have benefited undoubtedly even more than the men where their goods have been required by the Government, or have been so necessary to the maintenance or comfort of consumers that double prices have been paid for them. In spite of taxes and of investments in Exchequer Bonds and the like, therefore, there may well be in the country a vast amount of capital available for the creation of new industries and the reintroduction of former industries, and the money required for production after the war be found. But it is useless to expect that employers can then pay the wages they are now paying in addition to all the extra expenses involved in the reconstruction of machinery, the purchase of new plant, &c., and yet compete successfully against America and other neutral countries who have not undergone any abnormal inflation in the value of labour or enormous losses of capital in the production of munitions and other waste product, involving very heavy taxes on all property and business. Still less can they compete against the dumping of German goods into China and the South American Republics, and other neutral countries. With the return of the Army and the rush into the labour market of munition workers all employers will look for labour at far cheaper rates than are current at the present time. If they do not get such labour, they will declare they cannot launch out into productive operations on a scale sufficiently large for national needs, nor take the risks of a small profit upon a large output if they have to anticipate extensive and bitter labour troubles.

There is, of course, in addition, the cross-currents of women's labour and industrial position in the future, the weighty question of the outlook for juvenile labour, and the immense field, which requires treatment I have not space to give here, of the social welfare of the elderly and partially unfit, and those men returning from the front who, from moral and physical reasons, will be a drug in the labour market of the most serious kind.

In these circumstances it is plain that anything like adequate or effective preparation for our industrial future at the end of the war must rest on a wider basis than any administrative measures the wisest of Departmental Committees can suggest. The basis we need on which to build an organisation and combination of forces powerful enough to secure industrial prosperity and peace in this country after the war is nothing less than an agreement upon how to meet these issues of the best minds in the kingdom drawn from the ranks of Capital and Labour, from women, and from those who stand for juvenile workers, and those who know best what will be needed for men and women who, with the return of peace, will, if unaided, fall back upon the support of charity or the workhouse. This agreement can only be obtained by national effort of the most strenuous and sustained kind. As a first step, a Committee should be appointed by the Government composed of well-known and representative men and women drawn from the classes above mentioned, presided over by a chairman of commanding personality, experienced in both military and industrial conditions, and above suspicion in the eyes of all honest men, whether employers or workmen, as one who will set the welfare of the nation as a whole above that of any class or party.

The functions of such a Committee would be (1) to inquire and report to the Government the facts and the needs of all classes upon demobilisation, the plans or schemes put forward by experts, whether from labour or from capital, from commercial men or from departmental officials, and, having given full and fair consideration to all plans and suggestions, recommend to the Government the course which should be pursued in the interests of the industrial community and the nation, and the actual machinery of administration or organisation which should be set up to carry it out. (2) To arrange in each industrial centre throughout the country conferences of an entirely friendly and informal character between employers and representative workmen, the set purpose of such conferences being to promote agreement between employers and workmen upon the main principles which must guide national action, so as to place this country in a commanding position among nations after the war. (3) To secure through these local conferences and by all other possible means mutual goodwill and confidence among employers and workmen, and by so doing effectively promote the industrial security of the country.

The Committee, in addition to representative men and women from the various sections of the industrial community, should include among its members selected experts on emigration, agriculture, the care and training of the disabled, and social welfare. In this way the Committee would carry out its functions without overlapping with bodies already at work upon these several subjects, and yet be in a position to advise the Government on every side of the demobilisation problem. It is not suggested that this Committee should possess any administrative functions. What is needed, and, I suggest, urgently needed, is the establishment, without delay, under official auspices and the chairmanship of a trusted leader, of a carefully chosen body of selected and thoroughly representative men and women to knit together all classes directly affected by demobilisation and industrial conditions after the war. Through such a Committee, supported by local leaders and industrial workers, the spirit of our lads when they come home, of our workers who have borne the heat and burden of the day in munition factories, and, not least, our employers and our capitalists, who bear the heaviest responsibility of all, should become that of comrades who, being faced equally with a great and serious crisis in their affairs, meet it hand-in-hand, each placing before any selfish interest the welfare of the nation for which all classes alike have given of their best to win this war.

Next week Mr. John Lane will publish in book form Mr. Louis Parker's latest historical play, "Disraeli." It contains a portrait of Dennis Eadie in the title part, and is issued uniform with "Drake" and "Joseph and His Brethren."

The Statesman. 1916. March 11 702/46

particular places, which may be expected immediately peace is assured, will not go far in the absorption of the millions of men and women who may, if nothing is done to prevent it, be simultaneously unemployed and seeking situations. What steps will the Cabinet approve in the way of issuing grants in aid of Housing schemes (for which the House of Commons actually voted £4,000,000 in August, 1914, never drawn upon)? What action will the Local Government Board take now to ensure that Local Authorities everywhere have their plans ready (and officially approved in advance) for promptly putting in hand their considerable arrears of road mending, school building, and other works of utility, in order to keep up the aggregate volume of wage-earning employment in the Kingdom as a whole to its normal level? The Board of Education will, presumably, have ready not only its circulars pressing for an immediate restoration of all the educational facilities impaired during the war; but also its proposals for educational advance in all grades and, we suggest, for utilising the probable surplusage of labour to obtain the much-needed reform of a universal raising of the school-leaving age, so as to keep out of the labour market for a year the crop of a million boys and girls by which the crowd seeking situations would otherwise be swollen. And the Board of Trade, we hope, will press for an immediate extension to all trades of the Unemployment Insurance which at present covers only one-fifth of the wage-earning population, but to which the Government has already decided, it is announced, to admit (though as yet only for one year) the three or four millions of men to be discharged from the Army and Navy, whatever their previous or future occupations. The Peace Book, it is clear, must be the work, not of any one office, but of a Departmental Committee from which practically no Government Department can be excluded. What is to be the policy as to standard rates of wages? No more momentous social problem has ever been set to this country. The Labour Exchanges will naturally be eager to place as many as possible of the thousands of men and women who will be thronging the exiguous accommodation to which the parsimony of the Office of Works has limited the Exchanges. The Statutory War Pensions Committee, with its network of Local Committees for disabled soldiers and soldiers' widows, will be full of philanthropic ladies seeking to get situations for their protégés at any wage. The employers, notwithstanding the fact that "war prices" will certainly continue far into peace time, will naturally expect wages to come down with a run, and will be prompt to offer the shilling a day for the adult woman, and the two or three shillings a day for the adult man, to which the wages for what is called unskilled labour are always in danger of falling. We hope that the Peace Book will lay down definitely the policy of No Reduction in the standard of life of the wage-earning population. The Government has its own responsibility in the matter, which its several Departments cannot shirk. Every Department is itself an employer of labour, and also enters into contracts for supplies and work. Every Department, as well as the Treasury itself, must therefore decide whether it will maintain and enforce the Fair Wages Clauses on which the House of Commons has repeatedly insisted. The Board of Trade, besides supervising the legal minimum rates fixed under the Trade Boards Act, will not be able to look the other way when trouble begins between the railway companies and the National Union of Railwaymen on any threatened reduction of railway wages. The million of coal miners enjoy a minimum wage fixed under Act of Parliament; but there will be attempts to lower the local rates, to which the Home Office, responsible for preventing another national stoppage of the coal supply, cannot be indifferent. If the standard rates are artificially upheld in the Government service, under Government contractors, throughout the range of the Trade Boards Act, and in the railway and coal mining industries—these amounting, in the aggregate, to one-fifth of the wage-earning population—with what feelings will the Trade Union world, with a General Election pending, meet any attempt by unrestrained employers to cut down wages? For the Trade Unionists have now on their side, in this matter of determinedly resisting any fall in the standard of life of the wage-earning population, not only the whole of working class opinion, including that of the soldiers returning from service with the Colours, but also the economists themselves. No greater social calamity can befall a nation, nothing is more calculated to injure alike its industrial productivity and its trade, than a general reduction in the standard of life of its mechanics, its labourers, and its manual-working women.

THE STUDY OF INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS

THERE are a good many people who feel that there is something very much wrong with the whole system by which the Foreign Policy of this country is determined and administered. The main grounds of criticism are that the system is "undemocratic," that the diplomatic service is recruited exclusively from the upper class, that there is too much secrecy and consequently too little parliamentary control, and that in the absence of such control our foreign affairs are conducted in accordance not with the real interests of the people but with traditions and shibboleths—e.g., the maintenance of the "Balance of Power"—which are not only outworn but actually pernicious, tending rather to endanger than to preserve the peace of the world. The indictment is to a large extent justified; nevertheless the critics, indefatigable as they have been in their exertions during recent years, have never succeeded in gaining any substantial body of public support.

This failure may be ascribed partly no doubt to the notorious indifference of the British public in regard to foreign politics, but still more, we suggest, to two facts: (1) that the diagnosis of the disease has been faulty and unconvincing, and (2) that the grounds for dissatisfaction have been more theoretical than practical. The Foreign Office is an undemocratic institution. It is easy to conceive circumstances in which it might commit the country to a course which public opinion would strongly disapprove. But the fact remains that it is difficult or impossible to find instances in which this has been done. Incidental failures apart, there appears to be exceedingly little fault to be found with exuberances of [illegible]age. But there is a further reason. It is, especially, defensive victories that gain by being unreported. If we made naval attacks on Germany, whether by air or water, we could afford to report the results, which would be better known to the enemy than ourselves. The curtain which has descended over the Navy's achievements is a testimony that they have ceased to possess an offensive character. It is a perception of this which has stimulated some of the cries for Lord Fisher's recall. The public know very little for or against his successor, Sir Henry Jackson. He probably gains as much as he loses by his laudable abstention from self-advertisement; just as Lord Fisher has rather lost than gained by his weakness for excursions into it. But what is getting widely said is that while Lord Fisher was at its head our Navy was constantly worrying Germany, whereas under Sir Henry Jackson's régime the initiative has been allowed to pass to the enemy.

Now, here again we are far from saying that all public criticism should be silent. Incompetent though laymen may be in questions of strategy, there are multifarious ways in which evidences of energy or the reverse in Admiralty administration do leak out, and enable a general impression to be formed, which may not be misleading. But it is between such general impressions and criticisms and a definite judgment on policy, like that between the offensive and the defensive, that a line of demarcation should be sought. The layman must beware of formulating strategic demands. Nelson acted on the "defensive" for two and a half years, until the enemy's fleet came out and gave him the opportunity of Trafalgar. Until the German fleet has given Sir John Jellicoe a similar opportunity it seems premature for newspapers to be quarrelling with admirals because the latter elect to follow Nelson's example.

THE PEACE BOOK

NEARLY ten years ago, when Lord Haldane was at the War Office, the Government decided to have a "War Book" prepared, such as every Continental State possesses—a highly confidential set of plans and projects, draft proclamations and orders, elaborately worked out so as to provide in detail for all that was likely to happen on the outbreak of war. In this way it was hoped to prevent any flurry and confusion in the several Government Departments, and among those charged with specific responsibilities, and to secure from all concerned a prompt, consistent and well-considered policy. The War Book was, in fact, found extremely useful, during the first few weeks of war, so far as its scope extended, and it has been more than once regretted that this departure from the traditions of "muddling through" had not been carried further. Last Tuesday, speaking to a deputation of business men, headed by the Lord Mayor of London, Mr. Asquith announced that the Government hoped to have ready, before the War came to an end, something similar in the way of a "Peace Book" on trade and gency legislation, which, so far as can be foreseen, will be required on the declaration of peace.

We rejoice at this decision, and we only hope that the Prime Minister will definitely order the preparation of the Peace Book to be begun at once and pressed forward without delay to completion. For, as we have more than once indicated in these columns, the conclusion of peace will usher in, throughout all the belligerent countries, not least in our own, a period of social and industrial conflict, of unemployment and distress, of economic and financial strain, that may, in its calamitous effects, come second only to the war itself. Never have we had to face the difficulty of converting spears into pruning hooks on so large a scale. How can the transfer of seven millions of men and women from war and war trades to economically productive employment be effected with the least social damage?

Unfortunately, as we gather, the War Book, prepared almost exclusively by soldiers and sailors, was too limited in scope. It provided in minute detail for the despatch of the Expeditionary Force, but it did not concern itself much about the soldier's wife. It had worked out the sudden seizure of the railways for Government use, but had not foreseen the growing scarcity of merchant shipping. It dealt with the commissariat and the ambulances, but neither with finance nor with civil distress; though even the War Office can now see that the maintenance of credit and the feeding of the labouring population were really as necessary to keep up the firing line as the organisation of the Army Service Corps. We hope that the Peace Book will not be similarly restricted in scope. There is no Government Department, no Local Authority, no branch of industrial or social activity, and no part of the Kingdom, that will not be profoundly affected by the sudden cessation of an expenditure of five million pounds a day and the return of seven millions of workers to the employments of peace.

So far, we gather, the Government has confined itself to thinking out proposals for looking after the disbanded soldiers and sailors, and to providing for them by furlough and gratuity, registration at the Labour Exchanges and Unemployment Insurance for a year. An agricultural committee has proposed the setting up of a few thousand out of the four millions as small holders, and is considering how to induce a hundred thousand more to return to their happy lot as farm labourers. Nothing has yet been devised for the assistance of the three millions of men and women now at work in the war trades, though these will be thrown "on the streets" equally with the discharged soldiers, very soon after peace is assured. Those who compile the Peace Book could, at any rate, ascertain which of these two armies will be most promptly dispensed with —the munition workers or the soldiers. It will be of some consequence, as Mr. Naylor has pointed out in our columns, whether the workers in war trades or the men from the front are to get the first chance at the Labour Exchanges for the situations that will need to be filled when peace comes.

The spurts of activity in particular trades, and a

Manchester Guardian. 20/2/16.

WOMEN'S WAR WORK.

CONDITIONS TO-DAY AND AFTER THE WAR.

A conference convened by the Women's War Interests' Committee was held on Saturday afternoon in the Minor Hall of the Manchester Y.M.C.A. Councillor Margaret Ashton presided. The Committee was formed last May to meet the crisis arising from the withdrawal of a large number of men from industry and their substitution by women. In order to combat the danger of the fall of the standard rate of wages, the lowering of the standard of life of the workers, and the injury to health of the women workers themselves, the Committee formulated the following demands:—

(1) A minimum wage of £1 a week of 48 hours for adult women engaged on war work, with piece rates as for men.

(2) A three-shift system, or restriction of night work for women to three weeks out of six.

(3) The provision of proper canteens for night workers.

A considerable part of these demands to be included in the recommendations of the Munitions Supply Committee on the remuneration of women.

About 170 delegates were present on Saturday from trades councils, trade unions, the Women's Co-operative Guild, women's suffrage societies, the Women's Liberal League, branches of the Independent Labour party, and other organisations. Three resolutions were set down for discussion, but most of the time was devoted to the first one, which read: No woman shall work now or be retained after the war in engineering shops at less than the recognised trade union rate of wages when employed on work hitherto done by men. Where a recognised trade union rate does not exist the wages should be not les than £1 for a week of 48 hours.

Mrs. Annot E. Robinson moved and Mr. G. K. Grierson seconded this resolution, Mrs. Robinson pointing out that many women in Manchester engineering shops were getting less than 20s. a week. One delegate said that women were wheeling shells at 12s. a week, a job that the ordinary male labourer was paid 25s. for. After appeals from other delegates it was decided to substitute the words "in any trade" for "engineering shops."

Views of Engineers.

During the discussion on this resolution a representative of the Leigh Trades Council, who is the secretary of an engineers' society, said that the engineers had not agreed that women's labour should be retained after the war. The agreement with the Government was that the women should only work during the war. In answer to a question, the delegate said that the engineers after the war were going to weed out the women. This view was opposed by several delegates, who said that women would have to work after the war in the occupations they were now in.

Councillor Titt said he wanted the engineers to recognise that the women were in the shops for ever. The engineers' delegates were trying to create a sex war. Were they going to turn the women into the streets after the war? They could no more stop the increase of women in industry than they could stop the evolution of the machine in industry. An amendment to leave out the reference to conditions after the war was defeated by 63 votes to 53 (most of the male delegates voting with the minority), and the resolution was carried.

The second resolution was carried with two dissentients. As slightly amended it read:—"That a woman displaced by the cessation of the war should receive in addition to any benefit she is entitled to under Part 2 of the Insurance Act, or from her trade union, adequate out-of-work benefit, either till she gets work or for a period to be agreed upon, and that the unemployment benefit should be a charge upon the Government."

Sheffield Independent 20/3/16.

A NEW INDUSTRIAL WORLD.

WOMEN WAR WORKERS AND THE FUTURE.

By Frank Dilnot.

The war is going to set up a number of new conditions in the life of the country, and one of them will be the employment of tens of thousands, perhaps hundreds of thousands, of women in industries previously run by men. The emergency of the war has brought into requisition armies of young women all over the country who have never before worked for their living, and a great many of them have entered into occupations in which they are doing extremely well, not only for employers and themselves but for the community at large. It is impossible that these women will ever be entirely dispossessed and the country will have to make up its mind to the fact. Is it to be conceived that the girls who have been installed at the banks will not continue to be utilised there? It was but the barrier of custom which kept them up till war time from valuable service in these very conservative institutions. Who is there that has seen the very excellent work which the young women do on the railways, whether as booking clerks or ticket collectors, will imagine that they can ever be banished? Those who travel by tram car or omnibus in our big cities, be it Glasgow or Sheffield or London, will bear ready witness to the courtesy and dexterity of the young women conductors, and neither the public nor their employers will want to see their departure. The girls themselves will not want to go.

The Woman Engineer.

Then there are the vast number of young women employed in the munition factories—most of them semi-skilled in a few weeks, and a large number of them really skilled mechanics before the war comes to an end. With the restitution of the engineering business—and the demand on it cannot fail to be tremendous directly the war is over—the skill and aptitude of these young women will find a ready market. It has to be remembered that these war women, belonging not only to the working classes but to the middle classes, have been largely stay-at-home girls, helping in the household, or leading a rather aimless life in a round of petty duties. To many there is a zest in their new existence, to a large proportion there is a new found independence by reason of earnings, to others again there is the satisfaction of helping to support the household instead of being a burden on it. Here, then, are some of the facts of the industrial situation which will certainly be upon us. I daresay there will be difficulties and troubles about the matter, but the one big consideration to be taken into account is whether the huge additional supply of willing intelligent labour is to the advantage of the country or not. It can hardly be denied that it ought to constitute a very great advantage. The increase of productiveness on the one hand, the increase in the wage-earning powers of individual families on the other, provide the obvious answer.

New Times, New Manners.

There are, however, serious incidental questions. What will the trade unions say? Are the men coming back from the war to find themselves out of work because the women have taken their places? Will employers get women to do men's work at less than men's remuneration? Satisfactory answers have got to be found to these questions, and I believe they will be found. Speaking generally the trade union position is that women doing the same work as men should receive the same remuneration, and work under similar conditions. There may be special difficulties in certain trades or in certain localities, but these will probably be capable of accommodation. The main thing the unions will have to meet is the possibility of exploitation of women at the expense of men. Supposing this and the other obstacles were satisfactorily surmounted, there remains the question as to whether there will be sufficient scope for the employment of this new element in our industrial life. I do not think there is any doubt about it for some years ahead—and by that time a general adjustment may have changed the old position.

Scope for British Brains.

Certain developments are inevitable when the war comes to a close. First of all thousands of businesses in this country which have been shut down will have to be reestablished, not merely trading concerns, but manufacturing businesses and big productive establishments. We shall be busy not only providing afresh for ourselves, but also setting up the dismantled Belgium. Many parts of that unfortunate country have literally to be rebuilt, and with all the energy that may be brought to bear the operation will take years. Vast quantities of machinery combat the danger of the fall of the standard rate of wages, the lowering of the standard of life of the workers, and the injury to health of the women workers themselves, the Committee formulated the following demands:—

(1) A minimum wage of £1 a week of 48 hours for adult women engaged on war work, with piece rates as for men.

(2) A three-shift system, or restriction of night work for women to three weeks out of six.

(3) The provision of proper canteens for night workers.

A considerable part of these demands to be included in the recommendations of the Munitions Supply Committee on the remuneration of women.

About 170 delegates were present on Saturday from trades councils, trade unions, the Women's Co-operative Guild, women's suffrage societies, the Women's Liberal League, branches of the Independent Labour party, and other organisations. Three resolutions were set down for discussion, but most of the time was devoted to the first one, which read: No woman shall work now or be retained after the war in engineering shops at less than the recognised trade union rate of wages when employed on work hitherto done by men. Where a recognised trade union rate does not exist the wages should be not les than £1 for a week of 43 hours.

Mrs. Annot E. Robinson moved and Mr. G. K. Grierson seconded this resolution, Mrs. Robinson pointing out that many women in Manchester engineering shops were getting less than 20s. a week. One delegate said that women were wheeling shells at 12s. a week, a job that the ordinary male labourer was paid 25s. for. After appeals from other delegates it was decided to substitute the words "in any trade" for "engineering shops."

Views of Engineers.

During the discussion on this resolution a representative of the Leigh Trades Council, who is the secretary of an engineers' society, said that the engineers had not agreed that women's labour should be retained after the war. The agreement with the Government was that the women should only work during the war. In answer to a question, the delegate said that the engineers after the war were going to weed out the women. This view was opposed by several delegates, who said that women would have to work after the war in the occupations they were now in.

Councillor Titt said he wanted the engineers to recognise that the women were in the shops for ever. The engineers' delegates were trying to create a sex war. Were they going to turn the women into the streets after the war? They could no more stop the increase of women in industry than they could stop the evolution of the machine in industry. An amendment to leave out the reference to conditions after the war was defeated by 63 votes to 53 (most of the male delegates voting with the minority), and the resolution was carried.

The second resolution was carried with two dissentients. As slightly amended it read:—"That a woman displaced by the cessation of the war should receive in addition to any benefit she is entitled to under Part 2 of the Insurance Act, or from her trade union, adequate out-of-work benefit, either till she gets work or for a period to be agreed upon, and that the unemployment benefit should be a charge upon the Government."

viously run by men. The emergency of the war has brought into requisition armies of young women all over the country who have never before worked for their living, and a great many of them have entered into occupations in which they are doing extremely well, not only for employers and themselves but for the community at large. It is impossible that these women will ever be entirely dispossessed and the country will have to make up its mind to the fact. Is it to be conceived that the girls who have been installed at the banks will not continue to be utilised there? It was but the barrier of custom which kept them up till war time from valuable service in these very conservative institutions. Who is there that has seen the very excellent work which the young women do on the railways, whether as booking clerks or ticket collectors, will imagine that they can ever be banished? Those who travel by tram car or omnibus in our big cities, be it Glasgow or Sheffield or London, will bear ready witness to the courtesy and dexterity of the young women conductors, and neither the public nor their employers will want to see their departure. The girls themselves will not want to go.

The Woman Engineer.

Then there are the vast number of young women employed in the munition factories—most of them semi-skilled in a few weeks, and a large number of them really skilled mechanics before the war comes to an end. With the restitution of the engineering business—and the demand on it cannot fail to be tremendous directly the war is over—the skill and aptitude of these young women will find a ready market. It has to be remembered that these war women, belonging not only to the working classes but to the middle classes, have been largely stay-at-home girls, helping in the household, or leading a rather aimless life in a round of petty duties. To many there is a zest in their new existence, to a large proportion there is a new found independence by reason of earnings, to others again there is the satisfaction of helping to support the household instead of being a burden on it. Here, then, are some of the facts of the industrial situation which will certainly be upon us. I daresay there will be difficulties and troubles about the matter, but the one big consideration to be taken into account is whether the huge additional supply of willing intelligent labour is to the advantage of the country or not. It can hardly be denied that it ought to constitute a very great advantage. The increase of productiveness on the one hand, the increase in the wage-earning powers of individual families on the other, provide the obvious answer.

New Times, New Manners.

There are, however, serious incidental questions. What will the trade unions say? Are the men coming back from the war to find themselves out of work because the women have taken their places? Will employers get women to do men's work at less than men's remuneration? Satisfactory answers have got to be found to these questions, and I believe they will be found. Speaking generally the trade union position is that women doing the same work as men should receive the same remuneration, and work under similar conditions. There may be special difficulties in certain trades or in certain localities, but these will probably be capable of accommodation. The main thing the unions will have to meet is the possibility of exploitation of women at the expense of men. Supposing this and the other obstacles were satisfactorily surmounted, there remains the question as to whether there will be sufficient scope for the employment of this new element in our industrial life. I do not think there is any doubt about it for some years ahead—and by that time a general adjustment may have changed the old position.

Scope for British Brains.

Certain developments are inevitable when the war comes to a close. First of all thousands of businesses in this country which have been shut down will have to be re-established, not merely trading concerns, but manufacturing businesses and big productive establishments. We shall be busy not only providing afresh for ourselves, but also setting up the dismantled Belgium. Many parts of that unfortunate country have literally to be rebuilt, and with all the energy that may be brought to bear the operation will take years. Vast quantities of engineering material will be required, manufactured or semi-manufactured goods of many kinds, and probably also large drafts of our skilled workers will be called for. France will be busy with her own re-birth, but it is at least probable that we may be asked to lend a helping hand. Russia is certain to enter on a period of progress such as she has never known, and with her illimitable natural resources there will be more scope than ever not only for British money, but for British brains and British workmanship. All these things together mean an enormous drain on the labour of this country. There is one other factor in the situation, and sad as it is, we must take it into account. Some hundreds of thousands of our brave fellows will be permanently out of action, and their places will have to be filled.

The outlook, therefore, is that the irruption of women labour into our national life will actually meet a want. All those who have learned to labour in these times of stress will be required to rebuild the world afresh when peace comes. There can be no doubt that the organised forces which control our workers will be well advised to survey the problem as it affects themselves at an early date.

Common Cause
24. 3. 16.

The Future of Women War Workers.

At a conference convened by the Manchester Women's War Interests Committee on Saturday, the chief subject of discussion was a resolution that "No woman shall work now or be retained after the war in engineering shops at less than the recognised trade union rate of wages when employed on work hitherto done by men. Where a recognised trade union rate does not exist, the wages shall not be less than £1 for a week of 48 hours." Delegates were present from trades councils, trade unions, the Women's Co-operative Guild, Women's Suffrage Societies, and other organisations.

In moving the resolution, Mrs. Annot Robinson pointed out that many women in Manchester engineering shops were getting less than 20s. a week, and one delegate stated that women were wheeling shells at 12s. a week—work for which the ordinary male labourer was paid 25s. During the discussion a representative of the Leigh Trades Council said that the engineers had not agreed that women's labour should be retained after the war, and were going to weed the women out when the war had come to an end. This view was opposed by several delegates, who said that women would have to work after the war in the occupations they were now in. Councillor Pitt said he wanted the engineers to recognise that the women were in the shops for ever. The engineers' delegates were trying to create a sex war. Did they, he asked, mean to turn the women out into the streets? They could no more stop the increase of women in industry than they could stop the evolution of the machine in industry.

"To Rebuild the World Afresh."

In an article in The Daily News, entitled "A New Industrial World," Mr. Frank Dilnot expresses the same view. Speaking of the armies of young women now employed in industries previously run by men, he says: "It is impossible that these women will ever be entirely dispossessed, and the country will have to make up its mind to the fact." He continues by showing that only the barriers of custom have hitherto kept women out of these industries, and advises trades unions to concentrate on the question of preventing the exploitation of women at the expense of men. In his opinion, there will be sufficient scope for some time to come for women's employment in the new industries, that have been opened to them, and "the irruption of women's labour into our national life will actually meet a want." "All those," he concludes, "who have learned to labour in these times of stress will be required to rebuild the world afresh when peace comes. There can be no doubt that the organised forces which control our workers will be well advised to survey the problem as it affects themselves at an early date."

Daily Dispatch (Manchester)
28.3.16.

WOMEN WORKERS.

The Problem of Their Status After the War.

Interesting remarks on the future of women workers were made by Miss Margaret Ashton, addressing the members of the Manchester and Salford branch of the National Union of Women Workers yesterday.

Many young women of to-day, she said, would not find husbands, and they would have to be self-supporting. Consequently steps ought to be taken by older women to see that they advanced by their abilities as the men advanced by their own abilities, in order that they might take places of trust.

This idea was not one of grasping, but an honest desire to improve the condition of women in facing problems after the war. If they allowed good posts to be filled by women for small remuneration there would be difficulties for the women who sought good posts for a livelihood.

Miss Ashton expressed the view that many of those women who had come out into the world at the call of the nation would not be at all likely or willing to go back to dependence on a male worker. There would be much closer co-operation between men and women in the commercial life of the future than in the past.

Common Cause
24 3 16

702/48

Cambridge.

An interesting meeting was held at Clough Hall, Newnham College, on March 8th, in aid of the British Women's Maternity Unit in Russia. There was a fair audience, in spite of atrocious weather, and £21 was collected, including some donations from absentees. Miss Clough gave an account of the work of the Unit, as reported by Miss Thurstan, with the details of which COMMON CAUSE readers will be already familiar. Mrs. Heitland, President of the C.W.S.A., remarked that a new alliance was being formed between the women of Russia and England.

In the absence of Miss Gladys Rinder, who had been announced to speak, Mrs. Oliver Strachey then gave an address on the "Employment of Women as Affected by the War." She pointed out the danger of shifting employment—e.g., 15,000 women had left the textile factories for munition work, tempted by the higher wages. As a result, the employers were hard put to it to carry out important orders from China which had been placed with English instead of, as formerly, with German firms. Mrs. Strachey gave a most informative account of the new openings, and, in some cases, the excellent wages paid for women's work, some of which might be only temporary; but others might, with wise management and foresight, prove permanent. Among the latter she instanced specially: commercial chemistry, business and advertisement management, dental mechanics, scientific instrument making and tool making, and institutional housekeeping. For many of these training is needed, and the London Suffrage Society from the beginning of the war has specialised in supplying information about training, and has started classes, where they were non-existent, so as to enable women to make the fullest use of present opportunities. Mrs. Strachey urged the formation of a Women's Interests Committee in Cambridge.

Miss Allan, Principal of Homerton College, then gave an all-too-brief account of the appalling condition of education and the culpable indifference of local and even central authorities to the needs of school children. "The education of the working-man's child, like ostrich feathers and cigars, may wait till the war is over!" With 40,000 men teachers gone to the Front, how are vacancies to be filled? Already there was a shortage of teachers before the war; now the superannuated are being pressed into service, as well as the untrained and immature, and yet it was impossible to supply 315 vacanacies in London alone. Children were herded in unwieldy classes, or, worse still, shut out from school altogether below the age of six and left to roam the streets. Boys and girls of tender years were being removed from school to become wage-earners. Already 150 boys of twelve had gone from Cambridge alone.

Evening Standard
29-3-16.

702/49

FROM THE HOME TO THE WORKSHOP.

The Status of Women After the War.

Women's virtues are enjoying a "boom" such as they have never experienced before. Of course, women knew long ago that neither literally nor metaphorically were they intended by nature to sew an eternal "fine seam" and subsist on a diet of strawberries, though unfortunately men, or, at any rate, all men, did not share this view. But the war has altered all that, and woman's "amazing adaptability" and "astonishing capacity" for work and organisation of every description are the subject of naive comment on the part of those least disposed to grant her even the possession of ordinary intelligence in pre-war days.

At the outbreak of hostilities gloomy predictions as to financial and industrial collapse, economic distress, dislocation of labour, and an unprecedented amount of unemployment filled the air. But the prophets have been proved wrong. Never has there been greater activity in the large industries, never have wages been better; and the demands of our own Government and those of our Allies have created opportunities for employment which are even now not adequately filled, and there is scarcely an industry in the country in which women workers are not playing a strenuous and an honourable part.

Public Opinion's Volte Face.

There was a time, not long ago, when a very large number of people maintained that a "woman's place was in the home," but with the entry of women into occupations hitherto closed to them that idea has been decidedly, if gradually, modified, until some of its quite prominent supporters have openly declared that it must be met and combatted. Mrs. Fawcett, who was the principal speaker at a meeting held to consider "The Status of Women After the War" at the Caxton Hall yesterday afternoon, attributed this change to two causes—the whole-hearted enthusiasm with which women of all classes have thrown themselves into active, unselfish work for their country's cause, and the splendid quality of the work which they have shown themselves able to do.

Now, though the value of women's work is universally acknowledged—and, indeed, they are paid the immense compliment of being expected to learn in three or four days work which it takes men in ordinary circumstances weeks to learn—it is scarcely likely that when peace is concluded they will be content to return to their old, pre-war status.

"The general progress of the women's movement," said Mrs. Fawcett, "has been more rapid during the last twenty months than during any period of its history," and she added that the progress had been marked by a corresponding change in public opinion in this country. Reviewing the part played by women since war began, she said that the national necessities, as revealed by the war, had broken down the monstrous injustice by which women had been excluded from earning their living in skilled trades, and that the first-rate work done by women in every department of industry would be bound to make a difference to the professional status of women now that attention had been called to it.

It was clear from Mrs. Fawcett's remarks that she confidently expects that the granting of the Parliamentary franchise to women will be one of the results of the war, and that the awakened sense of nationality will not want to keep women at work merely making lace butterflies for the hair or painting gloire-de-Dijon roses on American leather. M. T. H.

The New Age.
29-6-16.

---

than had I not fought at all. Ah, here comes a letter from you. How well timed, for I was becoming unreadable, was I not?—Shall I, you ask me, have time before leaving England to write any more letters to you? You would like to hear my views on men, women, religion and so on. Men and women! The Alpha and Omega! But really, let me thank you, for I know your request is designedly medicinal. Well, I am an obliging patient, ready to contribute anything to my improvement. As for time!—I must say hospitals move in a procrastinating way their wonders to perform! I have eaten my farewell dinners so often that I am now embarrassed to meet my hosts. However, we are all to be ready to leave at the end of next week. But the week before last it was last week and last week it was this week: so that next week may well be next month if not next year. If therefore I can arrange my thoughts on any of such subjects as you mention you shall have them.—Yours sincerely, ACTON REED.

The Disposal of Disabled Soldiers.

A FEW SUGGESTIONS TOWARDS THE SOLUTION OF THIS PROBLEM, ADDRESSED TO THE GOVERNING CLASS.

By W. Mears.

THE disposal of the human débris created by the war is a question that demands the serious attention of the best minds in this country. Unfortunately, the whole matter has been obscured by a sentimental agitation carried on by an irresponsible baronet, assisted by the disloyal section of the Press. It is most regrettable that such an agitation should be initiated by a member of the one class that has shown no disposition to hamper the successful prosecution of the war by selfish concern for personal interests. If the demand for extravagant pensions for disabled soldiers had been made by the Labour leaders there would have been no danger of any of the cultivated and patriotic members of the community being diverted from the destruction of Prussianism by insidious appeals to their generosity. The one satisfactory feature in this unfortunate affair is the upright conduct of the Labour leaders. They have treated the interests of the disabled soldiers with the same careful consideration for profits that they have shown when dealing with all the other interests of the class they represent. Their patriotism has, not only in this case, but throughout the war, been a standing rebuke to the disloyal section of the working class. The attitude of the bishops and clergy towards those maimed in the war has also been most exemplary, although there is less cause here for any feeling of gratified surprise, as they have never pretended to represent the lower orders, or to be swayed by foolish notions of humanity when profiteering interests are at stake.

It is essential, when considering this problem, that all sentiment should be rigidly suppressed. When the Empire is fighting for its very existence, victory cannot be imperilled by the wasting of national resources on those who can never be of use in the production of profits. Our wealth is not inexhaustible, and if Prussianism is to be utterly destroyed our financial resources

The Status of Women After the War.

Women's virtues are enjoying a "boom" such as they have never experienced before. Of course, women knew long ago that neither literally nor metaphorically were they intended by nature to sew an eternal "fine seam" and subsist on a diet of strawberries, though unfortunately men, or, at any rate, all men, did not share this view. But the war has altered all that, and woman's "amazing adaptability" and "astonishing capacity" for work and organisation of every description are the subject of naive comment on the part of those least disposed to grant her even the possession of ordinary intelligence in pre-war days.

At the outbreak of hostilities gloomy predictions as to financial and industrial collapse, economic distress, dislocation of labour, and an unprecedented amount of unemployment filled the air. But the prophets have been proved wrong. Never has there been greater activity in the large industries, never have wages been better; and the demands of our own Government and those of our Allies have created opportunities for employment which are even now not adequately filled, and there is scarcely an industry in the country in which women workers are not playing a strenuous and an honourable part.

Public Opinion's Volte Face.

There was a time, not long ago, when a very large number of people maintained that a "woman's place was in the home," but with the entry of women into occupations hitherto closed to them that idea has been decidedly, if gradually, modified, until some of its quite prominent supporters have openly declared that it must be met and combatted. Mrs. Fawcett, who was the principal speaker at a meeting held to consider "The Status of Women After the War" at the Caxton Hall yesterday afternoon, attributed this change to two causes—the whole-hearted enthusiasm with which women of all classes have thrown themselves into active, unselfish work for their country's cause, and the splendid quality of the work which they have shown themselves able to do.

Now, though the value of women's work is universally acknowledged—and, indeed, they are paid the immense compliment of being expected to learn in three or four days work which it takes men in ordinary circumstances weeks to learn—it is scarcely likely that when peace is concluded they will be content to return to their old, pre-war status.

"The general progress of the women's movement," said Mrs. Fawcett, "has been more rapid during the last twenty months than during any period of its history," and she added that the progress had been marked by a corresponding change in public opinion in this country. Reviewing the part played by women since war began, she said that the national necessities, as revealed by the war, had broken down the monstrous injustice by which women had been excluded from earning their living in skilled trades, and that the first-rate work done by women in every department of industry would be bound to make a difference to the professional status of women now that attention had been called to it.

It was clear from Mrs. Fawcett's remarks that she confidently expects that the granting of the Parliamentary franchise to women will be one of the results of the war, and that the awakened sense of nationality will not want to keep women at work merely making lace butterflies for the hair or painting gloire-de-Dijon roses on American leather. M. T. H.

The New Age.
29-6-16.

than had I not fought at all. Ah, here comes a letter from you. How well timed, for I was becoming unreadable, was I not?—Shall I, you ask me, have time before leaving England to write any more letters to you? You would like to hear my views on men, women, religion and so on. Men and women! The Alpha and Omega! But really, let me thank you, for I know your request is designedly medicinal. Well, I am an obliging patient, ready to contribute anything to my improvement. As for time!—I must say hospitals move in a procrastinating way their wonders to perform! I have eaten my farewell dinners so often that I am now embarrassed to meet my hosts. However, we are all to be ready to leave at the end of next week. But the week before last it was last week and last week it was this week: so that next week may well be next month if not next year. If therefore I can arrange my thoughts on any of such subjects as you mention you shall have them.—Yours sincerely, ACTON REED.

The Disposal of Disabled Soldiers.

A FEW SUGGESTIONS TOWARDS THE SOLUTION OF THIS PROBLEM, ADDRESSED TO THE GOVERNING CLASS.

By W. Mears.

THE disposal of the human débris created by the war is a question that demands the serious attention of the best minds in this country. Unfortunately, the whole matter has been obscured by a sentimental agitation carried on by an irresponsible baronet, assisted by the disloyal section of the Press. It is most regrettable that such an agitation should be initiated by a member of the one class that has shown no disposition to hamper the successful prosecution of the war by selfish concern for personal interests. If the demand for extravagant pensions for disabled soldiers had been made by the Labour leaders there would have been no danger of any of the cultivated and patriotic members of the community being diverted from the destruction of Prussianism by insidious appeals to their generosity. The one satisfactory feature in this unfortunate affair is the upright conduct of the Labour leaders. They have treated the interests of the disabled soldiers with the same careful consideration for profits that they have shown when dealing with all the other interests of the class they represent. Their patriotism has, not only in this case, but throughout the war, been a standing rebuke to the disloyal section of the working class. The attitude of the bishops and clergy towards those maimed in the war has also been most exemplary, although there is less cause here for any feeling of gratified surprise, as they have never pretended to represent the lower orders, or to be swayed by foolish notions of humanity when profiteering interests are at stake.

It is essential, when considering this problem, that all sentiment should be rigidly suppressed. When the Empire is fighting for its very existence, victory cannot be imperilled by the wasting of national resources on those who can never be of use in the production of profits. Our wealth is not inexhaustible, and if Prussianism is to be utterly destroyed our financial resources must be carefully husbanded. Furthermore, after the war the struggle for trade will be severe, and it is essential that taxation should be as light as possible. Let those who are inclined to receive favourably the demand for extravagant pensions consider the effect of a heavy annual charge for such. It would be impossible to pay all the interest on the national debt. There is no need to press the point further; every patriot knows that the Government stock-holders must obtain their full interest, or the whole capitalist system, which has made the Empire what it is, will be in danger of collapse. P.J.O.

Another aspect of the d[illegible] f[illegible] [illegible]ge pension deserves the careful attention [illegible] [illegible]ptains of in[illegible]dustry. If pensions are gra[illegible]ed libe[illegible]ly there wi[illegible] be thousands of partially disab[illegible]d sold[illegible]rs capable o[illegible] performing some work who w[illegible] be able to live i[illegible] idleness. Now this will have a serious effect on wages If we are to hold our own against foreign competitio[illegible] after the war the present high level of wages must b[illegible] greatly reduced, and it will be difficult to cut dow[illegible] wages if disabled soldiers can live on their pensions No man will work for wages if he can live in any othe[illegible] way. It is, therefore, essential that disabled soldiers glad to get work on any terms, should be thrown o[illegible] the labour market. Besides, if men of the lower order, are permitted to live in idleness it will have a ba[illegible] effect on the working class generally, quite apart fron[illegible] the moral effect on the pensioners themselves. Ther[illegible] is a possibility that some pensioners, relieved from th[illegible] economic control of employers, may become Socialist[illegible] and agitators. The moral effect of idleness on th[illegible] pensioners, however, need not be dealt with here, a[illegible] there is no doubt that the clergy, the economists, and the Labour leaders will do full justice to this question.

Of course, it will be useless to throw the totally disabled soldiers upon the labour market; they woul[illegible] only fill up the workhouses and become a burden t[illegible] the ratepayers. The more logical members of th[illegible] governing class would undoubtedly be glad to dispos[illegible] of them according to recognised profiteering principle and let them starve like worn-out workmen; nor is i[illegible] likely that the English people would do more than pro[illegible]test in a pacific manner. There is, however, a dange[illegible] that the able-bodied soldiers might prove refractor[illegible] out of foolish sentiment for their comrades. Unde[illegible] these circumstances the most suitable method of dealin[illegible] with the commercially useless soldiers would be t[illegible] place them in compounds, where they could be kep[illegible] at a cheaper rate than if pensioned, and their maimed bodies would then cease to be an eyesore to members of the plutocracy travelling about the country.

Another very serious problem will arise if pensions can be claimed by disabled soldiers as a matter of right. The workers in the factories have been told again and again that their service is just as essential towards winning the war as that of the men in the trenches. Now many of the men and women who are making munitions have had their constitutions permanently impaired by overwork, and not a few have been totally disabled. If a soldier can claim a pension as a right, then it is inevitable that a munition-worker will demand one too, and the demand will not stop here, but will extend to all the workers. At a time when the lowe[illegible] orders have been successfully deprived of such rights and privileges that they happened to possess it is surely the height of folly for the governing class to present them with new rights.

There is nothing in the above proposals that is contrary to the morals of a capitalist State. It is almost universally recognised that the profiteering class has the right to impose such conditions of existence as it chooses upon the proletariat. Indeed, the lower orders will, if the above suggestions are carried out, be much better treated than they have any right to expect according to those principles of profiteering which few of them deny.

It will have been observed that no suggestions have been made as to pensions for the widows of soldiers. There is not the slightest likelihood of any member of the governing class being so foolish as to reduce the numbers of a type of labour so cheap, unorganised, and so easily exploited.

Now that the true aspect of the matter has been pu[illegible] before them there can be no doubt that our rulers wil[illegible] deal with the pensions question in a manner beneficia[illegible] to themselves. Whatever solution they adopt they can rest assured that there are plenty of journalists and others ready to persuade the public that the interests of the profiteers are the interests of all true patriots.

Bath & Wilts Chronicle
March 29 1916

702/50

AFTER-WAR PROBLEMS

UNDER-PAID WOMEN WORKERS

THE DANGER TO MALE LABOUR

Members of the Bath branches of the Christian Social Union and the National Union of Women Workers held a joint meeting in the Guildhall on Tuesday evening to consider the industrial and civic position of women after the war, the subject being introduced by Miss Councillor Margaret Ashton, of Manchester. The Mayoress (Mrs. H. T. Hatt), who is president of the Bath branch of the N.U.W.W., took the chair, and among others present were the Rev. R. C. L. Reade (president, Bath branch, C.S.U.), Lady Lawrence, Mrs. Long, the Misses King, Miss M. L. Morris (secretary, Bath branch, N.U.W.W.), Miss Philipps (secretary, Bath branch, C.S.U.), Miss Hatt, Miss Ellis, etc.

WOMEN WORKERS AFTER THE WAR.

Miss Ashton said that after the war they would be face to face with a great many new industrial problems, and they must be ready to face them. They would have all the war industries—munitions, clothing, boots and other leather work, etc.—stopping. Army expenditure would be cut almost as with a knife. It would be impossible to allow women who had been taking men's work to be "scrapped" merely because the men had returned. The Government was making proposals for the redrafting of the men back into their occupations, but women, who had been called out owing to the war, to help the trades and industries going, were entitled to Government consideration and to sustenance while they were turning round and trying to adjust themselves to the new conditions. They were entitled as much to consideration as the men were; they had done their national service, which was just as essential for the national well-being as was the fighting of the men at the front.

WOMEN'S LOWER WAGES.

One of the great difficulties was that they could never persuade employers that women were worthy of the same wage as men. It was an age-long tradition that a woman, because she was a woman, must be paid less than a man, when she did the same work and turned out exactly the same amount. It was an awfully degrading fact that in only one profession—the medical profession—and in only one industry—Cotton spinning—were men and women paid the same for the same work. With such low payments to women for skilled work it would be almost impossible to reinstate the men and keep their wages up to what was a living wage before the war because there would be that power of undercutting them by the skilled, underpaid labour of women. Women's war interests committees had been formed to see how they could meet what would become absolute tragedy later on. She indicated the enormous differences—34s. and 14s.—between men's and women's wages in munition work, and asserted that the difference went into the employers' pockets and was robbed from the families of those at the front whose women were working in their places. She predicted that when the men came back fault would in many cases be found with their work, that their services would in a short time be dispensed with, and that women would be appointed to take their places on scandalously low wages. In these days when so many women were self-supporting, and when after the war there would be so many more women who would have to be self-supporting owing to so many of their men having been killed, it was more than ever necessary that they should recognise that payment should be made for the work done and not for the sex of the worker. Women, Miss Ashton said, worked at higher pressure and much more rapidly than men, but they could not work as long hours as men, who went slower. She emphasised that if they lowered wages by letting in low-paid labour they were demoralising family life and injuring the whole fabric of the State.

CLASSES MOST AFFECTED BY THE WAR.

The industrial and working classes were suffering most by the war, because more men in those classes were being killed, injured, and maimed, and their wives and families were suffering partly because there was less money coming in; partly because women were dragged out of the home to help in national service in munition factories; and partly because Education Committees were taking less care of the children by stopping free meals and letting children run wild in the streets more than they did. Women would be the heads of families, and they must be paid a rate which would enable to make provision for their children at home. Women must come out and take a much larger share in civic life, for on Councils they missed the woman's care, the motherly suggestion and intuition. She described the Government as the worst employer of female labour, and strongly urged that no woman munition worker who was not ready to be put on piecework should receive less than £1 per week and that women should not overwork themselves, as many were doing, in order to earn big money, for eventually there must be more or less a breakdown, a lowering of their average output, and thus an injury to the national service. In conclusion, she suggested that societies such as theirs might do excellent work by taking up such questions and offering suggestions for the reconstruction of industry after the war.

General discussion as to the conditions of women's work and their wages ensued, and the argument was advanced that if women had votes many of the existing unfair conditions under which women worked and the general sex disability in the labour market would disappear.

On the motion of the Rev. R. C. L. Reade, seconded by Lady Lawrence, Miss Ashton and the Mayoress were cordially thanked.

Tramway & Railway World
7-10.

WOMEN'S EMPLOYMENT AFTER THE WAR.

The Board of Trade Advisory Committee on Women's War Employment (Industrial), in a pamphlet issued for the use of their local committees, urge that difficult questions, such as the reinstatement of enlisted men after the war, the limitation of the new employment of women to the duration of the present emergency, and the like, should not be deferred, but faced immediately and settled by the employers and the workers at once.

At the congress of the Tramways and Light Railways Association on June 30, the Hon. Arthur Stanley, chairman of the Council, expressed the opinion that women would not generally be suitable as drivers. Several speakers observed that if women were to take the places of motormen who are being called to the colours, the cars should be equipped with air brakes.

Testimony was given at the congress to the endurance of the young women, over a thousand in number, now working as conductors on motor omnibuses of the L.G.O. Company. Mr. H. E. Blain, the operating superintendent, stated that only 37 had had to give up the work, from which the remainder appeared to derive physical benefit, judging by the number of instances in which larger size uniforms were soon required.

Daily Mail
1-4-16.

1916
April.

Daily Express.
20.4.16.

THE WOMEN WORKERS.

"Are you being paid?" some of the workers in one factory turning out munitions asked a newcomer, a woman who was busy at a bench. The woman looked up with a smile. "No," she said, "I am working because I want to help the country." "Umph," grunted one of her questioners, "you wouldn't work half as hard as you're doing if you were paid." I am not going so far as to say this is a typical incident, but it is certainly suggestive of much. The women workers, volunteer and others, who are going into our factories are revolutionising many of the old conditions there. The old rules, "Never do owt for nowt" and "Get as much as you can for as little as you can do," do not count with them. The new woman in the factory works hard, works honestly, and in some cases of repetition work she is making the machines produce quantities unheard of in this country before. The women do not understand the policy of ca' canny. What they do understand is that England wants munitions and they are going to produce them. The workmen and the workmen's organisations, which imagined that after the war was over things would go back to exactly the old conditions, will find themselves very much mistaken. Things cannot go back to the old way any more than we can live yesterday to-morrow. The new spirit that has come into the factories owing to the necessities of the war is going to be most useful to us in the years ahead. When the war is over the great battle for the world's trade will have to be fought and English factories will be better equipped, better controlled, and better managed than ever before to fight for their share of it. There is one point, however, in which one is bound to sympathise with the old workers. It is for the women to see that their coming into callings formerly kept for men does not lower the standard of wages and living.

Common Cause
14.4.16.

Surrey, Sussex, and Hants Federation.

GUILDFORD.—For two months, Mrs. Hartree has superintended a working-party for the Scottish Hospitals, through which we have obtained several new members and kept on old ones. Mrs. Green, of Dr. Hutchison's staff, paid us a visit, and related her experience of the awful retreat from Serbia before Christmas. Immediately after the Council, the starting of a "Women's Interests Committee" was discussed at a meeting with some Trades Union leaders. Almost at the same time an appeal from the National Federation of Women Workers for help towards the organisation of women munition workers gave us an object for which to work. A committee has been formed, supported apathetically by women workers, but strongly by men. We hope to hold a public meeting, with Miss Bondfield as speaker, on April 19th, with the Secretaries of the principal Trade Unions present. Many contributions are hoped for to a jumble sale, to be held shortly at the office.

WOMEN AND THEIR WORK.

BRAINS FOR THE TRADE AFTER THE WAR.

Women do not perhaps fully realise how very much good work they can do for the Empire through their influence on trade, nor what opportunities are possible to the woman with a keen brain and good business qualities. At a meeting held at the Connaught Rooms recently by the Association of Advertising Women, Miss Carey gave an excellent address on "Trade After the War, and how British women can help."

She stated that the withdrawal of men on all sides for military purposes has left gaps which must be filled by women. The trade of the country must be kept going, and in countless instances there are essential articles which are made by one firm only in this country, and when the war is over these goods will again be imported from Germany if we cannot supply enough ourselves.

This can be remedied if women will encourage home industries now, demand British goods, and turn the trade of the Empire into an export trade after the war. Here all women can do much to help. They are the purchasers, and can demand only British-made goods. In the advertising world women can bring together home industries and the buyers of the world. There are shipping difficulties now, but orders are placed far in advance, and now is the time to create a desire to trade with England throughout other lands.

A discussion followed regarding the economic conditions of our own and other countries, and an interesting point was raised by the revival of the suffrage question, to which Miss Carey replied that women must prove that they are capable of governing by first governing large business enterprises, unaided by men's brains or capital—a proof which has not yet been given.

Any advertising or business women who would like to know the conditions of membership of the Association of Advertising Women are cordially invited to apply to the secretary, 66, Avenue-chambers, Bloomsbury-square. A special room for members' use during the day has been engaged in the West End, and the work of the association is now being widely developed under the presidency of Mrs. A. M. Mortimer.

ON THE REGISTER.

We give below particulars of some vacant posts that offer good prospects to suitable applicants. All applications should be addressed to the Secretary, Women's Employment, "Daily Express," 23, St. Bride-street, E.C., and must be accompanied by a stamped addressed envelope.

1. Well trained fifth housemaid (seven kept and basement maid) for establishment of titled lady in Bedfordshire, where there are twelve convalescent officers and five nurses. Wages £20 and 4s. 6d. per week for beer and washing.
2. Vacancy in nobleman's establishment for soldier's widow or otherwise if respectable and reliable. Required to do men servants' rooms, housekeeper's sitting-room, to help wash up in still room, etc. Not too young; take one been general. State wages. Staffs.
3. Good opening for under-laundrymaid in cottage laundry connected with large private establishment. Six laundrymaids in all, and required to do the housework of the cottage and cooking for the staff. Wages £16, with 13s. per week board wages, milk and vegetables found. Beds.

Common Cause
12.4.16

PROTECTION OF THE MALE WAGE-EARNER.

MADAM,—I hope you will excuse the liberty I take in calling your attention to the action of the Government and trade unions. The Government are giving signed guarantees to men's unions that their respective trades will receive Government protection after the war against the occupation of women. It seems likely, if women are not very vigilant, their economic and industrial position will be in a worse state after the war than before. Such Government guarantees could be interpreted to women's disaster. Besides, it looks like now exploiting women.

WORKING WOMAN.

Express & Echo Exeter 5-4-16

702/52

AFTER WAR PROBLEMS

Christian Social Union Meeting at Exeter

FORCEFUL ADDRESS

Chancellor Pryke presided last night at the annual meeting of the Exeter branch of the Christian Social Union, held at the Oddfellows Hall.

The Chancellor, in opening the meeting, alluded to the address which was to be given by the Rev. A. J. Carlyle, D. Litt., lecturer in economics and political philosophy, of the University College, Oxford, on "The need of preparation for the social and industrial conditions at the end of the war." He said while they could not say when the end of the war would be, and what kind of peace would result, they ought to think seriously of the probabilities and possibilities that would arise, and endeavour to meet them in a Christian spirit. The more they prepared themselves by careful thought to consider these things in the spirit of the Christian Social Union, the better their chances would of meeting them successfully.

The Rev. A. J. Carlyle, in the course of his address, remarked that he was not quite sure that in the last thirty years we had not been growing rich too quickly. The accumulation of wealth in that period had been almost fabulous. It had grown a good deal faster than was good for their morals, and even than was good for their manners. It was probably that one of the problems to be faced after the war would be comparative poverty among the middle classes, while also there would be unemployment among the labouring classes, such as they had not experienced in their time. They must provide for this. A good deal could be done locally by the resumption of public works which had been suspended. He did not mean the inauguration of relief works, because these were not only useless but demoralising. What they should do was to carry out works of public utility, and not by loafers, but by people competent to do the work. They must make a call for skilled labour of all kinds. Provision, too, would have to be made for the soldiers and sailors. It rested with them to see that these poor fellows could make their lives real and useful again for themselves and for the community. Then the agricultural problem would face them again. Large numbers of the agricultural labourers in the Southern Counties, at any rate, would not come back to the land unless the inducements were better than before. They would go to the towns or emigrate, and while he would say nothing against emigration, they would after the war want every capable man at home. The most serious question, however, would be the industrial relations after the war. Instead of being more united they might find themselves more disunited. They knew that industrial troubles existed before the war broke out, and if the war had not come they would have had in the winter of 1914-15 far more serious industrial complications. The war, however, acted as a charm; it brought home to them that there were great common interests, and their disputes disappeared like magic. The Factory Acts were suspended, and the machinery of the Trades Unions were set aside for the time being. This was the last and the greatest sacrifice of the Trades Unions. What would happen when the war was over. In the first place the Government were pledged to restore the normal conditions existing previously. It was a solemn pledge that the whole system of the Trades Unions should be replaced exactly as it was before, and it would have to be done whether some people liked it or not. But if the pre-war conditions were restored it did not mean that they would be continued. He believed there would be a great effort by the employing classes to get the regulations altered or abolished, and there would be a plausible case for that. The country would be poorer, and the case for the removal of every obstacle to the volume of production would be very great. They had seen it was possible for the half-skilled man to do a great deal of the work formerly done by the skilled man, and that a great deal of work, hitherto done by men, could be done by women. They had discovered unknown resources of industry in this country—resources of employable persons which they never suspected—and no reasonable person would maintain that these lessons should go unheeded. They would not be able to maintain themselves under the old conditions, and therefore he did not doubt an effort would be made to change them. That would probably mean a violent conflict. Trade Unions would not surrender their regulations unless there was something better to offer them; they would only do it by economic force or the discovery of a better method. Middle-class people had had a singularly inadequate idea of what those regulations meant. They took a middle-class view of things, and their notion of the situation was by no means founded on knowledge, but largely on the fact that they paid attention to one aspect of the question that these regulations were restrictions on production. Directly they obviously were, but take the case of the restriction of the output of machinery. They must limit the machinery to the capacity of the man who worked it. The measure of the limitation must be the capacity of the man to keep pace with the machine at his highest continuous efficiency. It was clear, therefore, that some limitation was necessary in the interest of the health, the very life, of the wage earner. A man could work up to a certain pace and keep his health and capacity, but to drive him beyond that would be to destroy the man. So, in asking for a limitation, the Trade Unions acted in the interest of the worker and in the highest interest of the State itself. With regard to unskilled men doing the work of the skilled men, the skilled workers had built up for themselves a certain standard of life. That standard had been minimised by men coming in who had not got that skill, and the delimitation conditions were really intended to secure a standard of life for the unskilled as well as for the skilled men. These regulations were not only reasonable, but necessary. It was quite true they had been abused and perverted in various ways, but that merely showed that Trades Unions were composed of men and women who, as in other walks of life, were possessed of different tempers and desires. It was no argument for the abolition of the regulations, and the Trades Unions would never consent to their being abolished. But he did anticipate that, after the war, there would be a great effort to change them. Therefore they were faced with a renewal of the social conflicts in a much more aggravated form. The probabilities were, therefore, that unless something could be done they must look forward to a period far more acute than any they had seen in their time. They had been content to allow their whole system of industry to be founded upon a conflict of interests, in which the masters on the one side, and the men on the other, armed and protected themselves against each other. That was what was bluntly called a class war. Masters had been in the habit of working their men unduly, and the men had insisted on conditions which made it impossible for the masters to carry on their industries efficiently. Were they to hope for anything better, or were they to return to the menace of a great controversy? There was no short and easy way out of the difficulty. He hoped, in some measure, that Englishmen who had during the war consented to lay aside their quarrels and stand side by side in their grief and trouble, would find they had been drawn together by bonds of sympathy and good feeling. He hoped that with all the evils the war had brought, it had taught them something they would not forget in this direction. But they must not rely too much on these things. When men were put back into the old conditions, and face to face with the old grievances, how easily and quickly all these better instincts might be forgotten. He noticed there had appeared in an unlikely quarter a movement that was not without hope. They had had some experience of the co-operative system, but whatever might have been the merits of it, the scheme had not managed to get hold of the people. But the principle lying behind the co-operative and profit-sharing system was a good one, and was it impossible that after the war they would recognise that the wage-earner was entitled to his share and control in the industry? Syndicalism had been regarded as an extravagant form of revolution. He thought the air was clearing, and they were beginning to see that behind it all was something not revolutionary at all. It was a demand for recognition that in industry every mature person was entitled to have his voice, to look upon the business in which he was concerned as something of which he was not a machine, but that something of it belonged to him. He did not suggest any panacea for the difficulties to which he had referred. He did not think the remedy was to be found in any one direction. The solution would be found when they all seriously and earnestly desired to find it, and were ready to make sacrifices to that end. When once they appreciated that the industrial system of the last hundred years was accursed and intolerable, and that it was not human that men should live as enemies when they ought to live as brothers and friends, there were thousands of lines of progress towards which they might set their faces.

A vote of thanks to Dr. Carlyle was passed, and subsequently the officers of the branch of the Christian Social Union were elected.

The Common Cause
7.4.16
702/51
666
702
266

The Status of Women After the War.

Speaking last week at Caxton Hall, at a meeting organised by the Women Writers' Suffrage League, on "The Status of Women After the War," Mrs. Fawcett expressed her belief that the progress of the Women's Movement had been much more rapid in the last twenty months than during any similar period of its previous history. Taking actually accomplished political facts, full Suffrage and eligibility had been won in Denmark, Iceland, and Manitoba, and there was a confident prospect of it in Alberta and Saskatchewan. There was also evidence of progress and marked change of public opinion in our own country. The tone of the Press had improved. Every newspaper was teeming with appreciation of the patriotic enthusiasm of women and the excellence of their work; many papers had avowed their conviction that Women's Suffrage must be conceded, and many well-known anti-Suffragists had courageously avowed a complete change in their opinions.

Mrs. Fawcett attributed this change mainly to two causes: first, the whole-hearted enthusiasm with which women of all classes had thrown themselves into active, unselfish work for their country; secondly, the splendid quality of the work which they had shown themselves able to do. This was, of course, no surprise to Suffragists, who had always known that the national habit of not employing to anything like their full extent the industrial and professional capacities of women was a waste of national resources and the worst kind of national extravagance. So long ago as August, 1914, the Executive Committee of the National Union had approached the War Office authorities with regard to training women in order that they might be able to take men's places in certain employments during the war, but their suggestion had been absolutely disregarded. If this advice had been taken women would have had many extra months for training in the various kinds of occupations which they were now being urgently pressed to undertake. Even now, notwithstanding the recommendations of the Royal Commission on the Civil Service, no steps had been taken by the Government to open the higher posts of responsibility to women in the Civil Service. There was trade unionism in high places as well as trade unionism in the workshop.

Passing to the question of women's position in the future, Mrs. Fawcett said that she did not believe there would be the "sex war" that some people were prophesying. The same faculties, both material and spiritual, which had enabled people successfully to overcome the difficulties of the early part of the war would enable them to face the industrial problems which would arise after the war. On the material side, it must be realised that the nation is not made rich by keeping the female half of it doing work much below its natural capacity and ability, but by making full use of all resources and by being alive to the new wants of the world. On the spiritual side, a sense of brotherhood and common aims had been greatly strengthened by the experiences of the war, between men and women and between employer and employed.

After reviewing some of the splendid work that had been done by women during the war—notably that of the N.U.W.S.S. Scottish Women's Hospitals—Mrs. Fawcett expressed her belief that all this first-rate work, and the popular attention which had been drawn to it, must make an enormous difference to the professional status of women. When they knocked again, as they assuredly would, at the doors of the legal and other professions they would not find the same dull, stupid resistance to their demands which they had found up to the present. The same line of reasoning applied to women in the industrial world. The national necessities of the war had led to an industrial revolution, which was probably as great and as important as the breakdown of serfdom and villeinage in the fourteenth century caused by the Black Death. Women were no longer being kept out of the skilled trades—as they have been in the past—but were being urged on all sides to enter them. They had shown, as The Round Table (March, 1916) puts it, "an adaptability and capacity which has upset many cherished beliefs and undoubtedly made a deep impression on the public mind." After the war it would be necessary for us as a nation to use to the utmost our productive capacity, and it would be more than ever evident that it was a suicidal policy to shut women out from occupations in which they had shown their capacity to do good work. They could never go back into the industrial serfdom of the past, and this in itself would have an immense influence not only on national welfare but also on their political status.

The experiences of the war had, Mrs. Fawcett thought, brought us far nearer to the realisation of our hopes about the franchise than we had ever been before.

8. 4. 16

702/52

THE PREVENTION OF UNEMPLOYMENT AFTER THE WAR.

[By FREDERICK ROCKELL.]

IV.—Spending and Employment.

If it be true that the under-consumption of commodities is a prime cause of unemployment, it logically follows that the time when it is most necessary to spend lavishly is at the very moment when the danger of widespread unemployment is to be apprehended. In other words, and in emphatic words, the cure for unemployment is to spend money.

In the past, this common-sense axiom has been so much disputed by orthodox economists, that I am glad to be able to present an influential body of opinion in support of this axiom.

It will be remembered that when the war broke out, the greatest danger which was apprehended in these islands was from widespread distress due to unemployment. In those first days of the war, before our naval supremacy was assured, it was feared that the shortage of raw materials, and the difficulty of exporting our manufactures would cause works to be shut down and thus create a scarcity of employment. The very fear that this would happen accentuated the danger. For any expectancy of being thrown out of work—and that expectancy was pretty general—is a natural inducement to husband one's resources. If a man expects to be thrown out of work next week, he will defer buying that carpet he had promised his wife, or the piano he meant to buy for his children. He will make the old overcoat do, and his wife will postpone the joy of buying a new bonnet. And such a general postponement of making purchases must, it is obvious, hasten the closing down of the factories where these articles are made.

This danger was at once seen by some of the wiser heads in the community, and I here propose to quote some of the advice given by eminent people on how to prevent unemployment. That danger was averted, as we know; but the advice will equally apply to the new danger of unemployment which will arise after the war.

First, then, let me quote Mr. John Burns, who, after resigning from the Cabinet, was made chairman of the sub-committee appointed by the Local Government Board to advise the Government as to the prevention and relief of distress. In a memorandum issued upon unemployment in the furniture trade, Mr. John Burns endorsed the advice given to public authorities and religious bodies and all bodies and persons having control of town halls, churches, libraries, assembly rooms, and institutions—> to at once place orders for any renewal of furniture which would be needed in the next few months, and for any renovating, french polishing, re-upholstering, and similar work which would improve their premises.

Speaking for himself, Mr. John Burns said, in conclusion:—

> I hope that the great army of ordinary householders will not only have their renovating done now rather than next spring, but will also resume the buying of furniture, thus encouraging the retailer to restore his stocks to normal proportions.

Let me next quote the Hon. Pember Reeves (the director of the School of Economics). Speaking to an interviewer, he said:—

> The greatest service a man with a fixed income can do is to go on living as he has done, and spend at least as much as he did before. The important thing is to remember that you may easily carry saving too far at a juncture like this. The great service the ordinary man can render the community is to spend wisely, and so maintain employment.

It is necessary to remark here, that these pieces of advice I am quoting do not refer to the present time, when employment is plentiful, and the need is for more saving rather than for more spending. Keeping in mind, therefore, that these admonitions were made at a time when a veritable avalanche of unemployment was threatening, I may next refer to an article written by Miss Mary Macarthur, in the "Daily News," where, after summarising the records, at the beginning of the war, of unemployment and short time in numerous industries which largely employed women, she made this emphatic pronouncement:—

> The important thing, when all is said and done, is not to devise all manner of new-fangled proposals, for the prevention of unemployment, but to see how best demand can be maintained and the ordinary wheels of industry kept running.

To advise that demand should be maintained is to advise the spending of money; advice which was thus picturesquely enforced by Mr. W. L. George, one of the most promising of our modern writers on social questions. Said Mr. George:

> The remedy for unemployment is to spend freely. Men and women who decide to forego the new hat, the autumn lounge suit, who make their evening clothes "do until the war is over," are hurrying our trade to its doom. They must buy as many clothes as ever—buy more, if only to give Shoreditch and the Isle of Harris something to do. Spend and spend more, is a good motto for the coming months. Let the young couple not hesitate; there is no waste at all on the purchases of furniture, linen, plate, and kitchen goods which are wanted for their home.

Lest some of my readers should think that all this advice was superfluous, particularly now that the cry is all for retrenchment, let me remind them that it was partly because this advice was given and acted upon that serious unemployment was prevented; the other reason being that the rapidly increasing demands of the War Office for men absorbed those that were thrown out of work.

I cannot do better than end this chapter by quoting from Mr. and Mrs. Sidney Webb, who, I believe, were the very first, after the war started, to point out the right way of preventing unemployment. For in the "Daily News" of August 6th, 1914, two or three days after war was declared, an article appeared by Mr. Robert Lynd, giving an account of an interview with Mr. and Mrs. Sidney Webb. Said Mr. Webb:—

> The key to the whole situation is the prevention of unemployment. Make sure that people go on getting their wages. Keep people from being thrown out of employment. That is the vital thing.

And how prevent unemployment? Mr. Webb made many suggestions. Here is one which urged more spending:—

> If there are any public works to be undertaken, let them be undertaken now, and not postponed till the war is over. This is the time for public bodies not to save money, but to spend it.

This is the important thing, in our investigation, to bear in mind. It is of no use waiting until a serious state of unemployment is in our midst, and then trying to relieve it. Our plans must be well laid in advance, so that there shall not be any unemployment to be relieved.

South London Press
London Rd
14.4.16

WOMEN WORKERS AFTER THE WAR

Dr. Marion Phillips and Some Problems That Will Arise.

EQUAL WAGES FOR EQUAL WORK.

In her address to the South London Ethical Society on Sunday evening at the Surrey Masonic Hall, Camberwell Newrd., Dr. Marion Phillips dealt lucidly and cogently with the problem of "Women Workers after the War."

The lecturer described how, after a short spell of serious unemployment in the luxury trades caused by the outbreak of war, large numbers of women were absorbed by the trades supplying the Army and Navy with clothing, food and munitions, a considerable proportion being drafted into trades which so far had been exclusively in the hands of men. In her opinion the problem which we shall have to face after the war, and which it behoves us to study and prepare for now, will not be so much one of finding new work for the women whose places will be claimed by the men returning from the war, but mainly one of readjusting the conditions of employment with a view to averting grave social disorders and a ruinous competitive struggle between men and women.

Dr. Phillips emphasised the imperative necessity of an enlightened policy of reorganising industry with a view to increasing the productive power of the mass of the workers, since only by these means will it be possible to repair the enormous wastage of war and to avoid a period of economic depression. She condemned as impracticable and retrograde all suggestions to revert to old manufacturing processes and scrap new machinery which has been introduced since the beginning of the war in order to speed up production and utilise unskilled and semi-skilled labour.

While fully sympathising with the position of trade unionists who, at the price of tremendous struggles and sacrifices have won recognition for a number of rules and safeguards regulating output and conditions of work, and whilst deprecating any attempt to pull down the standard of living won in this manner by the men's trade unions, by using women's labour to undercut men's wages, Dr. Phillips is against the policy of excluding women from any trade for which women are physically fitted. She hopes that the efforts of both men and women will be directed towards securing equal wages for equal work and a legal minimum wages both for men and women. She also advocates a widening of trade union organisation so as to include all the various grades of labour in one particular industry, and last, but not least, she hopes that the workers will be given a share of responsibility in the management of the industry they are engaged in.

The hope of the future lies in human solidarity, in the substitution of co-operation for the bitter class struggles of the past and in a greater regard on the part of both employers and workers for the good of the whole community.

Railway Review. 19.5.16.

702/54

FEMALE LABOUR.

SIR,—In the report of the first full meeting of the Triple Alliance, published in the "Review" this week, I notice that among their decisions was the following: "That all workers, whether men or women, who have been employed as substitutes shall be on their disemployment provided with other work at the standard living rate or with full maintenance by the State."

Now, Sir, I submit to you that, so far as the women are concerned, this requires a little explanation. In the first place, I suppose the miners or transport workers will hardly be affected so far as the invasion of women in their ranks are concerned, at least, most certainly not to be compared with the railways, therefore it most directly concerns us as railwaymen. Let us examine the position. We have always been given to understand that the women were engaged only for the duration of the war, and that the men who had gone to the colours, and whose places had been temporarily filled, were to get their jobs back again after the war. Now, that seemed to be fair enough, but according to the above decision of the Triple Alliance they, to my mind, are not going to improve matters, but rather complicate them by their action. For instance, if when a man comes back to his work from the Army and the women have to be found another job it is 99 chances to one that the job found for her would be one which was usually occupied by a man before the war. The companies or the Government would simply have to make positions for them at the exploitation of the male sex. This would be robbing Peter to pay Paul.

The alternative to this, according to the Triple Alliance, is that the women are to receive State grants. Paid by whom? By the workers, of course, thus increasing the taxation! This may be all right, and, on the other hand, it may not. I venture to suggest a little explanation would be acceptable on this point, but I would like to draw attention to the fact that to my knowledge a great number of the women employed on the railways, "arising out of the war," are in fairly comfortable financial circumstances. Some are soldiers' wives in receipt of allowance, the husbands of others are working on munitions making good money, while a large portion are single women. (Note.—Railwaymen's widows are conspicuous by their absence.) This being so, I do not think it necessary to provide them with either other jobs or State allowance. These women are reaping their harvest now, and, in justice to them, I do no think they wish to exploit the position after the war, which is just what would happen if the decision of the Triple Alliance in connection with women on the railways were allowed to materialise.—Yours, etc.,

R. WATSON,
Chairman, Liverpool No. 4 Branch.

Daily Dispatch
2.6.16.

WOMEN IN INDUSTRY.

Problem of the 2,500,000 Workers.

To the Editor of the Daily Dispatch.

SIR,—It is stated that over two and a half million women and girls are now engaged on munitions work, and there is already indications that a large number of them will desire to hold on to their work after the war. I am not accusing any section of lack of patriotism, but already, through their organisations, they are indicating that this contention will be put forward.

Obviously the invasion of the labour market by women will continue, for whatever happens there will be an increasing number for whom marriage cannot solve the difficulty. It is therefore necessary that their place in industry should be understood, and if very regrettable trouble is to be avoided when the soldiers return to civil employment, trade unions must define that position in the working world and adjust their regulations to admit of women and men working amicably side by side, and without the one taking an unfair advantage of the other.

St. Helens. TRADE UNIONIST.

Newcastle Journal 10-4-16.

READJUSTMENT OF LABOUR.

WOMEN'S WORK AFTER THE WAR.

Dr Ethel Williams presided over an adjourned conference of the Newcastle Women's War Interests Committee, held at the Burt Hall, Northumberland Road, on Saturday afternoon, to consider the position of women in the readjustment of labour after the war.

At the outset, Dr Williams said that they would all recognise the difficulties under which that committee laboured. They were trying to meet a series of emergencies which would involve the trade unions and labour interests generally. Therefore, the committee asked for forbearance in their inexperience, and for help to enable them to go forward and surmount the difficulties before them.

They knew that women were filling positions they had never filled before, and were creating difficulties for themselves and for the men, and unless they joined together she felt certain that they would sharpen for the hands of the capitalist a two-edged weapon which would fall on men and women alike. In the absence of Mrs Simm, Miss Andrew moved: "That this conference urged the Education Department to take into consideration schemes for the technical training—with a maintenance allowance—of boys and girls between 14 and 16 years of age, such schemes to be financed partly by the Department, partly locally.

Mr Lough of the ShopAssistants' Union seconded.

Mr Drake (Class Teachers' Association) moved as an amendment: "That this Conference, recognising the supreme need for the fullest development and most complete organisation of the brains of the nation, demands that the Board of Education and the local education authorities take immediate steps to provide full-time secondary education up to the age of 16 for all children who pass through the primary schools, maintenance to be made from the public funds where necessary; and, further, urges the Board of Education and the local education authorities to take into consideration schemes for the continued day education of boys and girls who have entered the ranks of industry, such day continuation schools to provide sufficient technical education which ought to be in close touch with the industries in which the pupils were engaged."

Mr Basket, Shop Assistants' Union, seconded. The amendment was carried by a large majority.

702/53 Daily Express. 19.6.16.

LABOUR AFTER THE WAR.

Mr. Steel Maitland is right in insisting that preparations should be begun at once for dealing with the labour problems that must follow the war. There must be difference of opinion concerning the steps that should be taken. There can be no doubt that the nation has two insistent duties. The first is to secure for the disabled and partially disabled soldiers at least the same standard of comfort that they enjoyed before joining the colours. The second is to ensure for the men who have passed physically unscathed through the ordeal of battle their old places in the industrial ranks. Victory would itself be shameful if it were purchased with misery and discomfort for the men who have risked their lives for those of us whose lot it is to stay at home. At present, thanks to the number of men in the Army and to the enormous requirements of the Government, the demand for labour exceeds the supply. These extraordinary Government orders will cease with the war, and the day after the Army is disbanded the labour market will be flooded. The question of the employment of women complicates the problem. Women are now doing work formerly monopolised by men, and generally they are doing it very well. We do not believe that more than a small proportion of these women will be willing to abandon comparatively good wages for the pittance of domesticity. In considering the future the permanent competition of women must be borne in mind, with the consequent economic necessity of the equal wage.

It is obviously the duty of private employers and public authorities to postpone new enterprises until after peace, whenever that is practicable. This cannot be a solution of the difficulty, but it would certainly be what the Fabians used to call a "palliative." The real problem will be the provision of many more adequately paid jobs than existed before the war. The Overseas Dominions want men. It is, too, a matter of common agreement that the land in Great Britain might support thousands more men if some workmanlike scheme of home colonisation could be agreed upon. Many soldiers who used to work in factories will have determined to spend the remainder of their days in the open air, and from their ranks the colonists for Canada and the English counties will be drawn. Others will be eager for their old work. The trade unions have shown a splendid patriotism in modifying their rules to meet the national emergency. They have done so on the definite pledge that the rules shall all be restored after the war. The aim of trade unionism has been to ensure employment at a maximum wage for the maximum number of workers, and they have quite openly advocated a restriction of the output of the individual worker. In view of the large number of men for whom work must be found, this restriction will inevitably be again demanded—possibly with fatal results in face of the necessity of rebuilding national industry and commercially fighting the Ger-

PROBLEMS OF THE LABOUR MARKET.

"The nation which can adjust itself most quickly after the war is going to have the best look-in; it is important that we should be better prepared for peace than we were for war," said Mr. Steel Maitland, M.P., addressing the Birmingham Workers' Educational Association on Saturday on the labour situation after the war.

"In my talks with secretaries of trade unions and large employers," he stated, "I have found prevalent a sort of fatalistic feeling that we are going to have an awful time in industry after the war. One way to make a trouble like that inevitable is to sit down and consider it inevitable. We ought instead to try to spread the feeling that the community is not going to have it.

"Men who come back from the war will look to be reinstated, and that, I take it, is our first duty to them. In a great many departments we are short-handed, and certain districts are 75 per cent. short of the full number of men they should use. On the other hand, the men who come back will displace a great many men and women who have been taken on in their absence, and these will have to be drafted back again. Many industries are closed down for lack of hands, so that it will be possible to reinstate at one removal a large number of men and women.

"We shall have to do everything possible for men who are so disabled that they cannot follow their old occupations. In this connection comes the question of the land and land settlement schemes. I think there is every likelihood of settling on English land more people than were there before the war, and that will further help to relieve the situation.

"Whether as a government or a municipality or as private individuals we should schedule the work which we can do, keep it as far as possible until the end of the war, and then be ready to give it out rather freely. I am not at all sure that it would not be a good thing to have both employer and employed completely organised."

1,750,000 WOMEN.

Mr. J. H. Thomas, M.P., addressing a railwaymen's meeting at Bath yesterday, said the problems of the moment were as nothing compared with the problems which we would have to face when the war was over.

"No man," he said, "can contemplate with any degree of satisfaction any intention of throwing out of the industrial arena 1,750,000 women, and therefore it is our duty to deal with the situation in a practical way. We have no right to set up a sex war, but we have a right to say that no employer shall be allowed in future to take advantage of women's labour as a means of reducing the value of men's labour. Where women are doing the work of men they should be paid the same rates as men."

Andrew moved: "That this conference urged the Education Department to take into consideration schemes for the technical training—with a maintenance allowance—of boys and girls between 14 and 16 years of age, such schemes to be financed partly by the Department, partly locally.

Mr Lough of the Shop Assistants' Union seconded.

Mr Drake (Class Teachers' Association) moved as an amendment: "That this Conference, recognising the supreme need for the fullest development and most complete organisation of the brains of the nation, demands that the Board of Education and the local education authorities take immediate steps to provide full-time secondary education up to the age of 16 for all children who pass through the primary schools, maintenance to be made from the public funds where necessary; and, further, urges the Board of Education and the local education authorities to take into consideration schemes for the continued day education of boys and girls who have entered the ranks of industry, such day continuation schools to provide sufficient technical education which ought to be in close touch with the industries in which the pupils were engaged."

Mr Basket, Shop Assistants' Union, seconded. The amendment was carried by a large majority.

---

thanks to the number of men in the Army and to the enormous requirements of the Government, the demand for labour exceeds the supply. These extraordinary Government orders will cease with the war, and the day after the Army is disbanded the labour market will be flooded. The question of the employment of women complicates the problem. Women are now doing work formerly monopolised by men, and generally they are doing it very well. We do not believe that more than a small proportion of these women will be willing to abandon comparatively good wages for the pittance of domesticity. In considering the future the permanent competition of women must be borne in mind, with the consequent economic necessity of the equal wage.

It is obviously the duty of private employers and public authorities to postpone new enterprises until after peace, whenever that is practicable. This cannot be a solution of the difficulty, but it would certainly be what the Fabians used to call a "palliative." The real problem will be the provision of many more adequately paid jobs than existed before the war. The Overseas Dominions want men. It is, too, a matter of common agreement that the land in Great Britain might support thousands more men if some workmanlike scheme of home colonisation could be agreed upon. Many soldiers who used to work in factories will have determined to spend the remainder of their days in the open air, and from their ranks the colonists for Canada and the English counties will be drawn. Others will be eager for their old work. The trade unions have shown a splendid patriotism in modifying their rules to meet the national emergency. They have done so on the definite pledge that the rules shall all be restored after the war. The aim of trade unionism has been to ensure employment at a maximum wage for the maximum number of workers, and they have quite openly advocated a restriction of the output of the individual worker. In view of the large number of men for whom work must be found, this restriction will inevitably be again demanded—possibly with fatal results in face of the necessity of rebuilding national industry and commercially fighting the Germans. We urge the Government to act without delay in appointing a joint commission of masters and men to consider all sides of the problem.

for men who are so disabled that they cannot follow their old occupations. In this connection comes the question of the land and land settlement schemes. I think there is every likelihood of settling on English land more people than were there before the war, and that will further help to relieve the situation.

"Whether as a government or a municipality or as private individuals we should schedule the work which we can do, keep it as far as possible until the end of the war, and then be ready to give it out rather freely. I am not at all sure that it would not be a good thing to have both employer and employed completely organised."

1,750,000 WOMEN.

Mr. J. H. Thomas, M.P., addressing a railwaymen's meeting at Bath yesterday, said the problems of the moment were as nothing compared with the problems which we would have to face when the war was over.

"No man," he said, "can contemplate with any degree of satisfaction any intention of throwing out of the industrial arena 1,750,000 women, and therefore it is our duty to deal with the situation in a practical way. We have no right to set up a sex war, but we have a right to say that no employer shall be allowed in future to take advantage of women's labour as a means of reducing the value of men's labour. Where women are doing the work of men they should be paid the same rates as men."

Dundee Courier

21-4-16

702/55 bbb 702

702

WOMEN WORKERS AFTER WAR.

All Will Be Required For Trade.

Emigration Must Be Avoided.

(Special to the Courier.)

The position of women is revolutionised by this war. In some respects the revolution will be for good; in others for evil. Whether the good or the evil preponderates will depend largely upon how we prepare for the problems peace will bring. We were unprepared for war, and for our unpreparedness we are paying dearly in blood, in money, and in sorrow. To some extent we were excusable, for we did not, as a nation, expect this war. But we know for a certainty that peace will break out before long. There will be no excuse for unpreparedness in that case.

What Failure Will Mean.

If we fail to prepare we may have fierce competition between men and women for employment, a beating down of wages and living standards, and in the process a degradation of womanhood that will be bad for the State. On the other hand, if we fairly and squarely face the conditions the war creates, and intelligently anticipate the problems of peace, if we prepare to stand by the women in the coming peace as the women are standing by us in this critical war, then the difficulties which a dislocated labour market, high cost of living, and abnormal taxation will necessarily bring will be, to a large extent, smoothed out beforehand, and men and women will be able to work together for that revival of industry and regeneration of society that will be necessary.

It is not too much to say that our future will rest upon the way in which we treat our women workers—upon the manner in which we tackle the problems created by the large accession of women workers to the ranks of industry. Just as this war has put the fighting qualities of our manhood to the supreme test, and has subjected the spirit of our womanhood to a severe trial, so will the coming of peace put our statesmanship, our capitalism, and our trade unionism to some considerable strain.

How shall we treat the vast numbers of women who have taken up industrial and commercial work during the war, and who will not wish to relinquish this work when peace returns? The chief issues cannot be faced too soon. Apart from such questions as rates of wages, hours of labour, health conditions, and Trade Union organisation, the big problem of general employment will need to be tackled in no half-hearted manner. To these women who have come forward to serve the nation in its hour of trial—to release men for the fighting forces and to keep going our industries in the men's absence—we shall owe an obligation not less great than we shall to the men who return from the war.

A Big Labour Question

Roughly, we may assume that two or three million men will be released from the army, and another million from munition making, when peace is declared. That in itself will create a big labour question. But in addition to that we shall have to reckon with a large permanent addition to the number of our women workers.

In the first place, the loss of, say, half a million men in the war—husbands or potential husbands—will involve something like the employment in wage-earning occupations of a similar number of women. That, of course, will not make much difference to the general employment of labour question. But over and above that we may take it that the increased burden of taxation we shall have to carry in consequence of the war will have the effect of throwing out of employment large numbers of domestic servants. It is probable that hundreds of thousands of well-to-do families will reduce their staffs of servants under pressure of high taxation and food prices.

In the next place, the same causes—high taxation and dear food—will probably result in millions of working-class families sending an additional daughter out to work for wages, the mothers doing their own household work unaided. We may be certain that just as this war necessitates men fighting, the results of the war will impose upon women much more work than they have experienced for a generation or two. After the war it will be the women certainly as much as the men, and very likely more than the men, upon whom we shall have to rely to help the nation, by their thrift in the home and their work in the factory and the shop, to capture and maintain the national position.

More Female Labour.

The chief point I wish to make, however, is that one of the results of this war is going to be an enormously increased volume of female labour available for employment, a volume that will far outbalance the loss of male labour we shall suffer by the war.

What are we going to do with these women? Are we going to welcome them as helpers in the upbuilding of our industries, the revival of our trade, and the recuperation of our national finances, or are we going to treat them as competitors, if not enemies, to be fought and beaten out of the labour market?

I suggest that the problem before us is not how to push the women out of situations to make room for the men, or to emigrate either men or women under the impression that there is going to be bad trade and lack of employment after this war, but that it is how to absorb all the labour available, both male and female, in productive industry, such as agriculture and manufactures, and especially how to employ our women in commercial occupations, such as office and shop work, to release the men for more productive work, in order to produce all the commodities we possibly can for ourselves, to reduce our imports of foreign goods, to get the largest possible surplus of products for export, to pay for the war, and to put our trade balance and finances right. Not only is there every need for us to protect, organise, and develop our productive industries, to employ all the men and women possible in the production of wealth, but we have all the natural resources necessary for a great expansion of our industries and employment, both in agriculture and manufactures, and there is also every probability of a great trade boom soon after peace is declared

All Workers Required.

There is sure to be a period of unemployment—of industrial disturbance—immediately after the war while trades are being readapted to peace conditions, and during this period the Government would be well advised to make grants to the unemployment funds of our Trade Unions and to give out-of-work pay to non-Unionist workers, both men and women, so that there will be no temptation for our people to emigrate After this temporary period we shall require all our workers.

One of the most certain economic results of this German-made war will be an increased demand for British-made goods. Not only shall we ourselves refuse to purchase anything like the £80,000,000 worth of German goods we have hitherto imported annually, but our Colonies and Allies will boycott German agents and products after this. To the countries with which Germany is now at war she was exporting goods to the tune of £400,000,000 worth a year before the war. Now she has hit and offended nearly all her best customers. This will be reflected in a hugely-increased business for us. There will be an enormous demand for British manufactures. We shall be able to employ both our men and women without their emigrating, and the conditions under which we shall employ our new women workers, who have displayed a magnificent aptitude and patriotism in the war period, are matters to which we cannot give a too early or too serious attention.

Sussex Daily News

25. 4. 16.

WOMEN'S WORK.

THE Minister of Munitions has referred more than once in terms of high praise to the work which women are doing in munition factories. In some respects, he declares, they do their work better than men. No one wishes for a moment to mitigate this compliment, nor the many well-deserved praises which are being accorded the women of this country for their splendid energy and willingness to learn. But their fine response in stepping into the breach carries with it its own problems, and if we do not recognise them now we shall be forced to do so later. Of the demand of the trades unions that they shall be paid the same rate of wages as men it is unnecessary to treat here. Presumably, the unions can look after themselves in this matter, and they seem to be doing so pretty effectively. In this particular respect, however, it would seem that the interests of the nation call for the same safeguards. It must be remembered that there is still a vast store of female labour untapped, and that as the present schemes of dilution progress more and more will inevitably be drawn into industry. They will begin as unskilled workers; in due course, and with feminine adaptability, they will become skilled, and fresh unskilled female workers will take their places. This is a process which need not be discouraged for a moment, but it is necessary to realise precisely what it involves. After the war we shall be faced with two separate phenomena in industrial life. The first will be a shortage of capital, the second a superabundance of labour. New labour will have been drawn into industry to swell the returning millions of men from the front. If all these tendencies were to proceed unregulated, it is not difficult to figure an age of unemployment such as we have never known, and of a grim struggle for sustenance among the working classes. For this reason it is evident that, in the interests of every class in the country, and not least of the employing class, every precaution should be taken to prevent the market being thus flooded with labour. The problem hinges on wages. If women have been receiving the same wages as men no employer will long hesitate between the two. It will be, it is true, a process of dislocation for these many women workers to return to domestic life; but the dislocation will be trifling compared with the results that would follow their retention in any considerable numbers. The war will be followed by a condition of violent flux, in which the whole structure of society will be beset with dangers. This is one of them. But it is a danger which can be minimised by means of due circumspection. It is necessary, to this end, to emphasise in every possible way the temporary nature of every revolution in the established habits of industry.

The Daily Telegraph, 9-5-16.

WOMEN WORKERS.

DURING THE WAR AND AFTER.

One of the surprises of the war has been the revelation of unsuspected national resources in our women workers. Women had always taken their place in the factory, and they had been gradually penetrating the office, chiefly as typists and telephone clerks. But as it became necessary to release more and more men for military duties, more and more women had to be drafted into works and office staffs, and the supposedly indispensable man has often been replaced without serious loss by the adaptable woman.

There can be no doubt that these new workers have proved a remarkable success. Their industry, patience, loyalty, and intelligence have confounded the critics. They have shown themselves capable of filling many posts hitherto regarded as male preserves.

On these facts two reflections arise. In the first place, it is doubtful whether we are, even now, making the most of these newly-revealed capacities. The prejudice which restricted women's work in the office to shorthand and typing is gradually giving way, but there are still many employers who fail to realise the efficiency which women have displayed as bookkeepers, organisers, designers, buyers, and sellers. If we are to fulfil our threefold task of furnishing men, munitions, and money, the business abilities of our women must be utilised to the fullest extent and to the best advantage.

In the second place, this influx of female workers will present us with some difficult problems after the war. No doubt some of the new workers will go back to the home, but many of them will have acquired a taste for business life, and others will find themselves obliged to continue working by the loss of those on whom they were dependent, or by the pressure of high prices and taxation. A proportion of these may find their opportunity in replacing men who have been killed or disabled, but we must not forget that there will be some millions of men to be reabsorbed into the labour market, many of whom have been promised reinstatement in their old positions.

The pledges of reinstatement are a debt of honour which must and will be paid. It is clear also that it would be disastrous if employers were to yield to the temptation to use cheap female labour for cutting the rates paid to returned soldiers. How, then, are we to prevent large numbers of women who have become dependent upon their own earnings from being thrown into the ranks of the unemployed?

EMPLOYMENT AND SUITABILITY.

The answer seems to be that we must learn to regard female labour from a new standpoint. Hitherto the main reason for employing it has been its cheapness. Having fewer dependents, or being themselves partially maintained, women would do the same work as a man for less money. After the war it will be necessary for us to take longer and broader views. To take advantage of the opportunities which will be offered us and to meet the competition which we shall have to face, it will be necessary that we should make the best possible use of every brain and every pair of hands in the country. While we cut down ruthlessly all waste of money or labour, we must look rather to increasing our business than to diminishing our wages bill, and suitability and efficiency, rather than mere cheapness, will be the qualifications for employment.

"Suitability," in fact, is the key to the problem. Experience has shown that there are certain kinds of work which the average woman can do more efficiently than the average man. Both in offices and in shops many posts hitherto held by men could be filled by women with a real gain in efficiency, thereby releasing men for work which women are disqualified from performing by physique or circumstances. The task before us is so to organise the nation's business that our women workers shall be attracted to those forms of employment in which their special qualities are of most value, while men are diverted to other work. In the increased business resulting from better organisation there will be room for both.

The Times. 29.5.16.

70

WOMEN WORKERS AFTER THE WAR.

Dr. Ethel Bentham, presiding on Saturday at a conference of the Central London Branch of the Women's Labour League at Kingsway Hall, at which 127 women's societies were represented, said many new vested interests were being created every day, and in England it was never very safe to meddle with vested interests. So far as she had been able to see most of the married women who had taken up hard physical work were the better in health.

Mr. Fred Bramley, organizer of the National Amalgamated Furnishing Trades' Association, said there was danger of a conflict between women now employed in industries and the men who would come back to those industries. He did not accept the view that women would be cleared out of factories in large bodies after the war.

Lloyd's Weekly News. 28.5.16.

WOMEN WILL STOP.

NOT TO BE TURNED FROM FACTORIES AFTER THE WAR.

Woman's position in industry after the war was discussed at a Women's Labour League Conference at Kingsway Hall yesterday.

Mr. Fred Bramley, organiser of the National Amalgamated Furnishing Trades Association, said he believed there was a great danger of a conflict between employers and the men's unions respecting the employment of women, and a conflict in which the interests of women would not be looked upon as of primary importance, and there was also the danger of a conflict between women now employed in industries and the men who would come back to those industries.

There was an idea that after the war, when the women no longer filled an emergency, they would be cleared out of the factories in large bodies, but he did not think any such change was going to take place. He said that with a full knowledge of all the agreements arrived at with the Government and other institutions.

Dr. Marion Phillips said there should be no objection to a woman remaining in a position where she had proved her capacity. A dock labourer or a coal miner should not be a woman.

Express/Review
21.3.16

THE EMPLOYMENT OF WOMEN AFTER THE WAR.

Miss Margaret Bondfield was the principal speaker at a conference called by the Shop Assistants' Union (London Women's Council). She urged the necessity of women making themselves as efficient as possible, even if after the war the men were in many cases going to occupy their old positions. It was very necessary that the Government should be prepared with a scheme to deal with the displacement of women which would take place at the end of the war, and the women must make themselves acquainted with what was likely to happen, so that they could place the facts before the proper quarter when that time arrived. Before the war ended, women would be called upon in larger numbers to take the places of the men called up, and they must watch very carefully the situation as it developed, and qualify themselves to serve on the various committees that the Government was setting up all over the country, with a view to protecting their own interests. In the work of the Union they must take an active part, and be prepared to shoulder the responsibility of official position. The growing number of women acting as branch secretaries showed that they were realising this, and it was very essential that the whole machinery of the organisation should be kept going until the men returned. It was very essential, both for themselves and for the men who had gone, that they should stand out for at least the Union's minimum rate of pay. Where women were expected to do the same amount of work as a man, and shoulder the responsibility, they should be paid exactly the same. Whatever other effect the war might have, it would certainly give the women more power than they have ever had before. The knowledge they gained in filling the places of the men would have to be used for the public good. Trade unionism itself would have to adapt itself to the new industrial conditions, and it was very necessary that women should organise more strongly than ever before. The fact that the Manchester Women's Council of the Union were having their annual meeting on the same day showed that the women shop assistants were quite as eager as the men in trying to uplift their conditions of employment. Only a few short years ago and what was really happening now seemed a dream. The women present had made it a reality. If they would go back to their branches carrying the enthusiasm of that meeting with them, and determined to push on the good work, it would not be many years longer before many other things they had dreamed of also became realities.

Edinburgh Evening News
10-6-16

One of the most interesting topics which can be discussed in this series of articles is the position of our women in war time. Everyone has noticed the changes brought outwardly by war—the employment of women in public services and in many occupations formerly a monopoly of men. There are other aspects of the prominence of women. Those who have attended public functions, indoor and outdoor, in connection with the war must have noticed the great growth in the attendance of women and girls. Their interest in recruiting has been particularly lively. Often they have stood on the streets for two hours at a time, listening closely to speakers and encouraging them in every way. The patriotism of women is even firmer than that of men, and great, indeed, will be the disappointment among them unless the peace secures substantially all for which the Allies are justly contending. Women, without doubt, are now keener students of public affairs than ever before, and as a consequence they are much nearer the acquisition of the Parliamentary franchise than in pre-war days.

Two Schemes of Demobilisation.

After the war is over there will be two great schemes of demobilisation—that of the soldiers and of women workers, now in so many new lines. Very many women will be dismissed from numerous lines. Much, of course, will depend on the individual. Competent women or girls may in some cases keep what they hold; but others who are not thorough in their methods will be dispensed with. There never was so much makeshift in Edinburgh business as to-day. Short roads are being taken to everything. Even the lawyer uses the telephone when in pre-war days he would have dictated his 6s 8d letter. We shall not get back to all our old methods; but business thoroughness must largely reassert itself after the war, and the jobs will be there for competent men when they return. Business training is after all not a scratch thing, and the remnants of manhood left free by Cockburn Street have developed many grey hairs by attempting to train substitutes for our soldiers.

The Temptation of Money.

There are many tasks which women have accepted merely because the money is tempting. Particularly is this so in connection with public conveyances. The business of a conductor on a tramcar must be fairly tiring; but it presents advantages to that of a girl on the back step of a motor 'bus, who is often standing all the way, and, as her garments show, is nearly suffocated by dust. The postwoman cheerfully does her work, but the outdoor business in all weathers is one which will readily be recaptured by men, as will most employment demanding stamina. In shops men will again be welcomed in the heavier lines, and for general direction; while in commercial establishments it is not too harsh to say that the less clever girls are merely being tolerated [illegible] returns.

Edinburgh Evening News 10-6-16

Phenomenal Amount of Unrest.

At present, it is the opinion of a lady with the most thorough knowledge of women's work in Edinburgh, there is a phenomenal amount of unrest among working women and girls. A mania to have a change of employment seems to be raging. The officials at the Labour Exchange and elsewhere know something about this. The desire for altered conditions of life has particularly been marked among domestic servants, a large class in the Scottish capital. As a result of the war many hotels were closed and establishments were cut down; but servant girls have gone into so many different forms of employment that mistresses will now give any terms for competent servants. The ex-servants are in everything from tramcars to munitions. Some time ago a batch of 40 to 50 servants, mostly of superior grade, went to Birmingham for munition work, and as an earnest of their desires paid down 24s each for the railway fare. The demobilisation of women will undoubtedly affect the servant class, and following the war there will not, as to-day, be a scarcity of servants.

General Increase in Pay.

All over there has been an increase in pay to women, and concessions have often been made to retain them in their old employment. A shortage of hands has recently been reported in the dress trades, once affected by war depression, and even in this line advances in wages have been necessary, as many girls have left to "better" themselves. Regarding the necessity of training, to which reference has been made, here is another illustrative point. There is a considerable demand for women gardeners. Many English situations are open, and two or three in the Edinburgh district; but obviously the untrained eye and hand are of no service in the gardens. Lately at the Labour Exchange there has been an increasing number of soldiers' wives desiring work. They are the wives of men who have been called up under the Derby Scheme, and their anxiety is to keep the home together. They find the Army allowance now quite inadequate, but their case should to some extent be met by the operation of the Civil Liabilities Scheme. Some of the women have gone back to occupations followed before marriage.

Behaving Splendidly and Patriotically.

All over Edinburgh women are behaving splendidly and patriotically. In saying so we express the opinion of a lady—Parish Councillor Mrs Naismith—whose knowledge of social conditions of working-class Edinburgh is most extensive and broad-minded. There are undoubtedly women who do a great deal of drinking, and whose condition brings scandal on whole neighbourhoods; but their evil habits have merely been accentuated by the war, not formed by it. Generally speaking, in working-class homes the mother is responsible for the rent. Never were rents paid more punctually to the exact amount than now, and paid by women who have not the least taint of alcohol about them. The last May term may well be called a "record" for Edinburgh, so full were the payments. Women largely have really built up this record of honesty.

Hard Home Battle.

It cannot be concealed that women in the homes are fighting a particularly hard battle to-day. The stiffness of the fight is not always realised by those who are near them—husbands and children. Many young people, benefiting considerably by advances in wages, have considered themselves before their own homes; while husbands are in many cases quite oblivious to the fact that food prices since the war have risen, according to local statistics, 56.3 per cent. compared with the beginning of the war. Not only has the cost of eatables advanced, but everything used in the way of clothing and all manner of household essentials—from notepaper to matches and candles—have risen in price. War bonuses and overtime money have not always come the way of the housewife who has to keep things going with less real money and often little sympathy.

What is Really Needed.

Touching again on the recurrent question of behaviour of women, there has been a great deal too much talk and too little kindly action. Women offenders, like men of criminal disposition, have declined in numbers. Compared with a year ago, the number of women in the Calton Prison is 74, against 85 at the concluding date of last year, and 98 at the end of May, 1914. It should be borne in mind that women are sent from various districts for detention at Regent Road, and when allowance is made for them the Edinburgh total is not considerable. In the prison where the women are kindly dealt with, the victims of wrong-doing are at first nervous and ill at ease. Each possesses a heart. Women prisoners cry and promise amendment when they are talked to by sympathetic visitors. Numbers of soldiers' wives have been placed in bondage. The penalty they pay is tremendously severe. Homes and children are temporarily lost. What is the prospect before some of these women when they are free? We hear a great deal about Prohibition and temperance work among women. Many of the addresses at temperance meetings are delivered to those who require no counsel to keep on the right path. They are firmly walking along it. But we do need in Edinburgh the care and sympathy of woman for woman, and specially for those poor women who have been so much in the public eye and have received so much censure. A woman's question is being put when it is asked whether all the ladies in Edinburgh with leisure endeavour to stretch out a helping hand to a weaker, struggling sister? By operating on the individual rather than on the mass great social improvement and happiness are brought about.

Manchester Guardian
3-7-16.

The text of the bill which the Government has introduced to extend the provisions of the National Insurance Act relating to unemployment to all trades engaged in the making of munitions and in other forms of war work as a means of meeting the conditions resulting from the restoration of peace was issued on Saturday.

The measure is presented by Mr. Pretyman, and supported by Mr. Harcourt and Dr. Addison, and the second reading will be taken in the House of Commons this week. It will come into operation on September 4 next, or later if the Board of Trade consider a postponement necessary.

Women Workers Included.

The proposal is to bring under the provisions of Part II. of the National Insurance Act and the amending statutes, every workman (a term which, of course, includes women) who is engaged on, or in connection with, munition work as defined by the Munitions of War Acts, except such classes of work as the Board of Trade may by order exclude, and every workman who is employed in the following trades:—

(1) The manufacture of ammunition, fireworks, and explosives.
(2) The manufacture of chemicals, including oils, lubricants, soap, candles, paints, colours, and varnish.
(3) The manufacture of metals and the manufacture or repair of metal goods.
(4) The manufacture of rubber and goods made therefrom.
(5) The manufacture of leather and leather goods.
(6) The manufacture of bricks, cement, and artificial stone, and other artificial building materials; and
(7) Saw milling, including machine woodwork, and the manufacture of wooden cases.

The measure also applies the existing Acts to employers, while the Board of Trade will be given power under the new bill to extend its provisions to any other trade or branch of a trade in which a substantial amount of munition or other war work is being carried on.

When Contributions and Benefits Cease.

So far as the measure imposes on employers and workmen a liability to pay contributions, it will cease to have effect at such date as the Board of Trade may by order determine, not being later than five years after the commencement of this Act, or three years after the termination of the present war, whichever of these dates may be the later, and so far as it confers on workmen a right to receive benefit in respect of such contributions, it will cease to have effect at the expiration of six months from the date so determined or at such later date as the Board may fix.

The Board will prepare accounts, so far as practicable, showing separately the estimated receipts and expenditure of the unemployment fund in respect of workmen insured under this Act, and if the accounts indicate that at the date when benefit ceases to be payable the payments out the Unemployment Fund for the purposes of the bill exceed the aggregate amount of the receipts, the Treasury will repay the estimated amount of such excess out of moneys provided by Parliament.

Common Cause
30-6-16

702/58

~~666~~
702

After the War.

Towards the end of the second year of the war it is none too early to begin to ask "what shall we have to do next?" and it is a question to which the answer becomes every day more difficult, while the chances of chaos and confusion "after the war" become daily more certain. The changes in the conditions of labour, in prices, profits, and wages, and in the economic outlook of governments and individuals have completely swept away most of our old theories. Compared with the great upheaval of the world that has caused these changes, they seem almost insignificant; and yet in the future it is they, and not the fighting itself, that will be of consequence. The system of considering history only as a series of dates, kings, and battles has been justly abandoned, and it is the business of those who are not themselves in the fighting, to try now to remember the ultimate proportions of the history we are living through.

As soon as we begin to consider the changes of the present and the chances of the future, problems arise which seem almost insoluble. We have so little to go upon, and so much uncertainty still before us, that very little clear thinking, and still less useful action, seems possible. Nevertheless, we must think as best we can, and act as best we may, for merely to do "war work," or to read the war news is to shirk our share of the business.

At the very outset of our thinking, we find that we are living now without method and by necessity, using up our capital, not only of life, but of wealth and productive power. We find that the old adjustments upon which we used to live are being swept away from us, and there is very little left to guide us.

A concrete example of this confusion is the question of the training of girls and young women. What ought we to do with them in view of "after the war," and what are we doing?

The first thing we see is that their possible spheres of work are now enormously extended; the artificial barriers between "men's work" and "women's work" are still breaking down daily, and no one can judge how far that particular anomaly will ever be built up again. All the problems of wages and competition, of Trade Unionism and State control of capital bear on this question, and the future disbanding of the army threatens it with complete confusion. And yet, in spite of its difficulty, it is a problem we cannot neglect now, for the girls have their lives before them, and even if we do nothing but "wait and see" we have already taken action. Must we then train them for these various trades and professions? And if so, what of their children? Must we not rather train them for motherhood? Already, backed, or perhaps inspired, by the natural fear of cheap female competition, a clamor has begun to make ready "after the war," to force women back out of the labour market into their homes. What are we to do about that? The homes are not there, and for more thousands of girls even than before they will never exist. What, then, of their wages, and how are they to live? If we forbid them to earn wages because of their hypothetical children, must we not pay for their living because of those children? And what then of the need to increase the productiveness of England "after the war"? If the girls are skilled producers of goods, must we force them to stay idle? There is no end to the questions that arise, and the compromises with which we answered them before need more revision than we are giving to them.

And while these and a hundred other similar problems face us, what is actually happening is that the young women are rushing gladly and inconsiderately into every blind-alley opening, urged on by their longing to "do their bit," by the abnormal wages they can get, and by the novelty of the whole proceeding. After the war they will have to rush out again, either because the men they have replaced are back, as on the 'buses and trams, or because the work they have done is over, as in the munition factories; and there they will be, thousands of young, strong women, accustomed to independence and work, unmarried and without the expectation of marriage, swelling the great disbanded army of the unemployed. And yet it is not at all clear that they are wrong in doing as they do. The shells must be made, and the 'buses conducted, and the most that could be done now would be to select and sort the women offering work, so as to put those who need not work for life into the temporary work, and to offer training and a safer opening to those who know their need will last.

Such classification is very difficult, and the organisation needed for it is entirely lacking; so, too, is the co-ordination of training centres and the distribution of information, and this list might be indefinitely extended. In fact, amid all these difficulties and confusions, one thing is clear, and that is that foresight and provision for "after the war" are absent. One other thing is clear, too, and that is that women will have to take their share of responsibility and action in the settlement of all these problems. We shall, no doubt, build up new and still imperfect compromises "after the war"; but they may be less one-sided, and it is possible to hope that they may be less confused if, when the time of reconstruction comes, women as well as men are consulted.

Manchester Guardian
3-7-16

The text of the bill which the Government has introduced to extend the provisions of the National Insurance Act relating to unemployment to all trades engaged in the making of munitions and in other forms of war work as a means of meeting the conditions resulting from the restoration of peace was issued on Saturday.

The measure is presented by Mr. Pretyman, and supported by Mr. Harcourt and Dr. Addison, and the second reading will be taken in the House of Commons this week. It will come into operation on September 4 next, or later if the Board of Trade consider a postponement necessary.

Women Workers Included.

The proposal is to bring under the provisions of Part II. of the National Insurance Act and the amending statutes, every workman (a term which, of course, includes women) who is engaged on, or in connection with, munition work as defined by the Munitions of War Acts, except such classes of work as the Board of Trade may by order exclude, and every workman who is employed in the following trades:—

(1) The manufacture of ammunition, fireworks, and explosives.
(2) The manufacture of chemicals, including oils, lubricants, soap, candles, paints, colours, and varnish.
(3) The manufacture of metals and the manufacture or repair of metal goods.
(4) The manufacture of rubber and goods made therefrom.
(5) The manufacture of leather and leather goods.
(6) The manufacture of bricks, cement, and artificial stone, and other artificial building materials; and
(7) Saw milling, including machine woodwork, and the manufacture of wooden cases.

The measure also applies the existing Acts to employers, while the Board of Trade will be given power under the new bill to extend its provisions to any other trade or branch of a trade in which a substantial amount of munition or other war work is being carried on.

When Contributions and Benefits Cease.

So far as the measure imposes on employers and workmen a liability to pay contributions, it will cease to have effect at such date as the Board of Trade may by order determine, not being later than five years after the commencement of this Act, or three years after the termination of the present war, whichever of these dates may be the later, and so far as it confers on workmen a right to receive benefit in respect of such contributions, it will cease to have effect at the expiration of six months from the date so determined or at such later date as the Board may fix.

The Board will prepare accounts, so far as practicable, showing separately the estimated receipts and expenditure of the unemployment fund in respect of workmen insured under this Act, and if the accounts indicate that at the date when benefit ceases to be payable the payments out the Unemployment Fund for the purposes of the bill exceed the aggregate amount of the receipts, the Treasury will repay the estimated amount of such excess out of moneys provided by Parliament.

Common Cause
20-6-16

702/58

666
702

After the War.

Towards the end of the second year of the war it is none too early to begin to ask "what shall we have to do next?" and it is a question to which the answer becomes every day more difficult, while the chances of chaos and confusion "after the war" become daily more certain. The changes in the conditions of labour, in prices, profits, and wages, and in the economic outlook of governments and individuals have completely swept away most of our old theories. Compared with the great upheaval of the world that has caused these changes, they seem almost insignificant; and yet in the future it is they, and not the fighting itself, that will be of consequence. The system of considering history only as a series of dates, kings, and battles has been justly abandoned, and it is the business of those who are not themselves in the fighting, to try now to remember the ultimate proportions of the history we are living through.

As soon as we begin to consider the changes of the present and the chances of the future, problems arise which seem almost insoluble. We have so little to go upon, and so much uncertainty still before us, that very little clear thinking, and still less useful action, seems possible. Nevertheless, we must think as best we can, and act as best we may, for merely to do "war work," or to read the war news is to shirk our share of the business.

At the very outset of our thinking, we find that we are living now without method and by necessity, using up our capital, not only of life, but of wealth and productive power. We find that the old adjustments upon which we used to live are being swept away from us, and there is very little left to guide us.

A concrete example of this confusion is the question of the training of girls and young women. What ought we to do with them in view of "after the war," and what are we doing?

The first thing we see is that their possible spheres of work are now enormously extended; the artificial barriers between "men's work" and "women's work" are still breaking down daily, and no one can judge how far that particular anomaly will ever be built up again. All the problems of wages and competition, of Trade Unionism and State control of capital bear on this question, and the future disbanding of the army threatens it with complete confusion. And yet, in spite of its difficulty, it is a problem we cannot neglect now, for the girls have their lives before them, and even if we do nothing but "wait and see" we have already taken action. Must we then train them for these various trades and professions? And if so, what of their children? Must we not rather train them for motherhood? Already, backed, or perhaps inspired, by the natural fear of cheap female competition, a clamor has begun to make ready "after the war," to force women back out of the labour market into their homes. What are we to do about that? The homes are not there, and for more thousands of girls even than before they will never exist. What, then, of their wages, and how are they to live? If we forbid them to earn wages because of their hypothetical children, must we not pay for their living because of those children? And what then of the need to increase the productiveness of England "after the war"? If the girls are skilled producers of goods, must we force them to stay idle? There is no end to the questions that arise, and the compromises with which we answered them before need more revision than we are giving to them.

And while these and a hundred other similar problems face us, what is actually happening is that the young women are rushing gladly and inconsiderately into every blind-alley opening, urged on by their longing to "do their bit," by the abnormal to accept a wo[illegible] side voluntarily, because good men candidates are sc[illegible] or because it is the fashion just now to extol women's services. In the long run, the period of truce may be an advantage to us, if it is spent in self-education and development. It is a good rule in politics not to bark until you are strong enough to bite. Most Women Citizens' Associations are in the ingratiating, tail-wagging stage at present. But if they develop as they should, the time will quickly come when party leaders and agents will wake up to find that there is a new force which has to be reckoned with.

ELEANOR F. RATHBONE.

Chrisham Commonwealth 6

23/2/16.

Industrial Women Combining.

I suggested some time ago that the time was surely come when steps should be taken to form a standing joint committee of the industrial women's organisations for the purpose of taking combined action on matters of common interest and importance. I understand that a temporary committee has been formed with this intention. The proposal was considered at a meeting convened by the Women's Trade Union League, and the various organisations concerned will be invited at a further meeting to consider a proposed constitution drawn up by the Women's Labour League. The Women's Co-operative Guild, the Railway Women's Guild, and the Federation of Women Workers, as well as the two organisations named, were present at the preliminary meeting and will be invited to the next. Meanwhile, the industrial women have agreed to act together in preparing a register of working women for nomination to the local pensions' committees. This is a considerable step forward. The position of women in industry after the war will be one of the most serious problems that organised Labour must face, and it is a decided advantage that in the discussions to come industrial women should speak with one voice.

Daily News & Trader 28.6.16

THE FUTURE OF WOMEN'S WORK

Among the grave problems with which demobilisation, both military and industrial, will bring us face to face, that of the position of women in industry will be one of the most perplexing and important. The record of women workers in the past eighteen months has been beyond all expectation, and, speaking generally, beyond all praise. In certain vocations it is probable that they will permanently retain the position they have gained. But there is no hope, unless a new era of unprecedented prosperity is in store, that employment will be available after the war both for the men who come back and the women who now fill their places. It is consequently of extreme importance that the danger of cheap and reasonably efficient women's labour being exploited to the detriment both of themselves and of more highly-paid male workers should be foreseen and provided against.

Some attention was given at the congress of the Women's Co-operative Guild yesterday to the means by which the industrial interests both of men and women might best be safeguarded. Two practical proposals were advanced, one stipulating that women should be guaranteed the same wage-rate as men, the other providing for a general minimum wage of £1 a week. It is on the whole unwise to lay stress on a definite minimum wage while women's industrial position is uncertain as it must be until stable peace conditions return. Insistence on the £1 minimum would mean that in the industries now regulated by Trade Boards many of the workers would be more likely to lose their employment than increase their earnings. In some cases it might be well that they should, but that question is better settled by the Trade Boards—and the Trade Board system has so convincingly proved its value as to make its application over a much wider field desirable—than by a uniform and rigid adhesion to a particular minimum figure. But the essential point of agreement is that the conditions governing women's industry in the immediate future must be strictly supervised. The demand that women and men should receive equal wages for equal work is perfectly just, and the best safeguard against exploitation is the Trade Union. It is of the first importance, therefore, that the Trade Union movement should be widely extended among women. At the same time it will be necessary to remember as a general principle—perhaps the reminder is superfluous—that if the labour market will not absorb both men and women it is in the interests of society that it should first absorb the men.

Daily News 30.6.16.

AFTER WAR PROBLEMS.

Reconstruction Committee's Comprehensive Labours.

The Prime Minister in March last appointed a Committee of the Cabinet, of which he is chairman, to consider and advise upon the problems that will arise on the conclusion of peace.

Any suggestions or other communications from individuals or organisations bearing upon these questions should be addressed to Mr. Vaughan Nash, C.V.O., C.B., Secretary of the Reconstruction Committee, 6a, Dean's Yard, Westminster. It is not expedient in the public interest to specify the nature of many of the inquiries which are being undertaken.

LABOUR LEADER'S ACTION.

At the House of Commons last evening a special meeting was held of representatives of the Labour Party, the General Federation of Trade Unionists, the Parliamentary Committee to the Trade Union Congress, and the Workers' National War Emergency Committee, to consider the question of dealing with after-war problems affecting industry and the workers generally. Mr. Arthur Henderson, M.P., presided, and it was agreed that a sub-committee, consisting of three members from each of the four organisations should go fully into the question and report to a future meeting.

WOMEN AFTER THE WAR.

The Board of Trade, in a pamphlet issued by the Board of Trade Advisory Committee on Women's War Employment (Industrial), for the use of their local committees urge that difficult questions such as the reinstatement of enlisted men after the war, the limitation of the new employment of women to the duration of the present emergency, and the like, should not be deferred, but faced immediately and settled by the employers and the workers at once.

Daily News 30.6.16

THE MUNITION WORKER.

GOVERNMENT'S BOLD SCHEME.

AID AFTER WAR.

UNEMPLOYMENT EVIL TO BE AVERTED.

By Our Lobby Correspondent.

The Government have decided on a bold scheme to safeguard the interests of munition workers when their employment will suddenly cease at the close of the war. It is one of the most serious problems which will confront them when peace comes, for all over the country an enormous number of workers will then suddenly find their employment gone.

A Bill has been drafted at the Board of Trade, which was formally introduced by Mr. Pretyman yesterday, to bring all the munition works and factories in the kingdom under the provisions of the unemployment part of the National Insurance Act. This means, of course, that all munition workers on the passage of the Act will have to contribute their 2½d. per week, and the employers the same amount per worker, in addition to which the State makes a proportionate contribution.

It also means that on the cessation of their employment workers will at once receive unemployment benefit weekly, which may range from 7s. a week upwards according to the rates prescribed by regulation for particular trades. Since the State thus steps in and offers to assume what, in the peculiar conditions, will probably be a far greater financial responsibility than can be covered by the contributions paid before peace is made, it is hoped that workers will loyally accept the obligation of contribution. Incidentally, it may be recalled, the employer pays the two contributions, deducting the workers' payment from his wages. The Labour Party have not seen a draft of the Bill, and will study its provisions closely before expressing their opinion.

Some of the munition trades, of course, were included in the original Act, which first scheduled for unemployment benefit seven trades building, construction of works, shipbuilding, mechanical engineering, iron founding, construction of vehicles, demobilisation, both military and industrial, will bring us face to face, that of the position of women in industry will be one of the most perplexing and important. The record of women workers in the past eighteen months has been beyond all expectation, and, speaking generally, beyond all praise. In certain vocations it is probable that they will permanently retain the position they have gained. But there is no hope, unless a new era of unprecedented prosperity is in store, that employment will be available after the war both for the men who come back and the women who now fill their places. It is consequently of extreme importance that the danger of cheap and reasonably efficient women's labour being exploited to the detriment both of themselves and of more highly-paid male workers should be foreseen and provided against.

Some attention was given at the congress of the Women's Co-operative Guild yesterday to the means by which the industrial interests both of men and women might best be safeguarded. Two practical proposals were advanced, one stipulating that women should be guaranteed the same wage-rate as men, the other providing for a general minimum wage of £1 a week. It is on the whole unwise to lay stress on a definite minimum wage while women's industrial position is uncertain as it must be until stable peace conditions return. Insistence on the £1 minimum would mean that in the industries now regulated by Trade Boards many of the workers would be more likely to lose their employment than increase their earnings. In some cases it might be well that they should, but that question is better settled by the Trade Boards—and the Trade Board system has so convincingly proved its value as to make its application over a much wider field desirable—than by a uniform and rigid adhesion to a particular minimum figure. But the essential point of agreement is that the conditions governing women's industry in the immediate future must be strictly supervised. The demand that women and men should receive equal wages for equal work is perfectly just, and the best safeguard against exploitation is the Trade Union. It is of the first importance, therefore, that the Trade Union movement should be widely extended among women. At the same time it will be necessary to remember as a general principle—perhaps the reminder is superfluous—that if the labour market will not absorb both men and women it is in the interests of society that it should first absorb the men.

Committee on Women's War Employment (Industrial), for the use of their local committees urge that difficult questions such as the reinstatement of enlisted men after the war, the limitation of the new employment of women to the duration of the present emergency, and the like, should not be deferred, but faced immediately and settled by the employers and the workers at once.

Daily News · 30.10.16

THE MUNITION WORKER.

GOVERNMENT'S BOLD SCHEME.

AID AFTER WAR.

UNEMPLOYMENT EVIL TO BE AVERTED.

By Our Lobby Correspondent.

The Government have decided on a bold scheme to safeguard the interests of munition workers when their employment will suddenly cease at the close of the war. It is one of the most serious problems which will confront them when peace comes, for all over the country an enormous number of workers will then suddenly find their employment gone.

A Bill has been drafted at the Board of Trade, which was formally introduced by Mr. Pretyman yesterday, to bring all the munition works and factories in the kingdom under the provisions of the unemployment part of the National Insurance Act. This means, of course, that all munition workers on the passage of the Act will have to contribute their 2½d. per week, and the employers the same amount per worker, in addition to which the State makes a proportionate contribution.

It also means that on the cessation of their employment workers will at once receive unemployment benefit weekly, which may range from 7s. a week upwards according to the rates prescribed by regulation for particular trades. Since the State thus steps in and offers to assume what, in the peculiar conditions, will probably be a far greater financial responsibility than can be covered by the contributions paid before peace is made, it is hoped that workers will loyally accept the obligation of contribution. Incidentally, it may be recalled, the employer pays the two contributions, deducting the workers' payment from his wages. The Labour Party have not seen a draft of the Bill, and will study its provisions closely before expressing their opinion.

Some of the munition trades, of course, were included in the original Act, which first scheduled for unemployment benefit seven trades—building, construction of works, shipbuilding, mechanical engineering, iron-founding, construction of vehicles, and saw-milling. But a large number of munition trades are not included in the Act, and they will be brought in en bloc. This could be done in detail, after inquiry, by the Board of Trade administratively, but it would be a very cumbrous process, and a short Act is the better method.

A. P. N.

Cotton Factory times.
7-7-16.

702/60

SHOULD WOMEN BE CLEARED OUT?

WORK AND THE WORKER AFTER THE WAR.

PENALISING SEX.

By ALICE SMITH.

In a very recent issue of the "Factory Times" a front page contributor records his emphatic disagreement with some remarks of Mr. J. H. Thomas M.P., the assistant secretary of the National Union of Railwaymen, on the question of women's labour after the war. Speaking at a public meeting Mr. Thomas appeared to give the idea that if the war ended to-morrow the women who had been brought ended to-morrow the women who had been brought into industry through the war would not have to leave those industries. In opposition to such an attitude the "Factory Times" contributor states: "We claim that the solemn obligations to the men who went away will necessitate those women going out as quickly as possible, to say nothing of the fact that it was universally acknowledged that the women brought into industry through the war were doing work that is not congenial or natural to a woman. To half admit, as Mr. Thomas seems to do, the right or necessity of these women to stop in the men's places a moment longer than is absolutely necessary appears to us to be an encouragement to employers and capitalists to keep them there, and we know that many of them will only too readily do that. We must get the women back again into the home as soon as the war is over. That they ever left it is one of the evil results of the war."

With this contributor I disagree, just as emphatically as he does with Mr. Thomas. Let us examine and deal with his statement in detail. First of all: "The solemn obligations to the men who went away will necessitate those women—who were brought into industry through the war—going out as quickly as possible." These solemn obligations, i.e., that every man entering military service should be reinstated in his previous occupation on his return, were, I believe, entered into universally, and so must in their discharge affect both men and women. I know these promises were made in the Lancashire spinning mills in departments where females were not then employed, so evidently the intention was that any man taking over the job of a man who had enlisted should surrender this job on the reappearance of its former owner. This being so, why this constant allusion to women only in this respect?

All Will Not Return.

Unhappily, many of our fighting men will never return as our casualty lists sadly testify, and many more will not be able to follow their ordinary occupation. Who is to take the places of these men? Will the women who are already carrying out the duties satisfactorily be forced to abdicate in favour of a man thrust out of another job, and who must first of all incur the expense of training? For instance, will a woman tram conductor who is in the place of a man who never returns be forced to give way to a spinner, say, who is out of a job because his job has been reclaimed by the man who left it on enlistment? If so, then it means that women are to be penalised on account of their sex, and the talk about "solemn obligations" is so much cant. If it is fair for women to yield up their places to our fighting men on their return, it is equally fair for men and boys to do the same.

The statement goes on: "It was universally acknowledged that the women brought into industry in consequence of the war were doing work that is not congenial or natural to a woman." By what standard of judgment is this universal acknowledgement arrived at? From physical or mental capacity? If physical one can but compare the occupation of a bank clerk, an occupation strictly confined to men before the war, with the occupation of a woman chain-maker of Cradley Heath, or even a woman textile worker of Lancashire. The women clerks one sees in banks look very much healthier and happier than the women who work in the cotton mills. I should say that bank work from 9 a.m. to 3 p.m. is much more congenial to women than eating dust and collecting moisture for ten hours a day in cardrooms and weaving sheds. If the standard is a mental one, then we can compare the woman doctor and woman teacher of pre-war days to the man who performed the very useful but monotonous, duty of carrying bricks up a ladder. The plain truth is, that, with the exception of cases where the woman has been able to afford some expensive training, the work considered most natural and congenial to women has been the ill-paid labour, not considered sufficiently remunerative for men to undertake, starvation jobs except where the women are well organised.

If They Are Retained.

What are we to gather from the statement that many employers will only too readily keep the women in place of men who have gone away? It seems to me there are but two reasons; either that women perform the duties more satisfactorily or perform them more cheaply. If the former is the case, then it cannot truthfully be said that the woman is unfitted for this particular work. And if she is pushed out by the return of the man she will surely oust him later by competition, unless she is debarred from re-entering industries which she has successfully negotiated. The domestic sphere is generally conceded as the sphere of women, though why it is considered more womanly to cook a big dinner, scrub floors, and bake a batch of bread than to measure a yard of cloth or sign a cheque, I can never make out. It is certainly more fatiguing. But the domestic duties are not reserved for women. We have male cooks, male waiters, male domestics, male milliners, male dressmakers, and male nurses. Ah! but these men have won their places (generally the most remunerative) by competition with the women. Just so! So why cannot women have the same chance to compete in other occupations? If it is because these women are cheaper that they would be retained, that it is a matter of trade union organisation and largely the fault of the men who would not admit women into their unions, and who have always either advocated or acquiesced in the theory that woman's work was not worth so much as that of a man, apart from its character. Where the men have been on the alert and insisted on the same rate of wages for the women as for themselves, it will resolve itself into a matter of competition, in which, if we have any love of fair play, we ought to let the best one win, subject, of course, to trade union regulations.

A Strange Determination.

The determination to get women back in the home as soon as the war is over seems strange, coming as it does from Lancashire, where females have been in industry for over a century. It is understood in Lancashire as a normal thing for women and girls to work, so why not in other places? A great number of females, in all parts, would have no homes of their own to return to if unable to earn a livelihood in industry. If woman is denied the right to earn her own living it means that she must throughout her life, sponge on some man, father, brother, husband, lover. National necessity has brought out one outstanding fact, and that is, given the opportunity, woman is capable of playing a better role than that of a parasite. She has shown that in times of crisis she is capable of carrying on the work of social production. I do not agree that woman's entry into industry is an evil result of the war. Woman, to some extent, had already entered industry, and her entrance in greater numbers has proved her to be adaptable, dependable, and courageous to a degree previously unimagined. It is good that woman should develop these qualities, good for herself, to free herself from sex-bondage, and good for the offspring to whom she will transmit them. For centuries women have been regarded as an overgrown child, to be cajoled or commanded, whichever was considered most necessary at the moment, but national stress has loosed the fetters that hindered her development, and I do not believe that she will ever resume her former position any more than a grown man would again try to don the little suit that he wore at school. And why should she? If man is entitled to earn his own living with the corresponding independence that accompanies such a proceeding, why should not woman be in the same position? Not one man has risked life and limb on the battlefield but for whom some mother has risked life and health in child-birth. Not to one sex goes all the dangers of life, and not to one sex should go all the advantages of life. Let us have things in their true perspective. Let women have equal opportunities with men, and pull together for benefits for both. There are other alternatives more worthy of trade unionists than driving women out of industries, and one is the shortening of the hours of labour for both men and women. To attempt to exclude the women merely on account of sex now that women are aware of their own capabilities, and have needs to satisfy, will but make them a constant menace to the men. But to retain the women, to organise them, to insist on equal pay for equal work, is to shut off the supply of cheap labour to the capitalist, and thus render their own position all the stronger.

Sheffield Independent
15-7-16.

Mobilising the Women.

Lord Meath has been expressing his views upon women's work for the State. He said: "If the war were to last they would probably find that the women would have to go through the same course as the men, and that they would all have to be mobilised. When they had got all the women they could voluntarily, they would find that there would be an outcry against those who had not come forward, and the women, he felt sure, would be as keen as the men against shirkers." We certainly hope that if such a condition were to arise the women would show more discrimination than the men, and that they would not permit themselves to be bluffed from stage to stage as the men did. And we don't believe they would. Women have finer powers of discrimination than men.

* * *

Glasgow Independent
Glasgow, Lt.
15-7-16.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

To CORRESPONDENTS.—Letters intended for insertion must be authenticated by the Name and Address of the Writers, not necessarily for publication, but as a guarantee of good faith. It is requested that correspondents write only on one side of the paper. The publishers cannot undertake to return rejected communications unless accompanied by stamped and addressed envelope, nor can the Editor enter into correspondence in regard to MSS.

COMPULSION (TO WORK) FOR WOMEN

(To the Editor of the Glasgow Citizen.)

Sir,—I do not know if "Yendys" will consider that his letter "has caught the right eye" when that eye is mine. But, at anyrate, I have read the letter. Apparently the writer advocates compulsory work for women, "between the ages of 18 and 45, married women with young families excepted." Had women the vote I would see no harm in this. If they had the privileges that men have, assuredly they should perform such duties as the State considers necessary, as men do, for the country's welfare. But to compel voteless women would be nothing else but slavery.

There are many of us working at munitions and other works, as voluntary workers, even though we "be dressed-up dollies." We are glad to work and do our bit, but if the State tries to compel us, up and down the country there will be in many cases an instantaneous cessation of work. Many women, not even Suffragists, have declared they would not be compelled to work, like chattels.

"Yendys" should be careful before stating that women are to-day idling away their time. Even working on a twelve-hour shift there are moments when the worker may be out enjoying life. If women were idling, how would the work of the country be done, now that five million men are under arms?

In another paragraph of the paper, we learn that a new work is being done by women, the loading and unloading of ships. Each day more and more work is being done by women. They do it gladly, because they do it of their own free will. To compel men who are citizens is more or less commonsense; they, at anyrate, have the remedy in their own hands. To talk of compelling women, who have no means of expressing their views, would be treating them as slaves.

I hope women will be alert and vigilant, and not allow such a wrong to be perpetrated. Women are as patriotic as men, and, because they are the daughters of men who love liberty, they will never submit to their freedom being taken from them.—I am, &c.,

EUNICE G. MURRAY.

July 11, 1916.

Sir,—I have just read in to-night's "Citizen" a letter by "Yendys" regarding work for women. I am a widow, my only son is a soldier, and I have my two little girls to work for. When women workers were called for in Glasgow, I registered myself at College Street Labour Bureau sixteen months ago. I called every Tuesday for months, but never received any work. My minister wrote to a manager in a large munition work, but, like "Soldier's Wife," I suppose I am too old at forty, although I could possibly do more work than many young women. It is the soldier's mother and the soldier's wife who could work, so if "Yendys" could do anything to get me into work I should be very grateful to him, as I am feeling the pinch very much.—I am, &c.,

A SOLDIER'S MOTHER.

July 10, 1916.

Herald
Aug 5 1916

666.
702/62

SCOTTISH NOTES

THE Glasgow I.L.P. and Trades Council held a successful demonstration on Glasgow Green on Sunday to demand "national control of the food, fuel, shipping, and other essential services as the most effective means of securing a reduction in prices." The approval given to the demonstration by all classes of the community, except the profiteers, indicates that people are getting tired of the Government's inactivity regarding profiteering, and in Glasgow they are demanding the establishment of a municipal retail market where the people would be able to buy their food supplies free from the clutching hand of commercialism. As one speaker said wisely, the Government not only expects the workers to pay the shipowners' excess profits tax and shareholders' dividends, but also to build up reserve funds to enable the shipowners to augment their fleets after the war.

The old-age pensioners are having a desperate struggle to make ends meet on 5s. a week, and doubtless many of them are being hurried to their graves because of the callous indifference of the Government to their lot. In Edinburgh 152 old-age pensioners have been obliged to enter the poorhouse as they found it impossible to live on the 5s. allowed them by a Government composed of profiteers and their accomplices. Soldiers' dependents are also complaining bitterly about the way their allowances are pinched by the food-robbers and the health of the children is suffering accordingly. The Government would be well advised to act at once if they are anxious to avoid a repetition of the rent-strikes, which caused so much strife all over Scotland last autumn.

The aliens resident in Glasgow are taking effective steps to protest against the Order in Council compelling them to enlist in the British Army under pain of deportation if they refuse to comply. There is a considerable colony of Russian exiles, Jews, Lithuanians, and Poles in Glasgow, and the majority of them are political refugees who have sought asylum here because of the persecution which they endured in Russia and other countries through their opposition to conscription and autocracy. A committee has been formed to protect the interests of the aliens concerned and to advise them as to procedure before the special Tribunals. The Lithuanians, most of whom are miners and Socialists, have their own paper, which no doubt will keep them advised as to their position.

The Scottish churches are taking an active part in the War Economy Campaign, but are evidently disinclined to enforce economy in their own circle. Thus we find that in Glasgow the "city" churches cost, for the year ending June 30, 1916, the sum of £4,619, while they only produced a revenue of £1,397, thereby involving the ratepayers in a net loss of £3,222, which amount approximates to the average annual deficit on these churches over an extensive period. The churches in question are only meagrely attended, and if the ministers in charge cannot attract self-supporting congregations then they ought to be subsidised from Church and not from public funds. We hope the ministers who are urging economy for others will not fail in economy themselves. The maintenance of "city" churches should not be a burden thrown on to the common people.

Those interested in industrial compulsion will be concerned to learn that "a contingent of soldiers, formerly following the occupation of

Daily News & Leader
9-8-16

WOMEN AFTER THE WAR.

Just Claim to a Voice in the Industrial Settlement.

The Prime Minister, on account of the pressure of the war, has declined to receive representatives of fourteen constitutional suffrage societies on the subject of the new register. They have now placed before him a statement in which they repeat that any new voting qualification or any extension of the register will compel them to raise once more the question of woman suffrage.

They point out that the exclusion of women from the register will be more intolerable than ever after the war when the problem of the readjustment of men's and women's labour has to be faced. "It is impossible," they say, "to ignore the fact that the entry of large numbers of women into skilled occupations hitherto closed to them and the discovery by employers of the great value of their labour may possibly produce an apparent clashing of interests between the sexes, and that in the solution of the problems that will arise the aid of Parliament may be invoked. It is contrary to every principle of British justice, as well as of democratic government, that such an issue should be dealt with by a body upon which two of the three parties to the dispute—the employers and the men workers—are fully represented, but over which the women workers have no control."

They also put forward the strong claim to representation of the women who have given their husbands and sons ungrudgingly for the defence of their country.

Daily News & Leader.
9.8.16.

The Belfast Corporation yesterday refused to co-opt Mrs. McMordie, ex-Lady Mayoress, as a Councillor for the Pottinger Ward on the ground that the electors had not given a mandate for the admission of women to the Corporation.

WHAT OUR READE

Government and J ws.

G. Brandt and W. Chadwick (Oxon), secretaries, write from University Union, Manchester, on behalf of a group of Jewish students, giving a statement of the views of the rank and file of Russo-Jewry with regard to the new Conscription proposals. In drawing up this statement the group has endeavoured to avoid throughout the expression of its own personal opinion, and merely to present the case against the proposals as it appears to that huge majority of Russo-Jews whose ignorance of the English language prevents them from pleading their own cause. The statement is very able and thoughtful. It is too long for reproduction, and in any case some of the points have already been made in our columns. The conclusion is as follows:

We are convinced that the scheme as suggested by the Government places Russian Jews in a worse position than Englishmen. The sacrifice demanded from them is entirely disproportionate to the rights and privileges which they enjoy, and in return for which it is asked. Their British co-religionists have performed to the full extent their duties as British citizens and have amply shown their patriotism. But Russian Jews are in a different position, and different duties must be expected from them. In the framing of the scheme no consideration has been given to the peculiar political, social, and economic position of these Jews.

We appeal to the British Government and to the public to see that in this war on behalf of the weak and small nationalities, justice will be done to the weakest and to those who have no country at all.

The Committee of Delegates of the Russian Socialist Groups in London send us a strong criticism of the further statement of the Home Secretary in the House of Commons on July 24. They show that despite t many quarters against t the official attitude re same as before.

Irishwomen on Nati

The Committee of th national League say in t
President Wilson: We, women, affiliated with t mittee of Women for Pe to you as head of the gr under whose benevolent has grown up in peace your good offices on nationality.

In your address of May the attention of the civil hopes in many quarters, y

(1) Of the interest which in desiring peace in which they may pla settlement of the ment of international tion; further, you su
(2) as a basis towards secu formation of "a u nations"; and, finall
(3) you lay down, as on maxims which shoul
such an association, of the world have t
same respect for s territory and their i and powerful nations

If this maxim is to be obs that in the projected asso in any international conf formed on the conclusion

The Herald
Aug. 5, 1916

666.
702/62

The Herald

with which is incorporated the "Daily Herald."

EDITED BY GEORGE LANSBURY.

Editorial Offices: 21, TUDOR-STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Subscription Rates: Quarterly 1s. 7½d., Half-yearly 3s. 3d., Annual 6s. 6d.

NOTICE.—The Editor will be pleased to consider any MSS. submitted. Each must be accompanied with stamped addressed envelope if return is required. While every reasonable care will be taken, no responsibility can be incurred for the loss of any MSS., nor can correspondence be entertained on the subject.

THE RIGHTS OF MACHINES.

IN all times and seasons the capitalist mind remains the same. Engaged in what they profess to regard as a war for human freedom, the capitalists cannot fling off their old habits of mind, or believe that the workers are really men like themselves. British citizenship, they tell us, is a glorious possession; but they cannot see that citizenship is valueless if the life of the citizen is warped and thwarted by the conditions under which he works. War or no war, the employer still regards the worker as a wage-slave, part of the plant of the factory from which he draws his wealth. The worker is a machine, with one important difference. If a machine wears out, the owner must replace it at his own cost; if a man wears out, the owner can hire another in his place without loss.

This point of view is clearly illustrated by the current issue of the Times Engineering Supplement, a publication which all Trade Unionists who like to know what their employers are thinking would do well to read. The first leading article in this number is entitled "Holidays for Machinery," and the opening deserves quotation and comment. Dealing with the decision to postpone holidays indefinitely, it makes these remarks: "It must be remembered that, even if the human element of the factory is capable of working seven days a week for long periods without a rest, it is certain that the machinery equipment of the workshop fails to respond to the whip of necessity to the same extent as the worker. All who are familiar with workshop practice are aware that it is impossible, whatever may be the endurance of the machine-minder, to overload the machine itself without reducing it to a condition which may seriously affect output."

This must surely take away the breath of every decent man who reads it. In our philosophy, the machine was made for man and not man for the machine; in our philosophy, machines have uses, but men have rights. In the philosophy of capitalist production, everything is reversed. Men have their uses, because they can be made to yield a profit; machines have their rights, because they cannot be replaced without loss. Man was made for the machine; and in place of the sanctity of human life we have the sanctity of expensive machinery.

A system based upon so callous and inhuman a philosophy cannot stand. This is our firm and constant belief; but we must not disguise from ourselves the difficulties of overthrowing it. It is deeply rooted in our social and industrial life; it is an integral part of capitalism and of the sordid trade of profit-making. It can be changed only by the revolt of man against the tyranny of the profiteer and the machine, by a firm determination on the part of the workers so to organise as to win control of their working lives. Against the machine philosophy of capitalism, we must set the human philosophy of Socialism; in place of the domination of man by the machine we must set the domination of the workshop by the workers.

In some respects the events of this war may be bringing us near to our goal, by awakening in the working class a new spirit which will make them no longer content with the old conditions. Labour has received so many proofs of the fact that the whole fabric of society rests upon it that some at least of the lessons must have gone home. But, if the war has brought some spiritual gains to the workers, it has brought immense material gains to the employing class. In many ways the war has given the capitalist his chance, and the use he has made of it is amply illustrated in this single number of the Engineering Supplement which we have taken as our text. The second leading article is suggestively headed "Women and Engineering," and its object seems to be the provision of hints to employers as to the best ways of keeping on women after the war. We speak without hostility to the introduction of women into industry, and we can claim to be among the best friends of women workers. But women themselves will be the first to realise the dangerous character of the proposals made by the Times. There has been, we are told, a "deep-seated opinion" that "so valuable a source of labour supply must be utilised by the engineering industry for manufacture after the war"; but "it has not been easy to see how woman was to be assigned a permanent place in the workshop without such an upheaval of old traditions as might precipitate a bitter industrial struggle." But now, it seems, a remedy has been found. Those "associated with a well-known firm" are to establish a factory in Scotland on a permanent footing in which women only are to be employed. While we are certain that there are few branches of engineering work in which such a factory could at present hope to succeed, the idea is full of danger. Trade Unions have been guaranteed the restoration of pre-war conditions; but how does this apply to new establishments? It looks as if some employers intend to establish factories in the country, where Trade Unionism is weak, and there to take on cheap women's labour for the purpose of undercutting standard rates. Any such project requires careful watching, and it is well for Labour to have the plans of manufacturers revealed by the capitalist Press.

The fourth leading article in the same issue of the Supplement also invites notice. It refers to the British Industries Association, a projected grand national capitalist combination which, while its main object will no doubt be that of "dishing" the foreigner, will certainly not hesitate to dish the British workers if it gets the chance. The formation of such combines, and the manner in which British employers are seeking for means to make permanent the advantages gained during the war, point to the need for a great awakening on the part of the workers. There are two ideals before us. The capitalist sees in the events of the war an unprecedented opportunity for a demonstration in Prussian efficiency. Cheap labour, aided by scientific management, is to drag down working-class standards and to make the individual worker, more than ever before, a cog in the wheel of machine production. The power of Trade Unionism is to be broken, and capitalist greed is to find free play for profiteering and exploitation. That is one ideal which is being set before us for the days after the war—the ideal of capitalism, of reaction, of the Times Engineering Supplement. But there is a better ideal towards which the working class must strive. We shall only defeat the base idealism of the capitalists if we can set against it a noble idealism of our own. In place of servility we must exalt personal freedom; in place of bureaucracy, we must put the free association of the workers. Trade Unionism must become idealistic, and must set before itself a wider aim. Otherwise, with the material forces arrayed against us, we shall slip back after the war into a worse tyranny than we have yet endured. The Times has its ideal: for the capitalists, profits, and for the machine-minder, endurance. Our demand must be for a social system based upon self-government, in industry no less than in politics. True efficiency is to be found not in the machine-made and degrading methods of capitalist Prussianism, but in the free play of democratic intelligence. It is for the workers to choose which they will have, and, when the time comes, to back their will by deeds.

19.8.16 ~~19.8.16~~ 702/63 666 702

Daily News & Leader

Daily Mail 23.8.16

AFTER THE WAR.

IV.—THE TWO MAIN PUZZLES: WOMEN IN INDUSTRY AND "SCIENTIFIC MANAGEMENT."

By SIDNEY WEBB.

We have seen that, whilst the grant of a constitution to the factory and the mine may be the only way to prevent the Industrial Conflict to which the autocracy of the employer will inevitably bring us, no constitutional machinery, however perfect, will, in itself, supply a solution of the problems of industrial organisation. We are warned by a whole century of experience that not even the most effective democratisation of control will prevent a disastrous lowering of the Standard of Life without the adoption of regulations, and especially of systems of remuneration, that will automatically counteract this constantly working tendency of competitive employment. Not even the fullest representation of the workers on joint committees will avail to prevent the recrudescence of such anti-social devices as Limitation of Output, Demarcation Disputes, and the exclusion of those "who have no right to the trade" on the part of workmen who, owing to the failure of their representatives to solve the problem, feel their accustomed livelihood slipping from them. The two main difficulties which the Government has to face, in any reconstruction that will not only prevent Industrial Strife, but also, in the words of Mr. Asquith's new pledge, "secure a fairer distribution amongst all classes of the products of our industries," are the entrance into occupations hitherto monopolised by skilled craftsmen of women and other new workers; and the great extension of the piecework which is an element in what is known as "Scientific Management."

Now it is not irrelevant to observe that the difficulty of solving both these problems will be enormously increased or diminished according as the Government fails or succeeds in preventing unemployment. If the influences now at work to dissuade the Government from undertaking the "very serious responsibility" of daring to touch "the labour market" should prevail; if the Cabinet should decide against such a deliberate organisation of the housing, school-building, road-making, and the mass of other public orders that must anyhow be given sooner or later as will keep the aggregate demand for wage-labour approximately level, and thus substantially prevent unemployment, then any satisfactory solution of the two main puzzles may well be impossible. Against being thrown into a sea of unemployment all the trades will fight like tigers.

Six-and-a-Half Million Women Workers.

Let us take first the case of the women and other new-comers in the skilled trades. There are now probably six-and-a-half million women "gainfully occupied" in the United Kingdom, as compared with five-and-a-half millions five years ago. There are apparently nearly 300,000 more than just before the war in the principal industries; over 200,000 more in commercial establishments; over 9,000 on the railways and 7,000 in other transport work; over 63,000 more directly in the national and municipal departments—altogether perhaps 650,000 who have come in during the war, but 100,000 of these have merely shifted from domestic service, etc. Thus the war has merely increased the total number of "gainfully occupied" women by as many in two years as they increased during the preceding four or five years of peace. But besides this not very important quickening of the pace, there has been a new opening of gates. Women have been put to many kinds of work hitherto supposed to be within the capacity of men only; and they have done it, on the whole, successfully. In the same way many thousands of unskilled labourers have been put to new jobs, many of them hitherto reserved for skilled men; and they have rapidly become expert at these tasks.

Keeping up the Standard Rate.

Whether or not we can get over this difficulty peaceably depends, it is necessary to repeat, on whether or not there are, in the first year of peace, thousands of men walking the streets unemployed. If the Government lets this happen (as It is this delicate adjustment that the Government will have to make, perhaps by one of the devices suggested below (prescribing minima only, and securing by law the rigid enforcement of the minimum rates thus fixed). Only at this price can very serious trouble be averted. The same principle applies to the newly introduced unskilled men. It could equally be applied in solution of the difficulties presented by Demarcation Disputes, and by the admission of outsiders to a trade.

No less grave and no less complicated is the difficulty presented by the employers' insistence on what they call "scientific management." This American invention (as to which Hoxie's "Scientific Management and Labour" should be consulted) aims at greatly increasing output. As to much of it that concerns the greater use of machinery, the provision of the very best appliances, the better organisation of the factory so as to avoid waste of time or discontinuity of work—all this amounting to a severe indictment of the knowledge and capacity of our own factory managers—we need say nothing here. Nor need we criticise the application of brains to find out how each job can be most efficiently done, least of all the discovery of the proper intervals of rest and change of motion so as to minimise fatigue. What is dangerous is the introduction (and this is an integral part of the scheme) of payment by the piece, without any guarantee for the maintenance of the standard rate. One of the changes of the past two years under the Munitions Acts, which the Government has pledged itself to reverse, is a vast extension of piecework, in one or other form, to jobs formerly paid for by time rates.

Workmen and Piecework.

What is the workmen's objection to piecework—an objection in which they are now upheld by all instructed economists? It is that, however liberal may be the piecework rates fixed at the outset, managers and foremen cannot refrain, and never do refrain, as is proved by a whole century of experience in all countries, from sooner or later "cutting" the rates, when the workmen have increased their output (and the intensity of their effort). This is, of course, a fraud on the workers, who have been tempted to substitute piecework intensity for timework intensity; and then eventually find themselves giving piecework effort for no more than their old timework earnings. The standard rate of pay per unit of effort is thus subtly lowered. Against this every workman revolts. The result is, if not a series of embittered strikes, sullen resistance to "speeding up," more or less concerted limitation of output, refusal to make the best of machines, "ca' canny" in all its forms—in short, the parlous state into which this ill-considered and, in fact, fraudulent action of the employers had brought some of our factories prior to the war.

Their Objections.

Now, workmen do not really object to piecework as such—they usually prefer it, and more than half the trade unions actually insist on it. But what every instructed trade unionist fights against is a system under which the piecework rates (a) are autocratically fixed by the employer; or (b) are not settled by collective bargaining; and (c) do not embody some effective safeguard against a subsequent "cutting of rates," either for the same or similar jobs, or for all the work of the trade, contrary to the implied agreement to maintain the Standard Rate per unit of effort.

What has to be discovered and adapted to the special circumstances of each industry, is some permanent and automatically acting brake on the successive lowering of the piecework rates—not in order to ensure that the individual workman shall take home undiminished earnings (comparatively a minor matter), but in order to maintain undiminished for all the workmen in years to come the Standard Rate per unit of effort. The problem has been solved in some industries; in fact, a whole wealth of experiment, hitherto usually ignored by employers and trade unionists in other industries, as by the

---

EDUCATED WOMEN'S WORK AFTER THE WAR.

FROM LADY BRYCE.

To the Editor of The Daily Mail.

Sir,—In view of the anxiety which is being felt in many quarters about the position of educated women after the war who have been temporarily filling the places of men, it is perhaps well to make a public announcement that the Central Bureau for the Employment of Women is specially occupying itself with the investigation of the matter and its practical treatment.

The bureau deals with many thousands of educated women every year, and has, therefore, a wide experience. Particulars of new openings and how to enter them are offered to the younger women, for whom there is an urgent demand in new and permanent occupations. Our Information Department is open to all inquirers. We invite the co-operation of all who are interested in plans for reconstruction and reorganisation.

E. MARION BRYCE,
Chairman of the Executive.

Central Bureau for the Employment of Women,
5 and 6, Princes-street, Cavendish-square, W.

[illegible] supplied to the [illegible] city of men only; and they have done it, on the whole, successfully. In the same way many thousands of unskilled labourers have been put to new jobs, many of them hitherto reserved for skilled men; and they have rapidly become expert at these tasks.

Keeping up the Standard Rate.

Whether or not we can get over this difficulty peaceably depends, it is necessary to repeat, on whether or not there are, in the first year of peace, thousands of men walking the streets unemployed. If the Government lets this happen (as it need not) the unemployed men will naturally not be satisfied with anything less than the fulfilment of the nation's solemn pledge, and the ousting of the women from their avowedly temporary employment. This many employers will resist or evade, even to the extent of setting up new factories, and calamitous will be the resultant bitterness. On the other hand, if there is still work to be done, and no competent skilled men are unemployed, it would be difficult to argue, after the war as during the war, that the services of the women and of new classes of men should not be utilised. What the workmen would then mainly object to would be the chance—indeed, the certainty—of the women and unskilled men being used as a means of undermining and reducing the standard rate. If the Government takes steps (as it quite well can if it chooses) to make such a misuse of female or unskilled labour impossible, as well as to prevent unemployment, the trade unions might properly agree to release the Government from fulfilling its pledge. But not unless.

Women's Wages.

It comes, therefore (with unemployment prevented), to a question of the terms on which the new workers should be employed. Now, apart from exceptional cases, we cannot insist that women should be paid the same as men. To enact this would mean the exclusion of women from the majority of industrial employments, because the typical woman is worth less to the employer than the typical man. She is not usually available for night-work; she does not do so much overtime, and she often works shorter hours, which suit her better. She is, on an average, absent from ill-health more than a man. She is unable, on account of physical or other incapacity, to do certain services that are occasionally required. She is usually unwilling to remain long years at her work, or to undertake additional responsibility; and she is less eligible for promotion. Where both sexes are employed, additional expense is involved for superintendence, lavatory accommodation, "welfare work," etc. Thus, at equal time wages, men would oust women. Even at equal piecework rates, if the men and women really execute the same tasks, men would be preferred. What is required is—to use the words of that wonderful shilling's worth, the "Labour Year-Book"—"the fixing of a rate for men and women which shall be in equitable proportion to any less degree of physical endurance, skill or responsibility exacted from the women, or to any additional strain thrown on the men, and which shall neither exclude women on the one side, nor blackleg men on the other."

per unit of effort.

What has to be discovered and adapted to the special circumstances of each industry, is some permanent and automatically acting brake on the successive lowering of the piecework rates—not in order to ensure that the individual workman shall take home undiminished earnings (comparatively a minor matter), but in order to maintain undiminished for all the workmen in years to come the Standard Rate per unit of effort. The problem has been solved in some industries; in fact, a whole wealth of experiment, hitherto usually ignored by employers and trade unionists in other industries, as by the economists, lies open to the inquirer.

The Need for Rate-fixers.

The devices found successful in safeguarding the Standard Rate, whilst allowing piecework or "premium bonus" systems, seem, fundamentally, to fall into three classes. There is the collectively-bargained-for "List of Prices," unalterable by the employer, however much the workmen may earn. These piecework lists, of which hundreds are published by the Board of Trade, are often (as in the cotton trade) of great complexity, and (as in the boot trade) successfully applied to jobs varying in minute details. Where the variations are incessant, almost every job differing from the last, the device of a salaried and disinterested Rate-Fixer, or couple of Rate-Fixers, has been found successful (as among the brassworkers and some of the coal-miners), "pricing" each new job on the agreed basis of a standard time rate. Where women are employed, there ought to be a pair of such Rate-Fixers, one of each sex. Failing such independent rate-fixing, an automatic brake on the employer's constant reductions was found, a quarter of a century ago, by some of the branches of the Amalgamated Society of Engineers (have they now forgotten it?) in the Guaranteed Time and a Quarter, a standing agreement with the employer that, whatever the piecework rates, every workman in the shop should always be guaranteed a minimum earnings each week, of "Time and a Quarter." The importance of this rule was that the employer found that it did not pay to "cut" the piecework rates or premium bonus times below such a minimum level, because in such case he failed to evoke the piecework intensity that he desired.

There may well be other devices equally effective. But, in one or other way it is vital to Industrial Reconstruction to make it impossible for the employer to use either the labour of women and unskilled men, or the substitution of piecework for timework, as a means of reducing the Standard Rate of remuneration, not merely per hour, but also per unit of effort. We must not only replace the autocracy of the employer by a constitution for the factory and for the trade, but also place in the hands of the representative Workshop Committee or Trade Board some device effective in preventing, whether by the employment of women or the use of piecework, any degradation of this Standard Rate.

Mr. Sidney Webb's previous articles in this series were published in "The Daily News" on July 28 ("Disbandment"), August 3 ("The Prevention of Unemployment"), and August 12 ("The Industrial Conflict").

The Star.

24-8-16.

A HINT FROM LADY BRYCE.

(To the Editor.)

Sir,—Anxiety is felt in many quarters about the position of educated women after the war, who have been temporarily filling the places of men. The Central Bureau for the Employment of Women is specially occupying itself with the investigation of the matter and its practical treatment. The Bureau deals with thousands of educated women every year, and has, therefore, a wide experience. Particulars of new openings and how to enter them are offered to the younger women, for whom there is an urgent demand in new and permanent occupations. Our Information Department is open to all inquirers. We invite the co-operation of all who are interested in plans for reconstruction and reorganisation.

E. MARION BRYCE
(Chairman of Executive, Central Bureau for Employment of Women).
5 and 6, Princes-street,
Cavendish-square, W.

WOMAN'S PLACE IN INDUSTRY.

PROBLEMS THAT MUST SOON BE FACED.

Concern for the problem of demobilisation continues (says the quarterly report of the Management Committee of the General Federation of Trade-Unions). Criticism of the Government's delay in formulating proposals loses point in face of Labour's similar inactivity. No general or reasonably clear understanding has been reached in respect of women's trade organisation, yet women will be the most important factor in the after-war problem of employment and wages. She will inevitably lower the general average of men's wages unless very definite steps are taken to develop within her the spirit and power of resistance.

"Evading the problem does not solve it, and the wisest thing the trade-unions could do would be to set aside a portion of their time and money for this purpose. The woman is in the factory, she is working the machine, she is welding and brazing, and she is doing these things in a manner which at present wins commendation from her employer and the factory inspector. She is doing these things at rates which are lower than men's rates.

"Is she to continue on this work? If so, is she to continue at lower rates? Or, will the trade-unions take the matter in hand and help her to organise. These are questions that should be answered now."

Daily News & Leader

Aug 26, 1916.

AFTER THE WAR.

V.—THE NON-ADULT.

By SIDNEY WEBB

The nation does not realise to what an extent its boys and girls are helping to win the war. Among the three million workers in controlled establishments and arms fed by war orders, there are literally hundreds of thousands of "non-adults," from 13 upwards. The hundred or so National Factories already at work have on their wage-rolls boys and girls between 13 and 18 to the number of tens of thousands. At Woolwich Arsenal alone there is believed to be a larger working force of boys—I will not state the number of thousands—than in any other industrial establishment in the world. Less creditable to us as a nation is the fact that boys and girls of 13, 12, and even 11 years of age are being allowed to absent themselves from school, to the number, in the aggregate, of many tens of thousands, in order to earn a few shillings a week in industry or agriculture. We have, in the stress of war, called in even the children to help the State. How are we going to make it up to them?

The non-adults will bear their full share in the suffering that peace is destined to bring by industrial dislocation. The boys and girls now serving as inadequate substitutes for men will be discharged when men can be got; the swollen pay-rolls of the 4,000 munition factories will rapidly shrink, and the boys and girls will lose their present highly-paid jobs; there will be a sudden besieging of the juvenile departments of the Labour Exchanges, which (unless the Treasury sanctions a gigantic expansion of staff and premises) will be unable to deal with the rush of applicants for places; and whilst employers will be glad enough to pick up smart youths for new occupations at "improvers'" wages (if the trade union does not revolt against it), there will be at least as great a risk of unemployment—indeed, the same certainty of slumps in particular trades and in particular localities—for the non-adult as for the adult.

Unemployment Among Youths.

The sudden unemployment among youths in East and South-East London will be extensive and lasting. And the failure of the boy between 16 and 21 to get immediately into a new situation, when he loses his job, is nothing less than a national calamity. Unemployment is bad enough, cruel enough, demoralising enough in the grown man. But any prolonged unemployment, for the average manual working youth in our great industrial centres, is soul-destroying. Forty per cent. of all the crime in the kingdom, so the Chairman of the Prison Commission informs us, is perpetrated by youths between 16 and 21. It is literally the fact that eighty per cent. of all the inmates of our prisons are found, on investigation, to have gone to prison for the first time before they were 21. In the vast majority of cases their first offence was committed whilst they were unemployed. My inference is that, important as it is that the Government should take the necessary steps to prevent unemployment among the adults, it is still more important—nay, absolutely vital for national health—that the Government should take the necessary steps to prevent unemployment among the youths who will be discharged by the thousand when peace comes (how many thousands from the Government's own factories?).

But we cannot deal only with the particular non-adults who happen to have been engaged in "war work"—these cannot be saved from unemployment and destruction except by the means that will save equally the other workers of their own age. What the Government has to reconstruct, in order to solve this particular Problem of Demobilisation, is, in fact, our social machinery for dealing with the non-adult—what we call, for short, our educational system.

A System in Ruins.

It sounded an exaggeration when Sir James Yoxall declared in the House of Commons a month ago that "the elementary school system of this country is in ruins." But there is a sense in which this startling statement is quite true. It is not merely that the children are slipping out of school-attendance, that hundreds of school buildings have been taken for Army needs, and that the supply of teachers has 80 per cent. of the whole cost by grant in aid in order to overcome municipal apathy.

A determined Minister of Education with anything like a free hand from the Cabinet would put such pressure on the Local Education Authorities, by honours and rewards to those who did well, no less than by holding up to public opprobrium and by reducing the grant to those who lagged behind, that he might (a) make elementary schooling genuinely obligatory and universal, even in Ireland; (b) insist on having enough really qualified teachers at decent salaries; (c) compel such a reorganisation of schools and classrooms as had already been adopted in principle at London and Bradford, to bring down the maximum class to not more than 40, and the average per teacher to fewer than 30; (d) make the leaving age everywhere effectively 14; (e) secure by-laws limiting much more severely than at present the employment of children out of school-hours; (f) get everywhere an adequate provision of Maintenance Scholarships to enable, not merely the budding geniuses but all bright children to continue their education; and (g) induce every local authority to complete its numerical quota of secondary schools and training colleges.

Anæmic Universities.

What would do most to invigorate and vivify the feeble score of Universities, which is all that this nation at present affords (and most of these are anæmic from a shortage of students having both brains and enough to eat), would be the establishment at each of them of at least 100 national scholarships of the value of not less than £150 a year, given in open competition to the ablest young people of each adjacent area proposing to follow one or other brain-working occupation. This sounds like an extensive program. But it is literally true that the whole of it needs no alteration of the law. It requires only a wisely imaginative use of the grant in aid; the tactful distribution of knighthoods to mayors, chairmen of education committees and local education officers who push their local authorities on in advance of the ruck; the incessant harrying of the laggards, with an organised campaign of persuasion of the obstructive local potentates; and the effective local publication of really stinging reports on the authorities that are most backward, with a demonstration of the injury done to the ratepayers in the shape of substantial reductions of the grant in aid. If the Minister of Education was as keen about getting his job done as the Minister for Munitions is, can anyone picture what a change there would be? But Parliament, besides at least doubling the present Education Votes, will need to raise the school-leaving age, at any rate to 15.

Half-time for Adolescents.

Such education proposals are, however, the stalest of commonplaces. What will strike the ordinary citizen as revolutionary is the demand now made on all sides—by the practical teachers, by the Government health experts, by the economists, by Lord Haldane every time he speaks—for the rescue of the precious years of adolescence from enslavement in wage-earning. These years, from 14 to 21, must now be claimed for production in the highest sense—not, as at present, absorbed in the making of material things, but dedicated primarily to the building up and training of the man and woman. We cannot create healthy and productive citizens so long as we let our boys and girls be wholly swallowed up by industrial or agricultural wage-earning at 13, or 14, or even 15. Nor will our evening class system ever suffice, in which tired teachers try to teach youths exhausted by a factory day. There is universal agreement that, if we are to have an efficient or even a healthy community, we must rescue some of the youth's time from competitive industry. We see now that there must be, in some form, half-time for adolescents. We must re-enact, in principle, the present half-time clauses of the Factory Acts, and prohibit employers from employing youths under 18 (or even under 21) for more than 30 hours per week; with possible alternative systems, allowing the ticular Problem of Demobilisation, is, in fact, our social machinery for dealing with the non-adult—what we call, for short, our educational system.

A System in Ruins.

It sounded an exaggeration when Sir James Yoxall declared in the House of Commons a month ago that "the elementary school system of this country is in ruins." But there is a sense in which this startling statement is quite true. It is not merely that the children are slipping out of school-attendance, that hundreds of school buildings have been taken for Army needs, and that the supply of teachers has been knocked on the head. What is even worse is the demoralisation of the Local Education Authorities, the "slipping up" of the machinery for securing attendance, and the sudden loss of faith in the validity of the structure which Whitehall has been painfully building up. The nation is half-conscious of the ruin. Public opinion, as yet very little concerned about preventing unemployment, is already whole-hearted about improving our educational system. Nothing meets with more acquiescence (outside the households of Lord Midleton and Lord Cromer) than the boldest demands for educational reconstruction. The nation is prepared for an authoritative lead, and will eagerly adopt any reasonably plausible Government plan, if it is only large enough! And we have come to the point when, as Mr. Henderson emphasised in moving the vote for the Board of Education, we know that "it is a question of money, more money, and still more money." We are spending only 18 millions of national and 11 millions of local funds on education of every kind—less than threepence per week per head! After the war the vote for the Board of Education will need to be at least doubled.

The Home Child.

What social provision do we need for the Non-Adult? Let us begin at the beginning. At present our Local Education Authorities are hampered because the material on which they have to work is largely spoilt when it is handed over to them. The physical wreckage among the children under school-age, due simply to social neglect, is appalling. The Local Government Board and the Board of Education are now making a good start with their schemes of maternity provision and infancy care, their "Baby Clinics" and Schools for Mothers. Up to twelve months old the Health Visitors look after the infants; and infantile mortality has already gone down by 30 per cent.! The unguarded tract is now between the ages of one and five. Only in one or two pioneer boroughs does the Local Health Authority look after the children in these perilous years, in which the lives of tens of thousands of our future citizens are wrecked. The London Education Authority has distinguished itself by turning 50,000 of them out of the infant schools into the gutters. We need (i.) to make the maternity and infancy provision, now elaborately prescribed in the L.G.B. circulars, obligatory on all Local Health Authorities; (ii.) to extend its scope right up to school age; (iii.) to pay at least agricultural wage-earning at 10, 12, or even 15. Nor will our evening class system ever suffice, in which tired teachers try to teach youths exhausted by a factory day. There is universal agreement that, if we are to have an efficient or even a healthy community, we must rescue some of the youth's time from competitive industry. We see now that there must be, in some form, half-time for adolescents. We must re-enact, in principle, the present half-time clauses of the Factory Acts, and prohibit employers from employing youths under 18 (or even under 21) for more than 30 hours per week; with possible alternative systems, allowing the devotion to training of whole months at a time, for agriculture, seamanship, etc.

Labour and Education.

From the standpoint of Labour, this would mean, virtually, halving the number of boys in industry; and the consequent stoppage of the misuse of boy-labour for other than apprenticeship purposes. A period at which it is all-important to prevent unemployment, and especially unemployment among youths, is just the time for such a revolution. Its gradual introduction would in itself enable the Government absolutely to prevent all unemployment among young people. From the standpoint of education, the change would involve the preparation of the best possible curriculum for some millions of boys and girls at the most formative period; attending, according to the industry in which they were engaged, either alternate half-days or days, or alternate weeks, months, or seasons, for a duly organised mixture of physical and technical and intellectual training. This might be completed by whatever training in drill and the use of arms is deemed requisite. Meanwhile there need be no interruption of industrial employment, wage-earning, or home life. The farmer's boy, the van boy, the errand boy, the newspaper boy, the "glue boy" of the carpenter's shop, the shipyard rivet boy—if these are really the best uses to which employers can put boys—might still continue; but the nation would at least be doing its best, by their Half-time Training, to prevent them from graduating as hooligans and unemployed corner-boys into the gaol. We want, it need hardly be said, for all our bright boys and girls an abundance of Secondary Schools and Maintenance Scholarships. But more important than these is Half-time Continuation Schooling—physical, technical, and intellectual—up to at least 18 for those whom we now permit the employers to take wholly into their service at 14. And now is the time, just when the Government, as we may believe, is concerned to prevent the occurrence of unemployment, especially unemployment among youths, for the preparation of such a scheme of Half-time for Adolescents, to be put in force as soon as Peace is declared.

The Yorkshire Post.
August. 31, 1916.

702/66 702

INDUSTRY AFTER THE WAR.

LABOUR AND EMPLOYMENT.

MORE CRITICISM OF LABOUR EXCHANGE SCHEME.

One notable service has been rendered by our publication—and exposure—of the extraordinary scheme devised by Labour Exchange officials to place their department "over all" when peace comes again. It has opened the eyes of the public; and that is an enormous gain, since officialism of all kinds flourishes most when the community is least aware of its danger. In this particular instance it was essential to success that those outside who might be expected to kick should be kept in the dark, until possibly the shackles had got such a grip that kicking would be of little avail, and would no longer be feared by the authors of the conspiracy.

What they aim at is to elevate the status and functions of the Labour Exchange so that all industry will be in its power. It is to be the sole source of labour supply in the country. If these officials can have their way, no employer will be allowed to take a man unless he comes via the Labour Exchange, and, equally, no man will be allowed to seek work except such as the Labour Exchange chooses to send him to. This applies to all men or women who come within the scope of the Insurance Act, whether it be for health or unemployment benefits. It means that the destiny of millions of our people is to be controlled by a department of the State which before the war was pining for something to do, and which, by this time, but for the war might well have died a natural death.

This morning, we publish the third of a series of opinions which we have gathered on this preposterous scheme. Their unanimity is striking. In collecting these views, we have endeavoured to take as wide a range as possible. Trade union leaders condemn the scheme as heartily as do employers, and among men of varying shades of political thought, having first-hand contact with industry and commerce, we have yet to find one capable of tolerating for a moment the ideas underlying the scheme, least of all those who speak for agriculture, in which domain the absurdity of the scheme would be more apparent than in, perhaps, any other. But we shall give the views of agriculturists later.

Mr. W. J. Noble.

Mr. W. J. Noble, head of Messrs. Cairns, Noble, and Co., chairman of the Cairn Line of Steamships, the Tyne Port Labour Committee, and the Tyne Transport Battalion Committee, expresses entire agreement with "The Yorkshire Post" arguments against the proposed scheme, which he describes as the "veriest piffle," and might, perhaps, be best put down by ridicule. The officials responsible for drawing it up should devote their time to combing out from their departments men of military age, who would be better employed in doing military service than Prussianising this country after the war. Mr. Noble also expresses himself as alarmed at the growing bureaucratic tendency in official circles of this country.

Sir Hugh Bell.

Sir Hugh Bell, of Bell Bros. and other industrial companies, and a director of the North-Eastern Railway Company, interviewed on the subject, said he entirely dissented from the proposals, and agreed with the comments of "The Yorkshire Post." Looked at from the point of view of the men, nothing could produce more complete subservience to a Government authority than this scheme. The men would be given no choice of employment; they would be told: "You must work there, or there, and nowhere else." If the men did not like it, the reply would be: "Very well, then, you must starve." "On the face of it," said Sir Hugh with emphasis, "it is the purest serfdom ever invented."

"If 'The Yorkshire Post' is right in thinking it is the view of the Fabian Society and the Socialists, then it does not surprise me, because the whole Socialist scheme is one to deprive us of individual initiative and freedom. From the trade union point of view it means that if you are to have collective bargaining within a restricted area and within that area only, then you do away with collective bargaining altogether. The ultimate test of the freedom of buying and selling is to be able to buy and sell or to refuse to buy and sell; and this, in the labour world, involves the right to strike and to lock-out. Both as an employer and as one interested in the workmen, I decline to surrender the right to refuse to employ labour and the right which labour has to refuse to be employed by me. I will preserve his right to strike and my right to lock-out."

Sir Hugh pointed out that the proposals had a bearing on the question of the restriction of output. Some employers very often lacked real insight as to their own true interests, and took a line which had brought about restriction of labour by cutting down prices. "What an employer ought to look at is not the cost of labour, but the labour cost of the article produced. The moment you get stereotyped employment, it ceases to be in the interest of either party to increase the [illegible] men, and it will be necessary to find occupations for them if they do not elect to go back to their old avocations. In that connection, no doubt, many works erected for the provision of munitions will be converted for the production of other things. There ought, for instance, to be a great development in this country of the production of electrical machinery, and that may find a great field for women's labour. There are also many things, formerly imported from Germany and Austria, which ought to be produced in this country.

It would be interesting to consider why those responsible for the administration of Labour Exchanges desire at the present time to alter their position. They seem to be asking for more power and more substantial and palatial buildings, and this may be taken as a confession of the fact that, up to the present, Labour Exchanges have not been a success. Hence this desire for the Government to put them in an autocratic position from which they could dictate to employer and employed.

Mr. Fred. J. Kitson.

Mr. F. J. Kitson, chairman of Monkbridge Iron and Steel Company and of John Butler and Co., and ex-president of the Leeds Chamber of Commerce:

I read your article, and, speaking personally, I should be very much opposed to the proposal of the Labour Exchange officials there outlined. As you state, it would do away with all individuality in business life. Certainly, we should be very sorry to have to engage all our men through the Labour Exchange. I have just been talking to one of our managers, and I said to him: "How many men do we get from the Labour Exchange?" and he replied: "We never get anybody now; we have found out that the Labour Exchange men are no good." Similarly, I was talking to a Labour man a short time ago, and I said to him: "We find that the Labour Exchange men are no good." His reply was: "No good men will go to the Labour Exchange."

The Labour Exchange was set up to make labour more mobile—transferring it from one district where it is not wanted to another where it is; and so long as it sticks to that it is occupying its proper sphere. But to say that nobody shall take a job except through the Labour Exchange, and that nobody shall engage a man except through the same medium is ridiculous. It would certainly be disastrous to the industry of the country, and I cannot imagine that any party would make itself responsible for such a disastrous proposal. It is on a par with German methods, and if it were to be adopted the working man would scarcely be able to call his soul his own.

I suppose it is that the Labour Exchange wants something to do—something to increase its own importance. The impracticability of the scheme is best illustrated in the case of domestic servants. Mistresses usually want to know something about the girls they engage, and they would require something more than the agency of the Labour Exchange for reference. I am certain, however, that the scheme would never work, and I think you will find that that is the view of other employers.

Mr. Joseph Henry.

Mr. Joseph Henry, head of Joseph Henry, Ltd., ironfounders, Leeds, and for many years a prominent member of the City Council:-

I think it would be a great mistake if Parliament were to tolerate this kind of compulsion. My experience is that the Labour Exchange does not supply a good class of workman. What I mean to say is that they are usually men of inferior ability who do not want regular employment. Whilst the Labour Exchanges may be useful to an employer in an emergency, when he is "dead-beat" in trying to get men by the usual methods, it is not the most convenient way. If I want a moulder I want a particular kind of moulder, and most of the moulders that the Bureau would send to me would be no good for the work. If these proposals were in force, and a firm habitually rejected men from the Exchanges as unsuitable, that firm would get into bad odour, and if they were not allowed to ignore this agency in getting their men, their business might soon be in a very awkward position. I think the present system is very much better both for the employer and the workman. The manager or foreman generally knows where men can be found, and by putting a few questions can ascertain, much better than any Labour Exchange official, whether they are suitable. Then the workman seeking employment is also the best judge of the place that will suit him.

If this drastic change were introduced we should not simplify the labour problem: we should complicate it. Neither side would be able to move without consulting the Labour Exchange. The employer would have to notify his vacancies, and if a workman wanted to go to a workshop in another part of the city, in order, perhaps, to be nearer his home, he could not apply direct and wait for his chance, but must first resign and take his green card to the Bureau and let them find him a job. Under such a regime we should have planted upon us a large proportion of inefficients, and we should have difficulty in replacing them because the Labour Bureau officials would not be eager to replace their failures.

Mr. R. P. Beckworth.

Mr. R. P. Beckworth, of William Beckworth and Sons (Limited), tanners and curriers, Leeds:—

I quite agree with you that the scheme is most tyrannical, and I cannot believe that anybody outside [illegible] will look at it for a moment. But the right to refuse to employ labour and the right which labour has to refuse to be employed by me. I will preserve his right to strike and my right to lock-out."

Sir Hugh pointed out that the proposals had a bearing on the question of the restriction of output. Some employers very often lacked real insight as to their own true interests, and took a line which had brought about restriction of labour by cutting down prices. "What an employer ought to look at is not the cost of labour, but the labour cost of the article produced. The moment you get stereotyped employment, it ceases to be to the interest of either party to increase the output. The employer does not get any advantage, and the workman is under no disadvantage. The man would say: 'I will do the regulation amount and get whatever may be the wage,' and the employer would say: 'Whatever I do, I am not to be allowed to make more than a certain amount, and why should I bother?' Neither party was in a position to desire improvement. The thing proposed by the Exchanges is economically wrong, because it tends to scarcity rather than abundance."

Mr. G. B. Hunter.

Mr. G. B. Hunter, chairman of Swan, Hunter, and Wigham-Richardson, Ltd., shipbuilders:

The proposal to deprive workers of the right to choose their employment, and employers of the right to choose their workers, is well described as "bureaucracy on the rampage." Such a proposal is an outrage against liberty, but is also supremely ridiculous, and worthy of Gilbert and Sullivan, or "Alice in Wonderland." Both workers and employers should, and would, refuse to accept it.

Why should we fight and sacrifice our lives and our wages and wealth to withstand German tyranny and aggression and invasion of personal freedom, if we are to be subjected to greater tyranny and worse invasion of personal liberty by our own Government? The right to work and to choose work would be given up; and workers and employers would be subjected to the petty tyranny of local despots, who might be ignorant and might be corrupt. "Britons never shall be slaves" would have to be changed to "Britons shall ever, ever, evermore be slaves"!

If we are to hold our own in our fight for existence as a commercial and manufacturing nation after the war, we must not be handicapped by artificial and cumbrous bureaucratic interference with industrial freedom and industrial prosperity. There must be not a maximum but a minimum of red tape and official obstruction.

Mr. Charles Irwin.

Mr. Charles Irwin, of the Cramlington Coal Company, and a member of the Northumberland Coal Owners' Association:—

The memorandum has no doubt been suggested by articles of Mr Sidney Webb and others, and the first thing it suggests to any one connected with labour is, that most of the men now serving with the forces left their employment in the expectation of returning to their old work at the end of the war. So far nothing has taken place to modify that assurance. A second thought the memorandum gives rise to is, that on the termination of the war the great industries of the country will need all the labour obtainable. Take the collieries for instance. Coal output has been greatly reduced, and one of the first things mine owners will desire is to increase the output and so reduce the present high cost. There is, at present, a great shortage of coal, and if the war continues this will be increasingly emphasised.

It is also well known that the stocks of coal throughout Europe are at their minimum, and those will have to be replaced as quickly as possible to enable the work of reconstruction and restoration to be carried out. It will be impossible to replenish them with the existing tonnage, and therefore the whole of the shipyards and contingent industries will be fully occupied replacing tonnage. Shipbuilders already have orders which will keep them busy for two years.

Associated with shipbuilding is the great iron industry, and the inference is that that also will be kept fully at work. These are three of the staple industries as to which it will hardly be necessary to call in as intermediary any extraneous organisation like a Labour Exchange to deal with labour.

The problem as it appeals to me, is not so much with regard to male as female labour. Women have in many instances been taken on to do the work of his charge, but must first resign and take the green card to the Bureau and let them find him a job. Under such a regime we should have planted upon us a large proportion of inefficients, and we should have difficulty in replacing them because the Labour Bureau officials would not be eager to replace their failures.

Mr. R. P. Beckworth.

Mr. R. P. Beckworth, of William Beckworth and Sons (Limited), tanners and curriers, Leeds:—

I quite agree with you that the scheme is most tyrannical, and I cannot believe that anybody outside the Labour Exchange will look at it for a moment. Bad as it would be from the employer's point of view, it would be even worse for the workman, who has the right, and should continue to have it, of selling his labour (which is his capital asset) in the best market he can find. If the Labour Exchange people mean what they say they are up against a very big proposition.

The Labour Exchange has yet to prove itself in the sphere which it already has. It was instituted at a time when there was a good deal of unemployment in some places and a great need of workers in others. The idea was perfectly good and sound at the time, but the problem righted itself afterwards. I am rather inclined to think that in actual practice the best type of labour fights shy of the Labour Exchange, and the consequence is that employers who do apply to that agency do not always get the type of man they are looking for.

In our business the trade unions do a good deal in the way of finding their men jobs One man tells another of a vacancy; it gets known to the union officials, men are sent along, and we inquire into their qualifications and suitability on the spot. That seems to me a far more direct and simple process, and, since men do not go to the Labour Exchange, it is evident that they prefer it. In fact, the proposal is so contrary to business interests that I have no fear of the Labour Exchange officials getting their way.

Our article setting forth the features of the scheme appeared on August 3. Instalments of the series of interviews were published on August 26 and 29. O will be given later.

Everyman.
1-9-16

FEMALE LABOUR AFTER THE WAR.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—This question is one of vital importance, and therefore claims our fullest attention. We are all fully aware of the magnificent patriotism displayed by our women folk in coming forward to take the places of those who have gone forth to undertake a more difficult and sterner task. We do well to applaud their loyal action; but on the conclusion of peace and the home-coming of our civilian army what will take place?

Will the employer retain in his employment the woman worker who to-day is doing the man's work? In all probability, in most cases, public opinion will, if nothing else, prevent him from so acting if he were thus disposed.

What, then, is to happen to these loyal women folk? They must in most cases earn their own livelihood. They will not, I venture to think, return to their old situations in domestic service, whence many emanate. What, then, is to be done?

Could not colleges or schools be established in our Colonies, where there is plenty of room for new workers—colleges where suitable trades could be taught? Of course, such institutions would necessarily be State establishments, and every encouragement would have to be given to the women if they could hope to succeed.

The question is surely one of national importance, and as such we cannot afford to adopt a "wait and see" policy.

The suggestions mentioned above, though they do not give us the only way out of the difficulty, are, I venture to think, quite practicable and at the same time beneficial to the State.—I am, sir, etc.,

Q. O. STANDEA.

Evening News.
7-9-16.

SURPLUS OF WOMEN.

An Industrial Problem and How It May be Settled.

A report on the replacement of men by women in industry was submitted by a committee of the Economic Section to the British Association to-day.

Twelve months after the war, it was stated, there might be a fall in women's wages, but they were unlikely to fall to the pre-war level.

The fact that not a great proportion of the women war workers were previously occupied suggests that after the war the problem of a large surplus of women may not be so serious as has been feared.

The married women are for the most part in industry only for the period of the war, and inquiry among women workers generally shows that many of them have no desire to remain in competition with men.

702/67 666. Daily Express. 702
6-9-16

WAR WORK AND PEACE WORK.

WHY WE MUST HAVE MANY MORE PRODUCERS.

By SIR LEO CHIOZZA MONEY, M.P.

Before the war the Norman Angell theory that the outbreak of a great European war would be the signal for universal economic collapse had gained possession not only of all the shallow-brains, but of many people of worth and intelligence. I think it was largely the vogue of Norman Angellism which set so many eminent men, including the members of the Cabinet, to work to devise means of dealing with the terrible distress and unemployment which it was thought would be the inevitable outcome of the war.

If I give a few extracts from opinions uttered in the early days of August 1914 it is not particularly to reproach individuals but to illustrate the dangers which a nation runs through the small amount of study which has been given to such questions. We are constantly in need of lucid economic thought; we constantly fail to get it. As a consequence, we are again and again plunged into terrible dangers from which we only escape by prodigious efforts. In the early weeks of the war thousands of people were scared into panicky efforts to store gold and provisions; little wonder when we remember what had been drilled into them by muddle-headed writers.

PROFOUND ERRORS.

For further example, the many worthy people who in the last ten years honestly but foolishly thought that we could not afford the Navy nearly robbed us of naval supremacy and national honour. Similarly, the great, wise, and eminent persons who a year ago thought we could not afford to increase the Army nearly lost us the war. Both these profound errors had their basis in honest economic misunderstanding.

It is not merely that we had error propagated by those who have taught us to expect error. For example, when Mr. F. W. Hirst, the then editor of the "Economist," wrote on August 4, 1914, that if we went to war we might find that "in a few weeks' time half the population will be not only unemployed but in a state of revolutionary discontent," he merely said what might have been expected of him, for he appears to take delight in these misunderstandings. There was no particular cause for surprise, either, when the "Daily News" of August 6, 1914, came out with a special article headed "Employers and the Coming Distress," in which it was assumed, as a matter of course, that a state of woe was then impending.

TRADE WAS TO "STOP"!

Much more significant than these utterances was that by Sir Edward Grey himself in the House of Commons on August 3, 1914, when he said:—

"We are going to suffer, I am afraid, terribly in this war whether we enter or whether we stand aside. Foreign trade is going to stop, not because the trade routes are closed, but because there is no trade at the other end."

This proved to be a double delusion. In the first place, we have gone to war and British trade has not stopped; and in the second place neutrals, who did not go to war, have not suffered either. From Norway to the United States the neutrals are rolling in profit.

Most significant of all, the Government put on lasting record its opinion that we were going to have a terrible time by setting up a gigantic organisation for the relief of a distress which was considered to be certainly upon us. All over the country there were towns' meetings, and every one prepared for chaos and unheard of unemployment. Good people dipped their hands into their pockets to provide doles; everywhere it was [illegible] been applied by the Government to many important industries.

(4) There has been a removal of restrictions upon output

(5) Many women have taken up productive work for the first time.

(6) There has been a great contraction of the vast amount of male labour normally employed upon non-productive and uneconomic work; in some cases the unnecessary work has disappeared altogether; in others it has been taken up and is now performed by women or girls.

All these things are of very great importance and interest, but I wish to direct attention here to the last-named.

It is not commonly realised that before the war a very large proportion of our male workers were engaged in non-productive work. The facts of the case revealed by the Census of Production of 1907 are so remarkable and so pertinent to the matter we are considering that I briefly reproduce them. Here is an account of our industrial employment as it existed in 1907:—

WAGE EARNERS.

Males aged 18 years and upward	4,250,000
Females aged 18 years and upward	1,200,000
Boys and girls under 18	950,000
Out-workers, chiefly women	100,000
	6,500,000
Salaried persons	500,000
Total	7,000,000

This statement means that all our mines, quarries, mills, factories, and workshops employed only 4¼ million men, if we call a man a male person aged eighteen or upwards. But our male population aged eighteen years and upwards numbered thirteen millions. Therefore it was true that of our male population aged eighteen years and over only about one in three was engaged directly in producing industrial wealth.

What were all the rest doing? Distribution, education, Government service, commerce, etc., are all important, but can it be possible that two out of three males—to say nothing of females—were needed to carry them on, as compared with only one in three devoted to producing things? Most certainly the devotion of so large a proportion of males to non-productive tasks was not only unnecessary, but a sign and a portent of industrial decadence.

ARMY OF WOMEN.

If we consider the facts stated we are readily able to understand how it is that, in spite of taking millions of men out of work altogether, we have been able to continue and increase our production. It will be seen in a moment that if we imagine the Army promiscuously taken from all male occupations, the majority would be taken not from productive work but from services. Indeed, if we had cared to organise things properly at the beginning of the war, we could actually have raised the whole of our present Army without touching productive work at all. Although the thing was done promiscuously until well into 1915, a very large proportion of the New Army was, as a matter of fact, taken not from industry but from services.

The taking of men from non-productive employments has enabled women very easily to make substitution in many cases. A woman works the lift which before the war was worked by an able-bodied man, doing work which no able-bodied man should ever do. The laundry van, which before the war was driven by an able-bodied man, is now driven by a girl. You go to the bank and see capable young women dealing with the books and papers which yesterday were supposed to demand the services of stalwart young men.

At the insurance offices, which before the war employed a great army of young men, girls find no difficulty in assuming [illegible]

Most significant of all, the Government put on lasting record its opinion that we were going to have a terrible time by setting up a gigantic organisation for the relief of a distress which was considered to be certainly upon us. All over the country there were towns' meetings, and every one prepared for chaos and unheard-of unemployment. Good people dipped their hands into their pockets to provide distress funds; everywhere it was quaintly said, "Do not give the poor people doles; give them work."

I take some pride in the fact that I did my best to counter these manifestations. In an article written on August 5, 1914, the first day of war, and published on August 8, I said:—

"It is not true that the country need come to a standstill. . . . It is not true that millions are in danger of starvation; on the contrary, the Government can easily take steps for a man to starve less in war than in peace."

A little later I ventured to prophesy that in the then coming winter (1914-15) there would be less unemployment in the British Isles than in peace. And so it proved to be.

OUR TRADE IN WAR.

Let us remind ourselves of what has happened to British trade in this war. Here are the remarkable facts relating to our exports:—

UNITED KINGDOM EXPORTS (1) OF BRITISH GOODS AND (2) OF IMPORTED GOODS.

	Of British Goods.	Of imported Goods.	Total.
	£	£	£
July 1914 ...	44,400,000	7,800,000	52,200,000
Jan. 1915 ...	28,200,000	6,900,000	35,100,000
July 1915 ...	34,700,000	9,400,000	44,100,000
Jan. 1916 ...	36,800,000	8,800,000	45,600,000
July 1916 ...	46,300,000	7,900,000	54,200,000

During the war, as everybody knows, values have risen, but when account is taken of that fact, British exports have been well sustained. As to home trade, its volume has also been very great. Some branches of industry have been reduced, others—and these some of the most important—have enormously increased.

It is probable that the actual material production of the country, taking mining, agriculture, and manufacturing together, has been actually increased.

Without a war census of production, which is impossible in many trades, it is difficult to state the facts precisely, but there can be little doubt that what I have said represents the broad truth.

How have production and trade been maintained? How is it that we have carried on such a great proportion, if not all, of our ordinary work, and in addition done much special work, in spite of taking out of work altogether, for the purposes of the Army and Navy, some four millions of men? The question is the more important when we remember that the men removed from their normal occupations have been taken from the ranks of the youngest and most vigorous. No more important question could be considered in relation to our future.

We have found compensation for building up a great army in a number of different ways, the chief of which are:—

(1) The men remaining have, as a whole, produced more than in peace.

(2) There has been a better organisation of production in some trades, notably the engineering trades.

(3) Large amounts of new capital have bodied man, doing work which no able-bodied man should ever do. The laundry van, which before the war was driven by an able-bodied man, is now driven by a girl. You go to the bank and see capable young women dealing with the books and papers which yesterday were supposed to demand the services of stalwart young men.

At the insurance offices, which before the war employed a great army of young men, girls find no difficulty in accomplishing the work. At the offices of the National Health Insurance Commissioners the work is being done by girls quite as well as by the battalion or so of men who recently were thought to be needed for it. In tens of thousands of commercial, Government, and local government offices female labour is doing what the other year was thought to be men's work.

WHEN PEACE COMES.

Some people imagine that when peace comes things ought to go on as before. It will be a most unhappy thing if it proves to be the case that the old occupations are resumed by our young men. But how is it to be prevented? How is the nation to get on to better work as a whole? That is really the main question that will arise when peace comes.

To my mind, the answer is to be found in a determination by the country, taking expression through the powers of Government, that we will employ the national powers to the best advantage. Just as now in war we say we must have so many field guns and howitzers of various calibres, so many machine guns, so many rifles, so much high explosive, so much propellant, so many bombs, so many grenades, so many wagons, so many horses, and so forth, so in peace it is possible for us to determine that we will have such and such a production in various great industries and in agriculture. If we do that, all the rest will follow.

We have learned in war, too, how quickly men and women adapt themselves to new employments. I could give case after case in which men who not many months ago knew nothing about tools are now tool-setters, or in which women who a few months ago were doing odd jobs or were in domestic service are now doing "skilled work" with machine tools. The idea, therefore, that because a man was a petty clerk, or a shop assistant, or a lift-man, or a driver, or a door-opener, or a tout, or a commission agent, or something of that sort, before the war, he must necessarily go back to his old job, while the woman who has taken his job is to return to her old work, is entirely mistaken.

Organise our power supply; reform our railway system; set to work on a decent canal system; determine production in the metal trades and the chemical trades; enlarge our wheat area definitely and compulsorily. Do these things, and there will be such a call for labour in connection with them, and in connection with other useful employments arising from them, that in peace as in war, we shall find that the difficulty is not to find jobs for the men, but to find men for the jobs.

In short, all the talk about what we are going to do with the men when they come back is unnecessary. We have only to set about the enormous amount of work which needs to be done and the alleged problem will solve itself.

The Herald.

702/68

2 9 16

The Herald

with which is incorporated the "Daily Herald."
EDITED BY GEORGE LANSBURY.
Editorial Offices: 21, TUDOR-STREET, LONDON, E.C.
Rates: Quarterly 1s. 7½d., Half-yearly 3s. 3d., Annual 6s. 6d.

TRADE UNION CONGRESS

The Trade Union Congress of next week bids fair to be the most important in the whole history of British Labour. It may be the last held before the declaration on it lies the responsibility of declaring Labour's the greatest problems which can confront a nation. Numerous and important motions to be discussed—ding that the Government shall fulfil its pledges the restoration of Trade Union rights and rules r, one proposing the holding of an International Labour side by side with the formal diplomatic will discuss the terms of peace, one suggesting economic reforms as a constructive alternative ious and destructive proposals of Protection, one scheme for the provision of employment upon the on of the six or seven million workers now em-oldiers or upon war work, one pressing for the ompulsory service—amid these and many more, hole complex and various mass of theory and which organised Labour is giving the best of its service, three main points stand out as of special ance. They are (1) War and Peace; (2) Demobilisa-(3) Reconstruction.

t, as to war and peace. Where war has landed the was shown with terrible precision by Mr. Lloyd s reply to last week's Labour deputation. The cases yment of soldiers as soldiers on civilian work, under law, contrary to the most explicit Government es, were not denied. All Mr. Lloyd George had to n excuse was "urgent military necessity." He ad-at the men might have been "regarded as civi-quiet in that case the Adjutant-General "would have to supply them." As if the Adjutant-General had e power or the right to obstruct the output of muni-

But the point is, as we have always maintained, that strial conscription is the logical and inevitable corollary military conscription. The process is simplicity itself: force so many men into the Army that vital industries rippled, and it then becomes an "urgent military neces-" to put them back into industry—as conscripts. We be told that the overriding doctrine of "military neces-justifies such conscription. But, if so, we must at

The Herald.

2. 9. 16.

702/68 702 ~~600.~~

TRADE UNIONISM AFTER THE WAR - By Fred Bram

SOMETIME the war will be over. This is a certainty so obvious, the reader may say, as to cause surprise that any necessity should appear to arise for the need to call attention to the fact. But the war will not end as a result of a three or six months' notice. It will come with a dramatic suddenness not even equalled by the outbreak of war.

THE OUTBREAK OF PEACE,

as Mr. Sidney Webb so well describes it, will come upon us without warning, and if no preparations are made to meet the shock the declaration of peace may easily throw us into a greater state of confusion and more difficult to deal with than the industrial chaos which prevailed during the first few months of the war.

It also appears fairly obvious that, notwithstanding the great efforts of democratic control propagandists, the workers will exercise little or no influence on the terms of peace. They will know as much about the results of the war as they knew of the causes leading up to it. When the peace terms are signed and Tommy comes marching home he will return to face the old group of social problems. Unemployment, insecurity, and poverty will still haunt his existence, and, in addition, a new industrial condition set up by the war will increase his troubles.

Having done his bit and claimed his release, he will probably return to his old shop, sure, of course, that the patriotic employer will receive him with open arms. He may assume (the probability has been discussed even by certain Labour Members of Parliament) that the war has destroyed the class antagonism between master and man; that an alleged common cause and common sacrifice has made himself and his boss pals for life. What he will actually find has taken place in hundreds of cases during the war:

That his employer has grown rich at a greater rate than ever during the war period.

That the conditions of the factory have changed, cheap labour of both sexes employed on machines Tommy and his mates monopolised as a sacred right before the war.

And he will probably discover that he is not wanted for the reason that his boss has secured the services of a better (because cheaper) substitute. But what about promises of statesmen and documentary pledges?

POLITICAL PROMISES AND SCRAPS OF PAPER.

If any Trade Unionist assumes for one moment that the war emergency workers—men or women—are just going to pack up and quietly walk out of the engineering shops and munition factories on the declaration of peace, even to make room for returned warriors, he assumes an improbability. The delusion is dangerous, especially if those who suffer from it hold official positions. It will not be so easy, and those holding responsible positions must prepare to meet something quite different to a quiet and orderly demobilisation of our munition army.

GOVERNMENT PLEDGES. CAN THEY BE KEPT?

Take the Trade Union rule which would prohibit the employment of semi-skilled men, and especially women, on certain work. We will assume the skilled workers' Union has insisted on a complete restitution of pre-war conditions. Mr. Lloyd George has the case in hand. The employer has been notified and the effort is made. What happens? There may be three parties agreed that the old rules and conditions should be re-established—the employer, Lloyd George, and the skilled Union representatives; but

WHAT ABOUT THE WAR WORKERS?

We have first to remember that the labourer of pre-war days is no longer unskilled. He is highly skilled in one section. The same applies to the women workers. Will the ex-labourers and the women work back to their old jobs at half wages?

AND WHAT ABOUT THEIR UNIONS?

Will they order their members out of the factories—to down too return quietly, even if the opportunity exists, to the unskilled (so- occupations from which they were drawn during the war? I don' this will happen, and for the reasons stated I am very much con that the biggest difficulty facing organised Labour after the war w be the fight between the workers and the Government or the Unio the employers, but it will be between the Unions catering for un workers and the Unions representing the men whose rules hav violated for war reasons, and men who will stand to suffer perma unless a mutually satisfactory readjustment can be devised.

Taking advantage of this struggle, the politician will easily g of any pledges about the restitution of Trade Union rules. I can in Mr. Lloyd George, after some attempts to grapple with this diff meeting a conference of representatives from the Unions demanc return to the pre-war state. This is the kind of speech we could from the right honourable gentleman:

Gentlemen, I can assure you that an honest attempt has been ma secure the complete readjustment of conditions and the full restitut Trade Union rules and customs which prevailed before the war. The p we gave you when seeking your support for the main clauses of the tions Act we have earnestly attempted to redeem, but we find ourselves an obstruction difficult to remove. It is not the opposition of our p supporters, or opponents; nor the unwillingness of the employers. is some of the Unions themselves whose members are interested in the direction that stand in the way, and though we are anxious to fulfil the and spirit of our promises and pledges we can do nothing until the uni agreed amongst themselves.

And so the politician will escape. The employers will sit tight will be left to organised Labour to settle this and many other pr of peace. There is one great necessity arising out of this danger, unl we intend to play the game of the enemy. We shall have to make so arrangement for these domestic quarrels of ours to take place with letting the neighbours know all about it. I hope organised Labour w have the foresight and judgment to set up some strongly representat means of dealing with the difficulties named in this article, and by enlightened method, inspired by a tolerant regard for the interests of the workers, find some solution for this and many other problems wh will be forced upon us after the declaration of peace. Space will allow me to develop a suggested line of action which may help u avoid the pitfalls of disunity, but I would earnestly commend for thoughtful consideration of Trade Union leaders two main poi kept in mind during all attempts which may be made to avert consequences of war period developments.

They are

1.—Equal pay for work done, without sex or other distinction.

2.—A reduction in the hours of labour sufficient to make room workers, men and women.

Our line of attack and defence should be all the time against cheap labour, and just as we have made attempts to meet the displacement of labour due to the introduction of machine methods of production by reducing the normal working week and the limitation of overtime, so should we realise the importance of the same remedy to meet the increase in the number of trained workers drawn into the labour market during the war period.

Daily Telegraph. (Sheffield) 4-9-16

WOMEN WORKERS.

THEIR POSITION AFTER HOSTILITIES.

SHEFFIELD MEETING.

The position of women war workers, through the prospective or actual cessation of hostilities, was the subject which engaged the attention of a conference held on Saturday afternoon, in the Montgomery Hall, Sheffield. It was summoned by the Sheffield and District Women's Interests Association and largely attended by not only delegates from Women's Associations and their trade unions, but also by delegates from male trade unions. Mrs. H. A. L. Fisher presided.

The first resolution on the agenda asked that any woman brought into an industry during the war, who shall become displaced through the prospective or actual cessation of the war, should receive in addition to any benefit she was entitled to under Part 2 of the Insurance Act, or from her trade union, adequate out-of-work benefit, either till she gets work, or for a period to be agreed upon, this benefit to be a charge upon the Government, and, further, that the Government should subsidise adequately the trade unions to enable them to meet the increased cost of trade union unemployment benefit for their own members.

A supplementary resolution to this had been added to the agenda by the National Union of Railway Clerks (Sheffield Branch), and the Sheffield Trades and Labour Council, to the effect that the "Conference, recognising that unemployment is at all times and under all conditions inimical to the interests of the workers, declines to support any scheme which recognises unemployment as a necessary factor of social and industrial organisation; the conference therefore urges the trade unions and other labour organisations to demand that, at the close of the war, the hours of labour in all industries be so reduced as to find useful employment for all workers, male or female, who become redundant consequent upon the cessation or reduction of unproductive labour."

Mrs. Barton, who moved the first resolution, said it didn't require many words to explain it, and the fact that there was a supplementary one had taken away many of the things on the first. She wanted them to think out what they should do before unemployment took place. She was pessimistic enough to think that they would have a large number of men and women unemployed after the war. With reference to the second part of the resolution there was no reason why workers should not be helped, and she believed women would be much more hardly hit after the war than men. They were there to devise some means to help them, because workers were best able to understand workers' conditions. She complained that Sheffield was an awful place, so far as representation of the labour class was concerned, and referred to the fact that although the Parliamentary paper authorising the setting up of committees for military and naval pensions purposes stated that women should be on those committees, when the matter came to be settled by the City Council of Sheffield the women's organisations were entirely neglected.

Mrs. Pointer seconded the resolution, and said that she felt that the after-the-war problem was going to be a great one. Up to quite recently they were told their place was in the home. Since the war began they had had to get out and go into the industrial world, or else they were not patriotic. After the war there would be a lot of women displaced, and she honestly believed that the only way of dealing with the problem was to organise in time.

Doles for Women Not Wanted.

Councillor Alf Short (Boilermakers' Society) was surprised to hear Mrs. Barton calling upon the Government to supply, not work, but doles in the shape of unemployment benefit. He referred to the way the Government had organised the country for war, and suggested that it was not the business of the workers to ask the Government to provide them with a paltry dole. It was the workers' duty to demand a greater and a nobler use of the resources of the country. The Government should organise the country for the benefit of the people, as they had organised it for the crushing of the Germans.

Mr. Odum (Rotherham), as a supporter of the women's movement, thought their duty was not to go back to the home. If they did they would be putting back the women's movement several years. He suggested that the Government should provide for peace as they had done for war.

Mr. Fielding opposed the resolution, and said the only solution of the problem was the reduction of the hours of work. To take up the problem any other way was to put back the hands of the clock of progress.

Mrs. Peyce Jones would like to ask if anyone thought that the Government, as they knew it, would so quickly and practically reduce unemployment as to have no unemployment? The resolution dealt with the transition period between the end of the war and the regaining of the stability of society. The reason why the Government organised for war so successfully was because it had behind it the capitalists and the

Sheffield Independent. 666
4-9-16

WOMEN WORKERS.

702

Sheffield Discussion on After-war Problems.

702/69

STATE & UNEMPLOYMENT

A conference of trade union and other organisations was held in the Montgomery Hall on Saturday afternoon, organised by the Sheffield and District Women's Interests Association, and presided over by Mrs. H. A. L. Fisher.

Mrs. A. Barton moved the first resolution: "That any woman brought into an industry during the war who shall become displaced through the prospective or actual cessation of the war, shall receive, in addition to any benefit she is entitled to under Part 2 of the Insurance Act or from her trade union, adequate out-of-work benefit, either till she gets work or for a period to be agreed upon, this benefit to be a charge upon the Government. That the Government shall subsidise adequately the trade unions to enable them to meet the increased cost of trade union unemployment benefit for their own members.

She said that whatever the position of the trade unions, the women would be harder hit by unemployment than the men. Referring to the second part of the resolution, she urged that the matter would be better dealt with by the workers who understood the position.

Mrs. J. Pointer, who seconded, said that some of the difficulty would be met by getting the women thoroughly organised, and this should be largely done through the men's trade unions. It should be seen to that the conditions of the women were so improved that they would not simply marry for the sake of obtaining a home, but through true and natural desire.

Opposed to "Doles."

Councillor A. Short said he was surprised that the resolution sought to find a remedy not by asking that work should be found for the unemployed but by asking for doles for them when out of work. If it was the fact, as seemed to be the impression, that there would be a lot of unemployment then the country would have much more to do than find a few shillings for the persons affected. The Government should continue to organise resources after the war for the benefit of the people.

Mrs. Pryce Jones pointed out that the organisation of industry had been managed with the co-operation of the capitalists, and asked if it was likely that the same co-operation would be forthcoming to meet unemployment.

Miss O. Hargreaves said that the women with whom the resolution dealt had been employed for the nation, and asked if it was not reasonable to arrange that the nation should provide for them during any period of unemployment.

Mr. W. Kean pointed out that the trade unions had insisted that the women brought into the works should be taken out of them after the war and that no women should be retained to the detriment of the men whose places they had taken, and the question was what was to be done for them while they were out of work.

Mr. Abrahams said that his own union, the National Union of Railwaymen, were going to make sufficient room there not only for the men when they came back, but for the women who had come in, by having a shorter working day.

The resolution, when put, was defeated.

Reduced Hours as a Remedy.

Mr. A. E. Chandler, president of the Trades and Labour Council, moved that: "This conference, recognising that unemployment is at all times and under all conditions inimical to the interests of the workers, declines to support any scheme which recognises unemployment as a necessary factor of social and industrial organisation. The conference therefore urges the trade unions and other Labour organisations to demand that at the close of the war the hours of labour in all industries be so reduced as to find useful employment for all workers, male or female, who become redundant consequent upon the cessation or reduction of unproductive labour." This was seconded by Mr. Cawthorne, and after discussion was carried.

Mr. W. Kean moved and Mr. S. Partridge seconded "that as the redistribution of women's labour after the war will be largely carried out through the Labour Exchange, we urge the Government to give administrative powers to the Labour Exchanges Advisory Committees at present in existence." This was carried, as was also the following addendum moved by Mr. Abrahams and seconded by Mr. Robinson: "Provided that the Labour Exchanges Advisory Committees tion of the hours of work. To take up the problem any other way was to put back the hands of the clock of progress.

Mrs. Pryce Jones would like to ask if anyone thought that the Government, as they knew it, would so quickly and practically reduce unemployment as to have no unemployment? The resolution dealt with the transition period between the end of the war and the regaining of the stability of society. The reason why the Government organised for war so successfully was because it had behind it the capitalists and the workers. She supported the resolution.

Miss Odum (Rotherham) opposed the resolution on the grounds that if women received out-of-work benefit they would be satisfied, and she did not want them to be satisfied. It had been the policy of the Labour Party to make the workers contented. She hated palliative measures, and would rather see a wound healed than the application of sticking plasters.

Mr. Chandler (Sheffield Trades and Labour Council) said the Government raised money by taxes, and by the resolution they were asking the Government to impose more taxation. He hoped the first resolution would be defeated, and that the second would be carried.

Miss Hargreaves (Christian Social Union), after some caustic remarks on old trade union arguments used by people who knew nothing of the history of trade unions or its economics—remarks which were frequently interrupted—said most of the women they would have to deal with had been working for the nation at large, for purely national purposes, and it was only fair that these women should be allowed something to exist. They should deal with the matter in a practical way. It was no use saying—as some of the speakers had said—that by suffering they would better the lot of a future generation. People who talked like that were usually people who were not likely to suffer themselves. (Applause.) It was their duty to see that these women were not thrown on the scrap-heap. (Applause.)

Mr. Robinson opposed the resolution on the ground that it would perpetuate female labour. He believed woman's place was not in the factory; her sphere was a higher one.

Mr. W. Kean (Federated Trades Council) associated himself with the resolution. They were going to see that the women were unemployed. The agreements they made were that no woman shall be retained to the detriment of a man after the war. The capitalist would find the money for the relief of the women disengaged as they had found it for the war.

The representative of the operative section of the Railwaymen's Union objected to the last statement. Were it not for the efforts of the workers he said the promises of the capitalist to the Government would only have been so many scraps of paper.

Mrs. Barton having replied, the resolution proposed by her was put and lost by a large majority.

On the proposition of Mr. Chandler, seconded by Mr. Cawthorne, and supported by Councillor A. Barton and others, the second resolution was then put and passed.

Women's Wages.

Mrs. Wilkinson (National Federation of Women Workers) moved a resolution protesting against the rate of 4d. an hour fixed by the Government for women in engineering works engaged on work not previously done by men because it did not yield a subsistence wage at the present cost of living. She explained that the women were to have £1 a week as a datal wage, and after a learning period they were to be put on piece-work at piece rates, the same as the men when they were doing the same class of work. Many of the women who were brought into engineering work were not put on the class of work done by men. Processes were split up, and a position of sweated labour arose, because they didn't come under the L2 agreement. It was a disgraceful and scandalous thing for the Government to have done this.

Councillor Barton, in seconding, said that when the £1 was taken it was understood to be the minimum, but now it was the actual wage. Women who should be paid £3 15s. for their work were getting 22s. 6d.

The resolution was passed unanimously.

Mr. Cawthorne, and after discussion was carried.

Mr. W. Kean moved and Mr. S. Partridge seconded "that as the redistribution of women's labour after the war will be largely carried out through the Labour Exchange, we urge the Government to give administrative powers to the Labour Exchanges Advisory Committees at present in existence." This was carried, as was also the following addendum moved by Mr. Abrahams and seconded by Mr. Robinson: "Provided that the Labour Exchanges Advisory Committees be composed and controlled exclusively by trade unionists."

Mrs. Wilkinson then moved "That this conference protests against the rate of 4d. an hour fixed by the Government for women in engineering works engaged on work not previously done by men, as it is of the opinion that this rate does not yield a subsistence wage at the present cost of living." She pointed out that when the women were first brought in to the works it was arranged that they should have a minimum wage of £1 per week when learning, and that afterwards they were to be paid at the same rate as men when they did men's work. The resolution was seconded by Councillor A. Barton and carried.

The Guardian.
Sept. 7, 1916.

Labour's Plans.

It is to be hoped that the Government will pay due attention to the complaints made at the Trade Unions Congress against the war pensions system. Delegates, speaking with knowledge, urged that the delays in granting pensions are indefensible, that the amounts are often inadequate, and that many soldiers who have broken down in military service (largely, it is to be feared, as a result of the folly of certain medical boards in passing recruits who are unfitted for service) are excluded from benefit. Mr. Henderson practically admitted the justice of these grievances, and one may hope that they will be amended in process of time. But the Congress also criticised the whole pensions administrative system. At present there is a multiplicity of organisations, official, semi-official, philanthropic, and an inextricable division of responsibility. The Government has chosen to entrust the allocation of pensions in large measure to local committees. Organised labour asks that there should be a single central authority, a department of the State, operating through servants of the State. That is how old-age pensions are administered, cheaply, smoothly, rapidly, and without suspicion of undue influence. There is no good reason, apparently, why another method should be adopted in the case of war pensions. The problem of war pensions is only a small section of the problem of reconstruction after the war which occupied the Congress. One delegate professed to be impressed by the revolutionary character of some Congress resolutions; but the really impressive feature of these deliberations of labour is their conservative character. Labour asks that demobilisation should restore all the workers to their pre-war economic condition, in their old jobs if fit, with equivalent pensions if unfit. It wants the complete restoration in peace of the pre-war code of regulations and restrictions; the universal recognition of trade unions by employers; compulsory membership of trade unions; a compulsory forty-eight hours week; a compulsory minimum wage. Now all this is simply the revival and cataloguing of the orthodox and conventional pre-war Trade Unions Congress formulas.

It may be said that the vote urging measures against the importation of goods manufactured under labour conditions inferior to our own represents a new and original line of labour thought. But that is hardly the case. The Congress seems to have been confused as to what it was voting about, and this particular resolution, so far from having any novelty, is one of the stalest and most absurd expressions of Protection. In any case, it has no relevance to the special problem which awaits labour after the war as the result of the war. It may be argued that the mere fact that the Congress resolutions are limited to old and familiar labour propositions does not prove that organised labour's plans and strategy for the coming of peace are incomplete. But their inadequacy is demonstrable. What has labour to say, as Miss Macarthur asked, to the changes in process and production introduced by automatic machinery, which has revolutionised the relation between the skilled, the semi-skilled, and the unskilled worker? What has it to say to the future of the women who have entered the labour market to fill up the gaps left by the men drafted off to the army? ~~What has it to~~ say to the chaos of small and often competing craft unions, manifestly constituting a labour force inadequate to face employers' organisations, which are steadily growing more comprehensive and more centralised? What suggestions has it to offer for the control of indus-

Daily Chronicle.
8, 9, 16.

SURPLUS OF WOMEN WORKERS

INDUSTRIAL PROBLEMS AFTER THE WAR.

At the British Association meeting yesterday interest centred in the economic section, where land settlement and labour questions were discussed.

Mr. Christopher Turnor, the agricultural expert, in a paper on "the outlet for labour on the land," expressed regret that the Government had not employed thousands of German prisoners in the reclamation of land. Had they done so we might have had 50,000 acres ready for new settlement when our men returned from the war.

He emphasised the necessity for extending credit on easy terms for farmers, and said there was a general desire to get rid of the baneful influence of party politics.

The next subject in this section was the replacement of men by women in industry, on which a report was presented by a committee. The members thought the problem of a great surplus of women workers after the war would not be so serious as had been feared. The married women were for the most part in industry for the war period only, and inquiries among women workers generally showed that many of them had no desire to remain in competition with men.

But this involved the question of the increased demand for women on repetitive processes, and if, as seemed likely, the sub division of processes and the highly automatic machinery introduced owing to war conditions had come to stay, there might be a change in the relative demand for skilled and for unskilled labour to the disadvantage of the former.

The committee did not think wages would fall to the pre-war level.

The Westminster Gazette.
7.9.16.

Yesterday the Trade Union Congress showed itself uncompromising in insisting upon the restoration of all trade union conditions after the war. That the question is not without its complication was clear from the speech of Miss Mary Macarthur, who speaks for many thousands of women who have been drawn into industry, and whose claims to a place in the sun will have to be considered when we come to the period of restoration. It is not surprising, however, that the trade unionists should be suspicious. There has been talk and even writing which have suggested that the opportunity of the employers will come with the end of the war and with the return to civil life of millions of men who are now fighting. If that idea was to become generally prevalent among capitalists we should have to look forward to a long period of such industrial strife as we have not hitherto seen, and any chance of making up the ground we have lost by the enormous waste of money in the last two years would be gone.

That faith must be kept with the workers should be the first axiom of everybody who applies himself to the after-war problems of industry. We have said and we believe that the trade unionists will not prove unreasonable in this matter once the suspicion is removed from their minds that they are to be "done." New ideas of what is possible are working in the minds of labour as well as in those of the employers, and men who for almost the first time in their lives have earned and enjoyed wages which have given them a larger view of the possibilities of life are not likely to be willing to return to the harder conditions of the past. When the unionist speaks of a return to the old rules he does not contemplate that his earning power shall fall to the old level. All that he means is that the skilled man shall not be replaced in his job, and that there shall be no attempt to obtain his work at a lower price per piece than in the past.

702/70

without suspicion of undue influence. There is no good reason, apparently, why another method should be adopted in the case of war pensions. The problem of war pensions is only a small section of the problem of reconstruction after the war which occupied the Congress. One delegate professed to be impressed by the revolutionary character of some Congress resolutions; but the really impressive feature of these deliberations of labour is their conservative character. Labour asks that demobilisation should restore all the workers to their pre-war economic condition, in their old jobs if fit, with equivalent pensions if unfit. It wants the complete restoration in peace of the pre-war code of regulations and restrictions; the universal recognition of trade unions by employers; compulsory membership of trade unions; a compulsory forty-eight hours week; a compulsory minimum wage. Now all this is simply the revival and cataloguing of the orthodox and conventional pre-war Trade Unions Congress formulas.

It may be said that the vote urging measures against the importation of goods manufactured under labour conditions inferior to our own represents a new and original line of labour thought. But that is hardly the case. The Congress seems to have been confused as to what it was voting about, and this particular resolution, so far from having any novelty, is one of the stalest and most absurd expressions of Protection. In any case, it has no relevance to the special problem which awaits labour after the war as the result of the war. It may be argued that the mere fact that the Congress resolutions are limited to old and familiar labour propositions does not prove that organised labour's plans and strategy for the coming of peace are incomplete. But their inadequacy is demonstrable. What has labour to say, as Miss MACARTHUR asked, to the changes in process and production introduced by automatic machinery, which has revolutionised the relation between the skilled, the semi-skilled, and the unskilled worker? What has it to say to the future of the women who have entered the labour market to fill up the gaps left by the men drafted off to the army? ~~What has it to~~ say to the chaos of small and often competing craft unions, manifestly constituting a labour force inadequate to face employers' organisations, which are steadily growing more comprehensive and more centralised? What suggestions has it to offer for the control of industrial production by labour? Upon all these questions—and they are only a few of the many that will arise—the resolutions of the Trade Unions Congress throw no light. There is a growing conviction that the leaders of organised labour are so fully occupied with the tasks of the hour and the day that they do not allow themselves to think freely and freshly about the larger issues that arise for labour. This may not be altogether just, but certainly some colour is given to it by the proceedings so far, apart from the address of the President, of the Congress at Birmingham.

But this involved the question of the increased demand for women on repetitive processes, and if, as seemed likely, the subdivision of processes and the highly automatic machinery introduced owing to war conditions had come to stay, there might be a change in the relative demand for skilled and for unskilled labour to the disadvantage of the former.

The committee did not think wages would fall to the pre-war level.

The Westminster Gazette. 7.9.16.

Yesterday the Trade Union Congress showed itself uncompromising in insisting upon the restoration of all trade union conditions after the war. That the question is not without its complication was clear from the speech of Miss Mary Macarthur, who speaks for many thousands of women who have been drawn into industry, and whose claims to a place in the sun will have to be considered when we come to the period of restoration. It is not surprising, however, that the trade unionists should be suspicious. There has been talk and even writing which have suggested that the opportunity of the employers will come with the end of the war and with the return to civil life of millions of men who are now fighting. If that idea was to become generally prevalent among capitalists we should have to look forward to a long period of such industrial strife as we have not hitherto seen, and any chance of making up the ground we have lost by the enormous waste of money in the last two years would be gone.

That faith must be kept with the workers should be the first axiom of everybody who applies himself to the after-war problems of industry. We have said and we believe that the trade unionists will not prove unreasonable in this matter once the suspicion is removed from their minds that they are to be "done." New ideas of what is possible are working in the minds of labour as well as in those of the employers, and men who for almost the first time in their lives have earned and enjoyed wages which have given them a larger view of the possibilities of life are not likely to be willing to return to the harder conditions of the past. When the unionist speaks of a return to the old rules he does not contemplate that his earning power shall fall to the old level. All that he means is that the skilled man shall not be replaced in his job, and that there shall be no attempt to obtain his work at a lower price per piece than in the past.

very man 5-1-16

702/71 702 ~~660~~

WOMEN'S LABOUR AFTER THE WAR

THE Trades Union Congress, which opened at Birmingham the beginning of this week, will have to consider problems of a nature which have not previously been of vital interest to the principle of combination. In the first place, the trade unions will have to formulate their plan of campaign to ensure the compulsory return to trade union conditions following on war. Having decided on the necessary steps for ensuring this return the delegates will have to consider what is to be done in regard to the enormous number of women who have entered trades from which they were previously debarred. They will have to decide once and for all whether they will admit women to their unions, or whether subsidiary unions are to be formed of which the members are solely feminine. In the case of piecework but few difficulties present themselves. The textile workers of Lancashire, both men and women, are unionists throughout, and though the men earn more money than the women their rate of payment is the same, the superior strength and skill of the male operative alone enabling him to make more money than the female. In those departments of labour where payment by the hour is a rule the case is more difficult. In my own opinion, the solution most favourable to the consolidation of trade unionism would lie in the direction of admitting women to the same union as men, with a standard rate of pay.

This would obviously have the effect of reducing the number of women employed in this particular trade, and, on the whole, would be an advantage, for it would reduce the number of women in the labour market and at the same time tend to raise the wages of the men. This would mean greater comfort in the home and more leisure for the woman to fulfil those functions which from a social point of view are the most important—those of wife and mother. There will still remain, however, a considerable residuum of female labour which it will be to the interests of the employers to retain.

Of this residuum quite a large proportion will, in my opinion, and for the first time in the history of female labour, be definitely attracted by the principle of trades unionism. Before the war, except in the case of the cotton operatives and the shop assistants, women's trade unions had few members, and the industries they represented were badly paid. The women were largely recruited from the sweated workers, and their standard of life a low one both from the material and intellectual standpoint.

It was difficult, almost impossible, for them to understand that the expenditure of a few pence in a subscription to their union would ensure them, in the ultimate, higher wages and better conditions. Since the war, however, the type of woman worker has radically changed, and a very considerable number of women and young girls recruited from shops and offices will undoubtedly prefer to remain in the factories and on the farms to returning to their previous monotonous occupations.

The determining factor, however, will, I think, be found to lie in the high wages which the women war-workers have received. One of the most significant changes which has come into the life of women since the war has been the astonishing increase in the rate of her expenditure. The bun-and-milk lunch, which was responsible for that anæmia so typical of the London girl, has become a thing of the past. I was immensely interested and pleased to find the other day a party of four or five girls, workers in munitions factories, ordering their lunch at a restaurant in Oxford Street. They had a good square meal, with plenty of fruit and cream to finish up with, a cup of coffee and a cigarette. The girls belonged to the factory class, and before the war would have been found in jam or pickle factories, or establishments of a similar character, and their earnings would have been from fifteen to eighteen shillings a week, with meals to correspond. Now, however, that standard of living has been abandoned, and the factory girl of to-day is able to buy nourishing food, good boots, pretty frocks and hats to her heart's content.

That her earning capacity will remain the same after the war is, of course, impossible; but that she will remain content with the wages of pre-war days is unthinkable. Once having acquired a taste for mutton chops she will not easily go back to buns and pickles. Having received high wages she will desire their continuance, she will realise that the only method of obtaining them is to combine. And women's trade unions will increase and multiply.

And as with the working class so with the middle class girl. The earning capacities of shorthand-typists have increased from 50 to 70 per cent. since the war, and the girl who managed to exist on a pound a week has found herself in receipt of nearly as much again. She also will resent the return to a lower rate, and, like her sister in the workshop and the factory—with whom in certain cases she has been labouring side by side—will learn the lesson which women have been so long in understanding, that the only way in which the worker, either in the office or the factory, can force the employer to pay a living wage is by combination. The answer to the exploitation of the capitalists is the formation of a trades union. For the trades union holds a weapon which capital cannot ultimately withstand—the weapon of the strike. And it is the value of this weapon which the war has taught the woman in industry to understand.

MARGARET HAMILTON.

Manchester Guardian

16.10.16

INDUSTRY AFTER THE WAR.

EMPLOYERS & TRADE UNION RESTRICTIONS.

At the opening meeting of the session of the Manchester Association of Engineers, held on Saturday at the Grand Hotel, an address was given by Mr. F. W. Reed, the president. He reviewed some of the economic problems of the engineering industry in the light of the present state of war. He said that scarcely would peace have been proclaimed than industrial war would be upon us, and it was for that organisation to be prepared. Already they had warnings that enemy countries were making strenuous preparations for capturing foreign trade after the war. In most of our establishments general work had been displaced by the making of machinery for the manufacture of munitions, while in others both the shops and machinery had had to be adapted to making shell and other war material. One of the problems which would come with peace would be the readjustment of these establishments to pre-war conditions.

Dilution of Labour.

There would be the questions of restriction of output and the dilution of labour, which even now were deserving of serious consideration. For the purposes of the war, trade unions had agreed with the Government to withdraw their rules bearing upon these vital questions on the understanding that they would be reinstated on the return of peace conditions. As a set-off to these conditions the employers were called upon to make considerable sacrifices in the way of handing over to the Government any extra profits above a certain limit. If labour insisted that these rules should be restored the Government would have to comply; that was the present agreement, which could not be departed from without the consent of organised labour. Whether it would be to the ultimate interest of labour to insist on this restoration was a very important matter for consideration; both employer and labour must realise that the conditions of industry would be changed and both would have to meet the situation in a new spirit. Labour would do well to consider whether, after all, its own interests and the interests of the nation had been served well in the past, or would be in the future, by the old policy. It was obvious that a nation did not prosper by curtailing its output of things necessary for the welfare of mankind. For if our competitors produced the same things at less cost per head the trade would go to them. Our future success would depend on getting the utmost production out of our industrial equipment. The idea of there only being a certain amount of work to do, and the less any individual did the more there would be for others, was economically bad, and to follow it up was to traverse the high road to unemployment. The great amount of capital outlay expended in equipping an engineering works formed an important proportion of the standing charges; therefore the obvious policy was to obtain the maximum output per machine, even to the extent of keeping the more important ones running night and day, and to encourage the workers' endeavours. A scheme of rewarding individual effort was advisable.

Women in Engineering Shops.

The capture of enemy trade was a question of output rather than of total employment, for in normal times we had only about 4 per cent of unemployed, and if employment were found for these it could not be expected that we should be able to accomplish anything but a small fraction of the extra trade contemplated unless an understanding was come to between employer and labour to ensure greater individual output. It would be to the interest of the employer to discard out-of-date machinery and replace it with modern; more especially was this advisable with high wage rates. Then again it was not good economy to employ fully skilled men on work which could be equally well done by semi-skilled men or women. The important part women had taken in helping to carry out extra and unusual work which the war had brought about was an important industrial factor. They had adapted themselves to the novel conditions and had proved themselves capable of keeping pace with male labour on repetition work, even to the extent in some cases of giving better results. He particularly referred to output rather than to production costs. Not only had they shown themselves capable of success in engineering works, but they had taken the places of other male labour. Would these women be willing to revert to their former employment after qualifying themselves in doing work for which they had received comparatively high pay? No doubt a number working from purely patriotic motives would resume their former occupations, but others would have a strong desire to continue working in the mechanical trades. Only in rare cases were women doing the work of skilled men; in general they were employed on work of a repetition nature, but the skill which they had displayed afforded reason to

Common Cause
Sept 29, 1916

~~666~~ 702

Women's Work after the War.

MEN AND WOMEN MUST STAND TOGETHER.

There is much scope to be found for thought in certain official pronouncements of the Home Office and Trades Congress this month. I choose two merely as suggestions as to the line of thought which Women Suffragists should pursue.

1. The White Paper of the Home Office states that "several sets of operatives were kept under close observation in order that their powers of application might be investigated. The men engaged in boring the powder chamber and in turning and finishing shells were found, almost without exception, to do their work with admirable persistence, and it was very seldom that they rested even for a minute. On the other hand, the women engaged in turning fuse bodies rested for times which in the aggregate amounted to an hour and a-half out of a twelve-hour day, and over an hour out of the ten-hour day. This was probably due, not to idleness, but to fatigue, and to the instinctive knowledge that short-rest pauses were necessary to prevent undue fatigue." The final deduction of the report is that women must work shorter hours than men.

2. The London and Provincial Union of Licensed Vehicle Workers proposed a resolution asking for "a revocation of the order licensing women to act as conductors on omnibuses or trams; that all such licences issued shall be for the war period only, and that on peace being declared all such licences shall automatically expire on the date for which such licence has been issued." This was passed by the Trade Congress without discussion.

The criticism that I suggest on these declarations is that both show a want of impartiality and a want of grasp of the problem of women's work, and both reveal a state of mind which is very dangerous to the fair settlement of this question at the end of the war. The "admirable persistence" of the men is contrasted with the exhausted inaction of the women for an hour a day, due to the necessity of preventing undue fatigue. Now, if this were a correct comparison, there would be no more to say. Men would be safe from the competition of women; but what notice has been taken here of the opinions of the heads of munition factories all over the country, and announced by the journalists sent on a semi-official mission by the Ministry of Munitions, that the women's output has been from two to two and a-half times that of men in these workshops?

When that announcement was published months ago, many of us foresaw the consequences that would follow. Women had been urged by the authorities to be patriotic, to think not of the conditions of their work, but of the needs of the soldiers at the front. Accordingly, they exerted themselves to the utmost of their powers, and their output naturally exceeded the men's. The men knew from years of experience that such an output could not be kept up, without a terrible sacrifice of working power in the future, and they would not attempt such speeding up. Is it any wonder that they are able to work more hours a day without rests when they work at half the stress? And is it not very likely that the suggestion of fewer hours for a working day for women is an attempt to keep the output level?

The White Paper speaks of the lighter types of work being kept for women, "as it is a waste of muscle to appropriate these to men, or even to youths," quite regardless of the fact that some strong athletic women can do without effort what many delicate youths could only do at risk of their lives.

Again, in whose interest is it that "sedentary gauging operations should evidently be confined to women and girls?" Nature, I suppose, built women to sit everlastingly on seats, and men to improve their muscular power by movement!

The report seems to regard the ideal workers as machines—those labelled men doing this work, and those labelled women doing that, and all forced to take their rest times compulsorily and equally, and "the rest pauses at other times checked as far as possible."

Now, turn to the Trade Congress resolution, passed "without discussion." No one is asking that a woman who has taken a man's place should not give up that place to the man if he is fortunate enough to come back to it at the close of the war. Everyone agrees that it is his. But how many men, unfortunately, will never come back, and how many will not return to the same work, and in these cases why should women be turned out? We read with grim amusement that the old arguments were advanced that the work was bad for women's health and "morals," and we could almost apologise to the next cheery 'bus conductor we pay our fare to for the insult thus put upon her. The important thing, however, is for us to read these quotations in the light of our knowledge of the crisis that is coming on us at the end of the war.

Women Suffragists demand equality in the industrial and political world, knowing well that it is in the interests of women and men alike. We do not wish for any reduction in the rate of wages in any trade nor an addition to the hours of labour. We wish to level up, not down. We know that what we aim at is for the general good of all the workers.

There will be two alternatives before the men at the close of the war. They will be wise enough to recognise facts, always a difficult thing to human beings, and admit that the women have won their right to a place in the labour market, and also have proved themselves good comrades and fellow workers with the men. In this case equality and co-operation is not only the most generous aim to pursue, but the only wise one. Otherwise the second alternative will be forced on the workers, and that is that an unacknowledged but real alliance will be made between the employers and the women workers, and the men will be gradually ousted. There will almost necessarily be a shortage of capital when peace comes, interest will go up, and the tendency will be for wages to go down. Women will be forced to stay in the labour market somehow. There will be fewer men to support them, and there will be more dependents—children, old people, and invalid soldiers—for them to provide for.

Employers know now what they were too slow to see before, that women can do any work they give them. If men and women workers do not stand together, if artificial restrictions are put on women's work, then the employers will be in a position where they can play off one set against the other to the detriment of both, and buy women's work at a cheaper rate than men's, because they are not free to bargain as the men are. No one will be benefited; all workers will suffer from a general reduction of the standard.

Is it too late for Women Suffragists to appeal to the men to look at the question from a broad standpoint, and to ask them first to help us to get at once the political equality we need to enable us to fight this industrial battle at the end of the war, and then to join hands with us in our efforts to better the conditions of women's labour, and so raise the standard of conditions all round to a more human level than it is to-day?

MARGARET ROPER

702/73

able sacrifices in the way of handing over to the Government any extra profits above a certain limit. If labour insisted that these rules should be restored the Government would have to comply; that was the present agreement, which could not be departed from without the consent of organised labour. Whether it would be to the ultimate interest of labour to insist on this restoration was a very important matter for consideration; both employer and labour must realise that the conditions of industry would be changed and both would have to meet the situation in a new spirit. Labour would do well to consider whether, after all, its own interests and the interests of the nation had been served well in the past, or would be in the future, by the old policy. It was obvious that a nation did not prosper by curtailing its output of things necessary for the welfare of mankind. For if our competitors produced the same things at less cost per head the trade would go to them. Our future success would depend on getting the utmost production out of our industrial equipment. The idea of there only being a certain amount of work to do, and the less any individual did the more there would be for others, was economically bad, and to follow it up was to traverse the high road to unemployment. The great amount of capital outlay expended in equipping an engineering works formed an important proportion of the standing charges; therefore the obvious policy was to obtain the maximum output per machine, even to the extent of keeping the more important ones running night and day, and to encourage the workers' endeavours. A scheme of rewarding individual effort was advisable.

Women in Engineering Shops.

The capture of enemy trade was a question of output rather than of total employment, for in normal times we had only about 4 per cent of unemployed, and if employment were found for these it could not be expected that we should be able to accomplish anything but a small fraction of the extra trade contemplated unless an understanding was come to between employer and labour to ensure greater individual output. It would be to the interest of the employer to discard out-of-date machinery and replace it with modern; more especially was this advisable with high wage rates. Then again it was not good economy to employ fully skilled men on work which could be equally well done by semi-skilled men or women. The important part women had taken in helping to carry out extra and unusual work which the war had brought about was an important industrial factor. They had adapted themselves to the novel conditions and had proved themselves capable of keeping pace with male labour on repetition work, even to the extent in some cases of giving better results. He particularly referred to output rather than to production costs. Not only had they shown themselves capable of success in engineering works, but they had taken the places of other male labour. Would these women be willing to revert to their former employment after qualifying themselves in doing work for which they had received comparatively high pay? No doubt a number working from purely patriotic motives would resume their former occupations, but others would have a strong desire to continue working in the mechanical trades. Only in rare cases were women doing the work of skilled men; in general they were employed on work of a repetition nature, but the skill which they had displayed afforded reason to believe that they could be qualified for more responsible work by a proper system of more prolonged training.

Discussing the question of remuneration, Mr. Reed said the value of services rendered should not be measured by the time made but by the work done. Good wages was a forward policy. It attracted the best labour and retained it, and generally speaking ensured the most economical production.

Notes and [illegible]

[illegible] on a semi-official mission by the Ministry of Munitions, that the women's output has been from two to two and a-half times that of men in these workshops?

When that announcement was published months ago, many of us foresaw the consequences that would follow. Women had been urged by the authorities to be patriotic, to think not of the conditions of their work, but of the needs of the soldiers at the front. Accordingly, they exerted themselves to the utmost of their powers, and their output naturally exceeded the men's. The men knew from years of experience that such an output could not be kept up, without a terrible sacrifice of working power in the future, and they would not attempt such speeding up. Is it any wonder that they are able to work more hours a day without rests when they work at half the stress? And is it not very likely that the suggestion of fewer hours for a working day for women is an attempt to keep the output level?

The White Paper speaks of the lighter types of work being kept for women, "as it is a waste of muscle to appropriate these to men, or even to youths," quite regardless of the fact that some strong athletic women can do without effort what many delicate youths could only do at risk of their lives.

Again, in whose interest is it that "sedentary gauging operations should evidently be confined to women and girls?" Nature, I suppose, built women to sit everlastingly on seats, and men to improve their muscular power by movement!

The report seems to regard the ideal workers as machines—those labelled men doing this work, and those labelled women doing that, and all forced to take their rest times compulsorily and equally, and "the rest pauses at other times checked as far as possible."

Now, turn to the Trade Congress resolution, passed "without discussion." No one is asking that a woman who has taken a man's place should not give up that place to the man if he is fortunate enough to come back to it at the close of the war. Everyone agrees that it is his. But how many men, unfortunately, will never come back, and how many will not return to the same work, and in these cases why should women be turned out? We read with grim amusement that the old arguments were advanced that the work was bad for women's health and "morals," and we could almost apologise to the next cheery 'bus conductor we pay our fare to for the insult thus put upon her. The important thing, however, is for us to

702/72

Yorkshire Observer
3. 10. 16

702/73 & 252 666

WOMEN LIBERALS.

YORKSHIRE ASSOCIATIONS IN CONFERENCE.

AFTER-WAR PROBLEMS DISCUSSED IN LEEDS.

Questions of vital importance were raised at the annual meeting of the Yorkshire Council of Women's Liberal Associations, held at the Philosophical Hall, Leeds, yesterday. Mrs. A. E Hartley (Roundhay), who took the chair in the absence of Miss Salt (president), had the support of Miss Margaret Ashton (Manchester), Lady Fisher-Smith (Halifax), Miss Booth (Gildersome), Miss Cockshott (Oakworth), Mrs. Donkersley (Huddersfield), Mrs. Dewhirst (Barkston Ash), Mrs. Derwent (Bradford), Mrs. E. Denison (Yeadon), Mrs. Gray-Heald (Leeds), Mrs. Gardner (Hull), Mrs. Ingram (Shipley), Mrs. Charles Newboult (Bradford), Mrs. Grattan Newboult (Bradford), and Miss F. Morton (Leeds).

In the annual report Miss F. Morton (hon. secretary) stated that the members of the associations were still greatly occupied on special war work, and the proper duties of the associations were as yet in many respects inappropriate to the general atmosphere of public life. It was hoped and believed, however, that the associations would persevere in maintaining their corporate existence for future purposes. There were two subjects in particular which ought to engage the attention of Liberal women both now and during the coming months. In the first place, there was what was described as "reconstruction after the war." The future remuneration and position of thousands of women who had recently entered new industries, the security and independence of the widows of fallen soldiers, the fate of the boys now growing up in millions of homes, and the direct participation of women in making the laws under which they had to live were all parts of the general subject of reconstruction upon which Liberal women should be exercising thought and forming enlightened opinions. In the second place, there was the subject of the prevention of war in the future, which was perhaps the most important, and certainly the most urgent, of all. This could only be effected if the experiences of the past two years caused a general consolidation of public opinion in favour of peace. Women had to take their part in the formation of that opinion, and they could only do so by meeting together, by informing themselves, by making up their minds, and by making their convictions felt.

The report, together with that of the hon. treasurer, was adopted.

WAGES FOR FEMALE LABOUR.

Afterwards the delegates listened to an address on "The Economic Position of Women After the War" from Miss Margaret Ashton, a member of the Manchester City Council, and sister-in-law of the Lord Mayor of Leeds. She said that when the present struggle was over it would have to be seen that woman was no more of a glut on the labour market than man. The country had witnessed the transfer of men and women in various occupations—women had been called into agriculture—and she presumed that would continue. Women would have to go on working in agricultural pursuits such as dairying, even heavy farming, and certainly market gardening, if the condition of agriculture in the country was to be improved and made something like adequate for the support of the nation itself. There had also, it was true, been a good deal of displacement of men by females in commercial positions, but only of the males engaged in the lower paid occupations, while the men were entering the well-paid positions held by women, there being, for instance, more men acting as overlookers in the millinery business. That was extremely unsatisfactory, for it meant that there was still less opportunity for the protection of women even in their own trades than there was before. Women had got to guard against that, and the country had got to get over the idea that a woman was merely a female.

One saw the Government to-day placing women with a university education and the so-called flappers out of the elementary and secondary schools into the same positions. The result was that from Government departments where clerks of 30 years of age with considerable experience had been replaced by young girls of 15 there came the complaint of the inefficiency of women. On the other hand, where university women were doing the work for which they were quite ill-suited the cry arose of how well the work was being done. When the Government could discriminate between the two classes then there might possibly be some idea obtained of the real value of women's labour and the necessity for adequate payment of that labour.

AN ABSURD VIEW.

Another point she wished to mention was the view of men in pre-war days that women did not do more than keep themselves. Nothing was so absurd. Before the commencement of this great struggle there were nearly 5,000,000 women working for wages in the country, and of that number 12 per cent. were girls under 17, and 2½ per cent. women of 65 and upwards; naturally they were not able, as women were to-day, to be wholly self-supporting. Of the remainder, however, 35 per cent. supported themselves alone, and 51 per cent. supported as much as one and three-quarter persons more than themselves. Therefore over half the women working supported someone else, but they were only paid on the assumption that they maintained themselves.

As a result of the war women would not only have to support themselves, but would have many others dependent upon them. Women must therefore be put on an equal rate with the men if the nation was to be really self-supporting, and women were not to become a drag on the nation and their children weak and debilitated by lack of sufficient means to care for them properly. After the war, too, there would be the question of how to cope with the large influx of women into the labour market. Was it not right, asked Miss Ashton, that an effort should be made after the war to try and steady the labour market by keeping the children out of it for a year or two, and thereby taking away the competition of cheap child labour, which had always had a tendency to destroy the health of the nation.

HALF-TIME AND STUNTED STATURE.

Further, there was the matter of education—what could be done to improve the education of the children? The country would have to see that their school hours were extended, and the boys and girls better fitted to take up the strain of life. Personally, she was extremely anxious to see girls kept out of industry until they were 16 years of age. It was only human beings who worked their young before they were fully grown. Horses were not worked while they were young except very gently; but then horses cost money, and children cost nothing, except from the mother's standpoint. Children were too valuable to be sacrificed to man's greed. Lancashire had the unenviable reputation of raising more "Bantam" battalions than any other county. The half-time system was responsible for a good deal of that stunted stature. Those of the cotton industries and those of the woollen industries had a great load of responsibility upon them for having damaged the human race in their areas.

Concluding, Miss Ashton expressed the belief that had women had a voice in the affairs of the country war would in all probability have been prevented, and she emphasised the necessity of women combining when the time for the reconstruction of the nation came to see that their claims were not overlooked. (Applause.)

In opening the discussion which followed, Lady Fisher-Smith said that the chance of women in England had not come until now. When one examined the commercial fabric of the country, it was almost a ruin, many of the mills having had entirely to change their output and work on munitions. There were, too, thousands of small industries and small shops which had had to be given up because of the men going to the war.

Another delegate, alluding to the suggestion that children should be allowed to remain at school until 16, said that until a father was paid sufficient to bring up his children she could see no outlet to the question.

Miss Ashton, in reply, said the subject of the maintenance of the children was already under consideration, but she did not think they ought to expect the State to do more in that direction than they were doing already.

Mrs. Grattan Newboult mentioned that in Bradford a few weeks ago there was a Munitions Court at which some women were brought up for neglecting their work. In the course of the evidence it came out that they were receiving 14s. a week for wire-winding, and were working the ordinary factory hours. The employer was anxious they should go back to work, but he did not offer to pay them more than the 14s., and she (the speaker) had been told that the work was that of an ordinary labourer, for which a man received 22s. a week. When the war was over women would have to take in hand the question of economics, and everyone knew there were no economists like women.

Denunciation of the wages paid to nurses was uttered by Miss Morton, who said that nursing, as all knew, was one of the worst sweated professions in the country. At the present time there was a call for V.A.D. nurses, but it was impossible for a girl to give her services unless she possessed private means. One saw advertisements for nurses at £20 a year—a domestic servant's wages.

Another delegate, however, pointed out that while it was perfectly true V.A.D. nurses were paid £20 a year, when they went abroad under the Government they received various allowances.

Lady Fisher-Smith said Liberal women must see to it that there was a registration of nurses, there being women pretending to be nurses who were not so. If there was that registration it would lead to an alteration in the salaries.

THE PREVENTION OF WAR.

Before proceeding with the programme of the afternoon session, the delegates passed a vote of sympathy with the Prime Minister in the loss of his eldest son.

There followed an address on "The Prevention of War in the Future," by Principal Graham, of Walton Hall, Manchester, who said that in the territorial settlements when the war was over everyone trusted the principle of nationality and the consent of the governed would be the main considerations. There could only be the security for everybody which the people of Europe desired if there were no soldiers. Were there no armies and navies there would be no fear of territorial aggrandisement and the vast drain on the nations of the world produced by them. Nothing but the minds of men stood in the path of that ideal. Disarmament depended upon an increase of trust among the peoples of the world, and he personally believed that the way to stimulate hatred and all evil feeling was by imposing a protective tariff. Before there could be love amongst the nations there must be justice, and of all kinds of justice economic justice was the foremost. It would suit Great Britain to have the coast of Africa dotted with German factories and plantations, because the Germans would there be making something they wanted to sell. If they desired to sell palm oil, teak, and coffee a good deal of those materials would come to England, and would be paid for by exports, and in that way our trade would be stimulated.

The speaker added that statements about fighting to the bitter end only provoked hostility. Mr. Lloyd George had said in his interview with a newspaper correspondent that "such punishment must be inflicted upon the perpetrators of this outrage against humanity that the temptation to emulate their exploits would be eliminated from the hearts of the evil-minded amongst the rulers of men." But rulers had never been restrained by what other rulers had done, and this wickedness and evil would never be crushed by methods of what Mr. Lloyd George called punishment—that was, by defeat. War would never bring an end to war however far we might succeed for the moment in destroying the armies and military material of our opponents. It was not a patriotic thing to say time was no matter and we must go on to inflict punishment at whatever cost.

Mrs. Stewart-Brown (Liverpool), the chairman of the Lancashire and Cheshire Women's Liberal Suffrage Union, also delivered an address on "Looking Ahead."

cf: article by "AW Humphrey" in Daily News" Date 9th Oct. '16, in Thos file. AD

Daily News
23 · 3 · 17

702/74

Daily Telegraph 702
9 - 4 - 17

WOMEN WORKERS AFTER THE WAR.

PIN-MONEY VERSUS A REAL LIVING WAGE.

By CECIL HAMMERSLEY.

A FEW days ago I was talking to an employer about the wages question (said Miss Mary Macarthur, Secretary of the Women's Trade Union League), and he said: "Anyhow, women are ten-a-penny. I only have to put up a notice and there are hundreds at the gate looking for a job."

And the call is for more women and still more to "come forward"! We're a quaint nation. If, as with art, every nation had the women it deserved, then Britain would certainly send out those "calls" in vain.

Everyone surely realises that woman will never give up the fruits of the victory she has [illegible] She has silenced for ever those who said that she should seek no outlets for her mental and physical energies apart from her pots, pans and perambulator. There is, however, always the question: How best can woman make her position secure after the war, run side by side with man in the race of life as a comrade and fellow-worker, and not as a fighting competitor?

An employer must not be permitted to imagine that he can pay a woman 25s. a week, say, for doing precisely the same duties, equally well, for which he would pay a man £2 or over. And, the Government must first set the good example. (In one Government department a man was doing certain work before the war for £3 a week. His post at present is being filled by a young girl, who, though doing exactly the same work with equal accuracy, is being paid only 16s. a week.)

Not only is this sort of thing terribly unjust to the woman worker, but it tends to lower the standard rates of payment for the men when they come back. Many employers may refuse to pay a man several pounds a week for doing work that they can get a woman to do equally well for several shillings.

THOSE WHO MUST GO.

For the benefit of all serious woman workers, more especially the many thousands who have to earn a living to keep themselves, and possibly a mother or younger dependent, those "ten-a-penny" workers—the "pin-money pastime" triflers—must go. These pocket-money women only lower the value of competent workers. There is no longer room for the semi-amateur, although no doubt for what she does she is adequately paid. The complete organisation of the thoroughly competent woman worker would be of benefit to her masculine colleagues. Instead of being forced against her will and interests to undercut him on the wages list, she would be competing honestly with him on an equal basis.

So, instead of an employer with a position vacant being able to say: "I can get a woman to do this work for 25s., while I should have to pay a man £2 10s., therefore I'll employ a woman," he would have to say: "This post is worth £2 10s. A man can have it or a woman can have it—whichever of them is the most skilful, the best-trained worker."

Now, the employer has this problem to face: If a man marries, the fact does not interrupt his work; but if a woman becomes a wife, more often than not her work breaks up and the employer may be left in the lurch, especially if the woman has occupied a position of responsibility for which he had to spend valuable time in training her. In the interest of the State it is right that a woman should leave her employment when she becomes a mother. Still, it seems as though there ought to be some solution to the difficulty from the employers' standpoint. Lady Henry Somerset once suggested to me that some sort of insurance might be arranged by which the employer safeguards himself against losing a valuable worker.

GOVERNMENT OFFICES.

WOMAN'S FUTURE.

Our Civil Service Correspondent writes:

The position of women after the war, following the numberless occupations hitherto closed now thrown open to them, will present a very interesting problem. With the influx of thousands of women into our Government departments, that problem will be no less present in the Civil Service than in the commercial and industrial world. Will all these women be turned adrift when peace comes, and what will be the effect on woman's own outlook of tasting for the first time what she would call the sweets of economic independence? These are questions which even in the midst of war are now being considered. No woman, we feel sure, who has released a man for the front would object to give him his place when he returns; but, on the other hand, how many of our brave boys will never return? The prejudices against the employment of woman have [illegible] own [illegible] that her [illegible] ough [illegible] rvice [illegible] nces [illegible] ered [illegible] vices [illegible] when [illegible] play [illegible] will [illegible] ould [illegible] ding [illegible] locu- [illegible] and [illegible] n of [illegible] man [illegible] ould easily perform all the duties of the abstractor and boy clerk class, and, with few exceptions, those of the second division clerks. In the strenuous times ahead of us, when we have to repair the evils of war, it is surely a waste of our man power to employ able bodied men in those simple clerical duties when they might be engaged in more manly work as producers of wealth in farm and factory.

We have a shortage of men and a surplusage of women, and this state of things will become even more marked. It would do something to redress this disparity if wider employment were given to women in the clerical sphere. The Committee presided over by Lord Faringdon, which recommended the establishment of the British Trade Bank evidently foresaw the wider rôle which women, under the new conditions, are expected to play in future. One significant sentence in their report says in regard to the general staff required, "It is fair to assume that women will in future take a considerable share in purely clerical work, and this fact will enable the institution to take fuller advantage of the qualifications of its male staff to push its affairs in every quarter of the globe." They go on to say that "it is perhaps worth pointing out that at the close of the war there may be a considerable number of educated young men who will not be willing to settle down again to the humdrum of an office," at the same time remarking that "the reluctance on the part of young men to go abroad in recent years has been brought to their notice." With the changes that have been brought about women will assuredly find a wider field for their services than they ever anticipated..

Of course, the question of the proper remuneration of women is bound to come to the front. In the Civil Service, as recently pointed out in The Daily Telegraph, it is an accepted principle that the remuneration of women is always on a lower scale than that allowed to men, even where the work performed is the same for both. Will this principle stand against the waves of reform which are submerging all our old landmarks? It is pointed out that equal work deserves equal pay, but many eminent authorities justify the lower remuneration of women on the ground that the man is the breadwinner and entitled to a salary corresponding with his responsibilities, which are not to be measured by his official duties or the precise value of his work for the State. It is a delicate and complex problem, and must be left to the future to settle. No doubt women regard the lower pay offered them as a stigma on their sex, apart altogether from the economic or social side of the question, and it is asked: Does a lady novelist or a lady playwright receive less royalty because she is a woman? Why, then, should a different rule prevail in the Government service?

A THOUGHT FOR TO-DAY.

Be wisely worldly; be not worldly wise.—Quarles.

Christian Science Monitor
4 - 10 - 16

A Trade Unionist on After-War Trade

THE view, regarding after-war trade, put forward by John Hill, general secretary of the Boilermakers Society of the United Kingdom, in a recent report, is worthy of special notice. After referring to the various measures taken by the government to provide for a large degree of unemployment after the war, Mr. Hill goes on to insist that, if the situation were dealt with as it should be, there ought to be no serious amount of unemployment after the war. To regain the material loss to the nation, he says, more than the usual amount of work will be required, and if it is possible, in war time, to find employment for all kinds of men, women and children, and for some of the most inefficient workers, surely it is also possible to organize the after-war remnant of the national industries, and to convert this vast plant and capital, immediately, for the manufacture of materials to restore and build up the nation.

The point raised by Mr. Hill is, of course, in the last degree a controversial one. It raises the whole question of what is commonly called socialism, and throws open the doors to a consideration of the political economy of nations de novo. Some years ago, when the boot trade in England was passing through a period of comparative stagnation, when large numbers of firms were working only short time or had temporarily closed down altogether, a prominent publicist asked a very pertinent question. He had taken a walk through London, he said, especially through the East End; from London he had taken a train to a large town in the Midlands devoted chiefly to the manufacture of boots and shoes, and he had made an extended tour of its streets. On both occasions he noticed one thing in particular, namely, that he met very many men, women and children who clearly needed a pair of new boots. In the boot town, especially, he met many hundreds who needed new footgear more than perhaps any other article of clothing. And yet there was no work in the factories, even for the ill-shod boot operatives themselves, and no manufacturer would make boots and shoes because there was so comparatively small a sale for them.

Now anyone who knows anything of political economy will know full well with what avidity the orthodox political economist would prepare to explain this matter, and guarantee to make it as clear as daylight why bootless boot operatives should be walking the streets idle because there was no demand for boots. By the time he ployer about the wages question (said Miss Mary Macarthur, Secretary of the Women's Trade Union League), and he said: "Anyhow, women are ten-a-penny. I only have to put up a notice and there are hundreds at the gate looking for a job."

And the call is for more women and still more to "come forward"! We're a quaint nation. If, as with art, every nation had the women it deserved, then Britain would certainly send out those "calls" in vain.

Everyone surely realises that woman will never give up the fruits of the victory she has [illegible] for ever those who said that she should seek no outlets for her mental and physical energies apart from her pots, pans and perambulator. There is, however, always the question: How best can woman make her position secure after the war, run side by side with man in the race of life as a comrade and fellow-worker, and not as a fighting competitor?

An employer must not be permitted to imagine that he can pay a woman 25s. a week, say, for doing precisely the same duties, equally well, for which he would pay a man £2 or over. And, the Government must first set the good example. (In one Government department a man was doing certain work before the war for £3 a week. His post at present is being filled by a young girl, who, though doing exactly the same work with [illegible] week for doing work that they can get a woman to do equally well for several shillings.

THOSE WHO MUST GO.

For the benefit of all serious woman workers, more especially the many thousands who have to earn a living to keep themselves, and possibly a mother or younger dependent, those "ten-a-penny" workers—the "pin-money pastime" triflers—must go. These pocket-money women only lower the value of competent workers. There is no longer room for the semi-amateur, although no doubt for what she does she is adequately paid. The complete organisation of the thoroughly competent woman worker would be of benefit to her masculine colleagues. Instead of being forced against her will and interests to undercut him on the wages list, she would be competing honestly with him on an equal basis.

So, instead of an employer with a position vacant being able to say: "I can get a woman to do this work for 25s., while I should have to pay a man £2 10s., therefore I'll employ a woman," he would have to say: "This post is worth £2 10s. A man can have it or a woman can have it—whichever of them is the most skilful, the best-trained worker."

Now, the employer has this problem to face: If a man marries, the fact does not interrupt his work; but if a woman becomes a wife, more often than not her work breaks up and the employer may be left in the lurch, especially if the woman has occupied a position of responsibility for which he had to spend valuable time in training her. In the interest of the State it is right that a woman should leave her employment when she becomes a mother. Still, it seems as though there ought to be some solution to the difficulty from the employers' standpoint. Lady Henry Somerset once suggested to me that some sort of insurance might be arranged by which the employer safeguards himself against losing a valuable worker.

thrown open to them, will present a very interesting problem. With the influx of thousands of women into our Government departments, that problem will be no less present in the Civil Service than in the commercial and industrial world. Will all these women be turned adrift when peace comes, and what will be the effect on woman's own outlook of tasting for the first time what she would call the sweets of economic independence? These are questions which even in the midst of war are now being considered. No woman, we feel sure, who has released a man for the front would object to give him his place when he returns; but, on the other hand, how many of our brave boys will never return? The prejudices against the employment of woman have easily perform all the duties of the abstractor and boy clerk class, and, with few exceptions, those of the second division clerks. In the strenuous times ahead of us, when we have to repair the evils of war, it is surely a waste of our man power to employ able bodied men in those simple clerical duties when they might be engaged in more manly work as producers of wealth in farm and factory.

A THOUGHT FOR TO-DAY.

Be wisely worldly; be not worldly wise.—Quarles.

We have a shortage of men and a surplusage of women, and this state of things will become even more marked. It would do something to redress this disparity if wider employment were given to women in the clerical sphere. The Committee presided over by Lord Faringdon, which recommended the establishment of the British Trade Bank evidently foresaw the wider rôle which women, under the new conditions, are expected to play in future. One significant sentence in their report says in regard to the general staff required, "It is fair to assume that women will in future take a considerable share in purely clerical work, and this fact will enable the institution to take fuller advantage of the qualifications of its male staff to push its affairs in every quarter of the globe." They go on to say that "it is perhaps worth pointing out that at the close of the war there may be a considerable number of educated young men who will not be willing to settle down again to the humdrum of an office," at the same time remarking that "the reluctance on the part of young men to go abroad in recent years has been brought to their notice." With the changes that have been brought about women will assuredly find a wider field for their services than they ever anticipated..

Of course, the question of the proper remuneration of women is bound to come to the front. In the Civil Service, as recently pointed out in The Daily Telegraph, it is an accepted principle that the remuneration of women is always on a lower scale than that allowed to men, even where the work performed is the same for both. Will this principle stand against the waves of reform which are submerging all our old landmarks? It is pointed out that equal work deserves equal pay, but many eminent authorities justify the lower remuneration of women on the ground that the man is the bread-winner and entitled to a salary corresponding with his responsibilities, which are not to be measured by his official duties or the precise value of his work for the State. It is a delicate and complex problem, and must be left to the future to settle. No doubt women regard the lower pay offered them as a stigma on their sex, apart altogether from the economic or social side of the question, and it is asked: Does a lady novelist or a lady playwright receive less royalty because she is a woman? Why, then, should a different rule prevail in the Government service?

Christian Science Monitor
4-10-16.

A Trade Unionist on After-War Trade

THE view, regarding after-war trade, put forward by John Hill, general secretary of the Boilermakers Society of the United Kingdom, in a recent report, is worthy of special notice. After referring to the various measures taken by the government to provide for a large degree of unemployment after the war, Mr. Hill goes on to insist that, if the situation were dealt with as it should be, there ought to be no serious amount of unemployment after the war. To regain the material loss to the nation, he says, more than the usual amount of work will be required, and if it is possible, in war time, to find employment for all kinds of men, women and children, and for some of the most inefficient workers, surely it is also possible to organize the after-war remnant of the national industries, and to convert this vast plant and capital, immediately, for the manufacture of materials to restore and build up the nation.

The point raised by Mr. Hill is, of course, in the last degree a controversial one. It raises the whole question of what is commonly called socialism, and throws open the doors to a consideration of the political economy of nations de novo. Some years ago, when the boot trade in England was passing through a period of comparative stagnation, when large numbers of firms were working only short time or had temporarily closed down altogether, a prominent publicist asked a very pertinent question. He had taken a walk through London, he said, especially through the East End; from London he had taken a train to a large town in the Midlands devoted chiefly to the manufacture of boots and shoes, and he had made an extended tour of its streets. On both occasions he noticed one thing in particular, namely, that he met very many men, women and children who clearly needed a pair of new boots. In the boot town, especially, he met many hundreds who needed new footgear more than perhaps any other article of clothing. And yet there was no work in the factories, even for the ill-shod boot operatives themselves, and no manufacturer would make boots and shoes because there was so comparatively small a sale for them.

Now anyone who knows anything of political economy will know full well with what avidity the orthodox political economist would prepare to explain this matter, and guarantee to make it as clear as daylight why bootless boot operatives should be walking the streets idle, because there was no demand for boots. By the time he had finished, however, and for an indefinite period afterwards, as far as anything he could do to help in the matter was concerned, the boot operative would continue to walk the streets, bootless, because there was no demand for boots. The prime necessity in such cases is, first of all, to admit that the condition is wrong; then to recognize that it can be righted, and then to set about finding the solution. The "right to work" is not socialism or any other "ism"; it is an inalienable privilege. There can be no question that if the governments of the various countries were to start and finish all their deliberations on the position of labor after the war with this fact as an axiom, they would be in a much better position to solve the problem than by devising stop-gap schemes of pensions and subsidies.

702/74

ERS AFTER THE WAR.

REAL

Y.

an emon (said of the he said:
I only are hun-and still a quaint had the ould cer-
.
han will she has for ever outlets es apart
r. There
low best after the the race
ker, and itted to a week, duties,

y a man nust first vernment in work post at irl, who, ork with equal accuracy, is being paid only 16s. a week.)

Not only is this sort of thing terribly unjust to the woman worker, but it tends to lower the standard rates of payment for the men when they come back. Many employers may refuse to pay a man several pounds a week for doing work that they can get a woman to do equally well for several shillings.

THOSE WHO MUST GO.

For the benefit of all serious woman workers, more especially the many thousands who have to earn a living to keep themselves, and possibly a mother or younger dependent, those "ten-a-penny" workers—the "pin-money pastime" triflers—must go. These pocket-money women only lower the value of competent workers. There is no longer room for the semi-amateur, although no doubt for what she does she is adequately paid. The

Anzacs bathing their invaluable friend the after a heavy shower of rain, when the wate a time forms a

Daily Telegraph 9-4-17 702

GOVERNMENT OFFICES.

WOMAN'S FUTURE.

Our Civil Service Correspondent writes:

The position of women after the war, following the numberless occupations hitherto closed now thrown open to them, will present a very interesting problem. With the influx of thousands of women into our Government departments, that problem will be no less present in the Civil Service than in the commercial and industrial world. Will all these women be turned adrift when peace comes, and what will be the effect on woman's own outlook of tasting for the first time what she would call the sweets of economic independence? These are questions which even in the midst of war are now being considered. No woman, we feel sure, who has released a man for the front would object to give him his place when he returns; but, on the other hand, how many of our brave boys will never return? The prejudices against the employment of woman have largely disappeared with the war, and she has shown herself so adaptable, industrious, and efficient that it may be regarded as certain that the sphere of her employment will be considerably extended. Though prejudices are more ingrained in the Civil Service than in business firms, yet the present circumstances must lead inevitably to wider openings being offered to women and a more extensive use of their services in Government departments.

We shall enter into a new and different world when peace is declared. The need for young men to play their part in the regeneration of the country will be urgent, and it is questionable whether we could not find better use for their services than sending them into Government offices merely copying documents and doing clerical work of a routine and mechanical kind. There is really no form of clerical work which the modern educated woman could not do as well as a man. Women could easily perform all the duties of the abstractor and boy clerk class, and, with few exceptions, those of the second division clerks. In the strenuous times ahead of us, when we have to repair the evils of war, it is surely a waste of our man power to employ able bodied men in those simple clerical duties when they might be engaged in more manly work as producers of wealth in farm and factory.

We have a shortage of men and a surplusage of women, and this state of things will become even more marked. It would do something to redress this disparity if wider employment were given to women in the clerical sphere. The Committee presided over by Lord Faringdon, which recommended the establishment of the British Trade Bank evidently foresaw the wider rôle which women, under the new conditions, are expected to play in future. One significant sentence in their report says in regard to the general staff required, "It is fair to assume that women will in future take a considerable share in purely clerical work, and this fact will enable the institution to take fuller advantage of the qualifications of its male staff to push its affairs in every quarter of the globe." They go on to say that "it is perhaps worth pointing out that at the close of the war there may be a considerable number of educated young men who will not be willing to settle down again to the humdrum of an office," at the same time remarking that "the reluctance on the part of young men to go abroad in recent years has been brought to their notice." With the changes that have been brought about women will assuredly find a wider field for their services than they ever anticipated..

Of course, the question of the proper remuneration of women is bound to come to the front. In the Civil Service, as recently pointed out in The Daily Telegraph, it is an accepted principle that the remuneration of women is always on a lower scale than that allowed to men, even where the work performed is the same for both. Will this principle stand against the waves of reform which are submerging all our old landmarks? It is pointed out that equal work deserves equal pay, but many eminent authorities justify the lower remuneration of women on the ground that the man is the breadwinner and entitled to a salary corresponding with his responsibilities, which are not to be measured by his official duties or the precise value of his work for the State. It is a delicate and complex problem, and must be left to the future to settle. No doubt women regard the lower pay offered them as a stigma on their sex, apart altogether from the economic or social side of the question, and it is asked: Does a lady novelist or a lady playwright receive less royalty because she is a woman? Why, then, should a different rule prevail in the Government service?

e Monitor
16

on After-War Trade

After-war trade, put forward retary of the Boilermakers gdom, in a recent report, is After referring to the various rnment to provide for a large ter the war, Mr. Hill goes on n were dealt with as it should erious amount of unemploy-egain the material loss to the the usual amount of work is possible, in war time, to nds of men, women and chil-nost inefficient workers, surely ize the after-war remnant of to convert this vast plant and he manufacture of materials nation.
. Hill is, of course, in the last
. It raises the whole quescalled socialism, and throws ation of the political economy

Victor Hugo: L

tor Hugo, A. F. teresting account the poet after rs of "perpetual being attacked,"
e peace and good-
Republic, he says, constitution roate from the at-
ons. "There was ng, to undertake
nment, politicians
y though without ty for appealing
on. But outside ce there was anficial, unsalaried,
well known th of Guernsey; n for Republican Frenchman had had been qualif with the conse
"Into this p figurehead.
striking person display at hom felt—make a br Republic would cially with the cate the idea have their 'Gre
State. All nat timent, be a sou which might yet
e hollest in these stands alone, the reet behind; the
After a long the tender pl spring untoldin

Common Sense
7-10-16

Finance 702/75 ~~666~~

THE FINANCE OF THE WAR.

THE casualty lists tell their own tale. So do the taxes. But the activity of trade disguises many things, and those who earn high wages and salaries do not realise fully the need of severe economy and saving. Bankers understand it. They and the officials of the Treasury realise what it means for the Chancellor of the Exchequer to be offering 6 per cent., even for a short term of three years, to provide money for the war. But the average man does not think in millions, or perceive the meaning for the future of this vast accumulating debt. Nor does he quite see the position as regards our Allies. Russia, especially, in order to pay interest on its debt and keep going, will need to obtain very large supplies of capital after the war. Where will she get the money? The longer the war lasts the more will be required. At least 500 millions must be owed to France. The French will have to try to pay the interest on the capital lent by them to Russia for some years to come. We shall have to do the same for what we have lent. We may have to do the same for Italy and Belgium, certainly for Serbia. Our Colonies will need all the financial support we can give them. After the war Colonial loans will shower on the London market, and Mr. Hughes will be very angry if money is not plentiful and rates are not cheap. For our own purposes it is clear that we shall need twice as much revenue as we had before the war, besides large temporary loans during the period of demobilisation and reconstruction.

In addition to these debt charges the belligerent States for many years will have a heavy drain on their resources in the payment of pensions to disabled soldiers and to the dependents of those who have lost their lives. From the example of the United States in the Civil War, we can dimly guess to what sums this item will advance in a war of unprecedented extent and destructiveness. While the claims for such pensions multiply with every week of war, in each country the resources from which they must be paid are absorbed by immediate military needs. It must be remembered that among the belligerents Great Britain alone has made any attempt to meet even a fraction of the war charges by increased taxation. The other Powers have had to face a heavy loss of revenue and to pay their way by issues of depreciated currency, by loans, and by heavy borrowings from their State banks.

Take first the financial position of the Central Powers, as it has been estimated by careful neutral investigators. The figures, of course, are very rough; but they are sufficiently near the mark for our purpose:

NATIONAL DEBTS OF THE CENTRAL POWERS.
(In Millions Sterling.)

	Before the War.	Jan. 1, 1916.	Aug. 1, 1916.
Germany (Imperial debt)	250	1,620	2,450
Austria-Hungary	750	—	1,800

DEBT CHARGES.
(In Millions Sterling.)

	Before the War.	Aug. 1, 1916.
Germany	12	122
Austria-Hungary	32	100

In both these States the revenue (largely derived from customs) has shrunk to a fraction of the normal receipts. It is hard to see how, except by very heavy borrowings for very many years to come, they will be able to discharge even the interest on their debts. In his Budget the Imperial debt," he said, "for 1916 takes 2,303 million marks, against 1,268 in 1915, and 250 in the last peace Budget. We are thus, in the midst of the war, brought face to face with what will be the great economic problem of the peace." Turning to Great Britain and her Allies, we must remember that the French National Debt before the war was the largest in the world, followed by that of Russia. According to these neutral estimates, France has now doubled, and Russia trebled, her debt. In Russia, too, the heavy loss of revenue from customs and from the suppression of the vodka traffic must be taken into account, though the latter is more than compensated by increased health, energy, and savings.

THE NATIONAL DEBTS OF THE ALLIES.
(In Millions Sterling.)

	Before the War.	Jan. 1, 1916.	Aug. 1, 1916.
France	1,320	2,520	2,920
Great Britain	707	2,125	2,610
Italy	570	760	920
Russia	920	2,220	3,000

Thus Germany and Great Britain lead in the addition of new war debt to their liabilities, while Russia and France have the largest gross debts. But in these totals neither the public debts of the German States nor those of our Colonies and India are included. If the German State debts were added Germany would take first place. Here is another rough computation of the debt charges of the Allies, leaving out Japan, Belgium, Serbia, and Roumania:

THE DEBT CHARGES OF THE ALLIES.
(In Millions Sterling.)

	Before the War.	Jan. 1, 1916.	Aug. 1, 1916.
Great Britain	22*	86	110
France	53	100	125
Russia	45	108	145
Italy	17	26	33

* Including a sinking fund of about five millions.

With Dr. Helfferich's statement quoted above may be contrasted the reminder of Mr. McKenna, in his Budget statement a month later, that "we never borrow a pound without making provision in advance by new taxation sufficient to cover both interest and a liberal sinking fund." He added: "The ability and willingness of our people to bear the burden of taxation have established our national credit on an unshakable foundation. . . . Civic courage is as important in its sphere as military courage, and we may justly claim in this time of stress that we have not been found wanting in either of these great virtues." If Germany has shown courage and financial strength by raising less revenue from taxation since the war began than she did in time of peace, then courage is not the word for what Great Britain has done. In the financial year 1916-17 it is proposed to raise 300 millions sterling by new taxation. Nevertheless, our debt charge (including a big Sinking Fund) for the current year (£145,000,000) is equal to our total national expenditure a few years ago.

In this survey no attempt has been made to consider the financial position of Bulgaria and Turkey in one group of belligerents, nor of Belgium, Serbia, and Montenegro among our Allies. The two Balkan Wars had already reduced their participants to insolvency, but we have good hope that Belgium will recover more rapidly than some suppose.

No one who can realise what these figures mean to the European world in individual privation and in the diversion of resources from productive and beneficial expenditure will attempt to minimise them. But the financial loss is only one aspect of the real cost of the war. There is also the devastation and destruction of property in the in- Asiatic Turkey, and German Africa, as well as the losses on land and sea due to mines, submarines, and aircraft. In France and Belgium, at any rate, careful observers also assert that in the area of hostilities the future productivity of the soil has been gravely impaired by trench-digging and the action of high explosive shells. At present these losses can hardly be estimated, and such guesses as have been made are probably exaggerated. The dislocation of trade and production due to the war is another factor, and in this neutrals also are involved, whether by natural difficulties of intercourse or the direct action of the belligerents in interference with neutral trade. Lastly, the casualty lists, with their agonising toll of human pain and bereavement, from another aspect, record a heavy economic loss to each belligerent. Both the numerical and the economic loss by casualties to the belligerents cannot, in the nature of things, be shown by more than rough estimates. But after two years of hostilities the total losses of the five leading belligerents in men may perhaps work out somewhat as follows; and a second column gives a valuation based upon the supposition that a British soldier represents a loss of £600, a German and a Frenchman a loss of £500, an Austrian a loss of £400, and a Russian a loss of £300 to the community of which he is a member.

KILLED, DIED OF DISEASE, OR MAIMED.

	The numerical loss.	Economic loss.
British Empire	450,000	£270,000,000
France	1,200,000	600,000,000
Germany	1,750,000	875,000,000
Austria	1,000,000	400,000,000
Russia	1,800,000	540,000,000
	6,200,000	£2,685,000,000

